What We Plead For.

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

For the right against the wrong;
For the weak against the strong;
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.
For the truth, 'gainst superstition,
For the faith, against tradition,
For the hope, whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

Some Recent Publications

IN THE DAYS OF JEHU. By J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS. 12mo, cloth, 75c.

A well written and intensely interesting Bible narrative. Without sacrificing historical accuracy, the author has given us a book more interesting than a work of pure fiction.

I have read "In the Days of Jehu" with interest and pleasure, and regard it, in a literary point of view, as a meritorious production. There is here shown an exceptional power of constructive imagination, and at the same time a wisdom of expression and soundness and reach of thought. Besides, the styles is simple, lucid and good, so that the thoughts fall into the mind of the reader without effort on his part. I think there is opened up, in this book, a mine which will yield much good ore, whose metallurgy will enhance the interest of the sacred volume.—DR. H. CHRISTOPHER, Editor Medical Herald, St. Joseph, Mo.

THE EXILED PROPHET; or, What John Saw on Patmos. By J. G. ENCELL. 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

The author has devoted a great many years to the study of this wonderful book. Illustrated with nearly forty half-tone engravings.

This is a valuable book, prefaced by an essay on Daniel by D. D. R. Dungan, covering seventy pages, and is exceedingly interesting to the student of prophecy. The seventeen chapters following on the Book of Revelation are equally as interesting and evince much research and earnestness for the truth. The author's conclusions will generally be accepted, and a careful reading of the book will awaken new interest in What John Saw on the Isle of Patmos.—Christian Tribune, Baltimore, Md.

For a number of years the author has been giving the substance of this book in a series of illustrated lectures. The marvel is that he has succeeded in condensing the work to its present form. It is suggestive and stimulating, and is probably as readable and satisfactory as any small volume published on this riddle of the ages, called the Apocalypse.—Christian Oracle, Chicago.

ACROSS THE GULF. By MRS. N. M. VANDERVOORT. 12mo, cloth, $1.00.

A wonderfully interesting and instructive story of the time of Christ.

The reading of "Across the Gulf" will awaken thought, strengthen faith, and stimulate the life of the reader to nobler service.—N. S. HAYNES.

The author is careful in her quotations of Scripture, and the harmony of Gospel narrative is happily preserved. The story centers about the ideal Christ, the author's aim being to lead the reader to reject all teaching that is morally only, and instead be drawn to the simple, yet pure and abiding faith and service in and for the Master.—Christian Leader, Cincinnati, O.

THE NORMAL INSTRUCTOR. PART V. THE INSTITUTIONS. By W. W. DOWLING. 12mo, manila cover, 15c.

This is the fifth number of a series of Normal Bible Studies for Teachers, Classes, Institutes and Assemblies.

WAYS OF WORKING. By OREON E. SCOTT. Paper, 10c.

A Handbook of Suggestions for Wide-Awake Christian Endeavorers.

AFTER PENTECOST, WHAT? By JAMES M. CAMPBELL, author of "Unto the Uttermost." 12mo, cloth, 297 pages, $1.00.

This work is a discussion of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit in its relation to modern Christological thought. The following Table of Contents will give an idea of the scope of the book: Introduction, The Significance of Pentecost, A Spiritual Christ, A Spiritual God, Spiritual Worship, A Spiritual Apprehension of Truth, An Influx of Spiritual Life, The Spiritual Man, Spiritual Holiness, Spiritual Authority, The Distribution of Spiritual Operations, The Impartation of Spiritual Power, The Production of Spiritual Works, The Formation of a Spiritual Society, The Inauguration of Spiritual Movements, The Establishment of a Spiritual Kingdom.

ORGANIC EVOLUTION CONSIDERED. By ALFRED FAIRHURST, A. M., Professor of Natural Science in Kentucky University. 12mo, cloth, 386 pages, $1.50.

This is a very thorough and scholarly discussion of Organic Evolution by one who has had many years' experience as a teacher of science.

Prof. Fairhurst has occupied the chair of Natural Science in the University of Kentucky for many years. He has not, like many college professors, contented himself with the daily routine of his work, but has been a diligent student of the several branches which he teaches, constantly extending his knowledge of them, and steadily increasing his skill in the laboratory. This book is the first result in printed form of these faithful scientific studies. It proves the author to be familiar with the writings of all the masters of the theory of organic evolution, and to so have studied them that he understands them well, and knows their weak points. At these points he has attacked their positions and arguments, and has successfully refuted them. His arguments are brief, crisp and satisfying. He understands the art of direct attack, which puts his opponent to flight without keeping his reader in suspense. It seems to me that any candid person who reads the book must close it with the conviction that the hypothesis of the origin of organic species by the process of evolution is not only an unproved hypothesis, as its ablest advocates admit, but one that is essentially false. In addition to what the author says on the subject of evolution, he furnishes the unscientific reader with a large amount of information about matter in its various forms and about organized beings that is both interesting and valuable. For this reason, as well as for its value as a refutation of the hypothesis which it chiefly combats, the book should have a wide circulation among intelligent people everywhere.—J. W. MCGARVEY, Lexington, Ky.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The battle at Santiago which began about eight o'clock on Friday morning, July first, continued with increasing severity throughout the day with advantages greatly in favor of the American troops. The firing was rambling at first,but became more furious and deadly as the day wore on. The outer entrenchments of the Spaniards were taken, and at sunset on Friday evening the Americans were within less than a mile of the city. The present reports estimate the killed and wounded Americans and Cubans at four hundred,but say that there were few killed. The report says that this famous stronghold at Santiago is now in ruins and the way open for a direct attack upon Cervera's ships within the bay. Hostilities were to be resumed at daybreak on Saturday, and at this writing it is thought that the city of Santiago will be taken before the close of the day.

The railroad connecting Aguadores and Santiago fell into the hands of the American troops June 30th, with no resistance and but slightly damaged. The engines were immediately manned by American men and went to hauling troops and equipments to the front. This will not only relieve the pack trains of a great burden, but hastens the movements of the army. The horses and mules contemplated for hauling supplies to the front from the shore can now be used to haul supplies from place to place at the front. With the capture of the railroad two thousand tons of coal intended for Cervera's ships in Santiago Harbor were also captured and will be used by the American fleet. The prospect at this writing is that the big guns of Moro Castle will also be taken and used against the fleet that sought shelter under their range. The cloud over Spanish rule in Cuba thickens and the storm that is to sweep the rule of this nation from the Atlantic Ocean is already bursting upon the doomed city of Santiago, and ere we go to press we shall doubtless record its submission to the American sceptre.

The Fourth of July, 1898, is destined to be a memorable one in the history of the nation. On the morning of that day came the news of the destruction of Cervera's fleet in Santiago Harbor, by Admiral Sampson, and General Shafter's demand for the surrender of the city of Santiago. Driven to desperation by the steady advance of our army investing the doomed city, and perhaps by the bombardment of our artillery, Admiral Cervera pushed his fleet around the sunken Merrimac and came out to sea at 9:30 A. M., with a view of giving battle to our squadron, or of making his escape. The movement was at once observed by our watchful seamen, and as soon as the first Spanish ship had emerged into the open sea, it was at once engaged by our vessels, and the others following quickly, under full sail, met with the same warm reception. At 2 P. M. nothing was left of the proud Spanish fleet, of which so much had been expected, but shattered and burning hulks lying along the Cuban Coast. Only one of our sailors was killed, and two wounded. The Spanish loss was several hundred killed and wounded, and 1,300 prisoners,including Admiral Cervera. When the Spanish commanders saw that their vessels were disabled by American shells, they ran them into the shore and blew them up. The vessels thus destroyed include the entire Spanish squadron, seven in all. This news communicated by Admiral Sampson to Washington and from there distributed throughout the country added immensely to the enthusiasm of the Fourth of July celebration in progress all over the land.

The destruction of Spain's squadron puts a new phase on the situation at Santiago. The decimated ranks of Gen. Shafter's army, which might have been compelled to wait for re-enforcements before storming the city, will now have the benefit of the co-operation of the fleet in reducing the fortifications of the city. Gen. Shafter, after having demanded the surrender of the city, which demand was refused by the Spanish commander, postponed the bombardment of the city until Tuesday, July 5th, at noon, the time of the closing of our paper to go to press. This postponement was made on the request of the foreign consul to allow time for women and children and other non-combatants to get out of the city. It is not believed at this writing that the city will be surrendered until it is subjected to bombardment. The hope of receiving re-enforcements under Gen. Pando, who is approaching the city, is no doubt the cause of the refusal to surrender. Gen. Shafter and Gen. Wheeler are both reported unwell. The heat has been terrible, but in the main our army seems to be standing it well and to be in good condition.

An unusually large number of casualties have resulted from the fighting about Santiago, and Gen. Shafter has been compelled to call for additional hospital facilities. The War Department has arranged to supply this demand. The Red Cross relief corps is rendering most efficient service in caring for the wounded. We regret, for the sake of our common humanity, to learn that the Spanish, in a number of cases, have fired upon these angels of mercy while they have been discharging their offices of kindness. The number of killed and wounded is estimated at from 800 to 1,000, about 15 per cent. of this number being killed. Estimating the number of our troops engaged at 12,000, this per cent. of killed and wounded is very high, showing the destructive character of modern arms. Some of the cartridges used by the Spanish have been sent to Washington, and are found to be so constructed as to produce blood poisoning. It is thought by experts that the use of such cartridges is a violation of the rules of civilized warfare. But Spain has not limited herself to the civilized rules of warfare in this conflict. The continuation of the struggle at Santiago, when there is no possibility of saving the city from captures is a needless sacrifice of human life. This is not bravery, bnt a stupid stubbornness that disregards the consequences.

On the 29th of June, Congress passed a new national bankruptcy bill. This is the fourth bill of this kind in the history of the nation. The first national bankruptcy law was passed in 1801 and repealed two and a half years later. The second one was passed in 1841 and lived but two years. The third one was passed in 1867 and remained in force for eleven years. Many attempts have been made since 1878 to enact another national bankruptcy bill, but without success, until the passage of the present measure. The present bill is said to be a compromise between the Nelson or Senate bill, which provided only for voluntary bankuptcy, and the Torrey or House bill, which provided for both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. The differences were between the debtor class of the West and the creditor class of the East, but the compromise agreed upon, it is thought, will be fairly satisfactory to both classes and to all sections of the country. The bill is one of the most important ones of the present Congress outside of war measures.

General Aguinaldo, the leader of the insurgents of the Philippine Islands, has proclaimed a republic under the protection of the United States. The fear of international complications thereby do not seem to be aggravated. Reports indicate that Gen. Aguinaldo is in close touch with Admiral Dewey, for whom he manifests a a profound respect, but no official announcement has come from Dewey on that subject at this writing. Everything is awaiting the arrival of the reinforcements now over due at Manila, and no further steps toward the occupation of Manila will likely be taken until they do arrive. Before the end of the present month Governor Gen. Merritt will be on the ground and things will then be more clearly defined. The fear of international complications or interference from the presence of German war vessels in Manila Harbor, of which much has been said in the press during the last week, is subsiding. The assurances of the German Government of their intention to maintain a strict neutrality as to Spanish and American interests at Manila and elsewhere, lessens the ground for anxiety on their account.

Before going to press we learn that the first deportment of troops, with the cruiser Charleston, has arrived at Manila, and that they were followed into the harbor by a German cruiser.

The proclamation which the Philippine insurgent leader, Emilio Aguinaldo, has issued from Cavite is a state document of no mean ability. It shows appreciation of the help received and is humane in its grasp of duty toward natives and foreigners, enemies and friends, as well as due respect for order, equity, purity and liberty. The following is the text of the proclamation: "Filipinos—The great North American nation, the repository of true liberty, and therefore the friend of freedom for our nation, oppressed and subjugated by the tyranny and despotism of its rulers, has come to afford to its inhabitants a protection as decisive as it is undoubtedly disinterested, regarding our unfortunate country as possessing sufficient civilization and aptitude for self-government, and in order to justify this high conception formed of us by the great American nation, we ought to reprobate all such acts as may derogate from that conception, such as pillage, robbery and every class of outrage against persons and property. In order to avoid conflcts during the period of our compaign, I order as follows:

"Article 1. The lives and property of all foreigners shall be respected, including in this denomination Chinese and all Spanish tradesmen who have not, directly or indirectly, contributed to the bearing of arms against us.

"Article 2. Equally shall be respected those of the enemy who shall lay down their arms.

"Article 3. Medical establishments and ambulances shall be respected and persons and effects attched thereto, unless they display hostility.

"Article 4. Persons disobeying these preceding articles shall be summarily tried and executed if their disobedience leads to assassination, incendiarism, robbery or rape.

"Given at Cavite, 24th day of May, 1898."

The Indian Rights Association is making an effort to secure a more liberal allotment of lands in Oklahoma Territory to the Comanche, Kiowa and Apache Indians than that proposed in the House of Representatives' bill, which was passed May 16, 1898, relating to the opening up of their reservation to settlement. The Indian Rights Association claims that owing to the lack of rain-fall and other adverse things one hundred and sixty acres per member, of this tribe, is not sufficient and equitable, and proposes that 480 acres be allowed each member of the tribe instead, and the residue of 1,611,453 acres purchased by the United States at a price that is just, perhaps $1.25 per acre, and the same be thrown open to settlement. The fund derived from the sale of the surplus lands of the reservation, this Association thinks, should be held in trust, bearing interest, by the United States, and the interest, together with not exceeding, possibly, fifty thousand dollars of the principal fund should be available, to be expended annually for tribal benefit, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. By Report of Commissioner of Indian Affairs, 1897, the population of the Comanche, Kiowa and Apache tribe of Indians is 2,828, occupying a reservation containing 2,968,893 acres.

It is intimated that a war is to be made by the new Pelloux Cabinet in Italy, against the Papacy. Some years ago the government enacted a law depriving religious corporations of the right to possess property in Italy. This largely destroyed the influence of the Papacy over the government for a time, but since the passage of that law a large number of societies have been organized, presumably for religious and philanthropic purposes, such as urban banks, co-operative bakeries, co-operative stores, co-operative soup kitchens and similar institutions and associations. These apparently secular societies, the report says, are entirely under the control of the clergy, and are a source of great influence over the masses. A strongly worded circular, which the government is about to send to the provincial authorities, declares that they are carrying on "a propaganda against the state under the mantle of elevated philanthropy," and it is on this account that Premier Pelloux has announced his intention of suppressing all societies and associations not authorized by the government.

Next in the line of importance to the great trans-continental railway of Russia is the railroad which has just come into the possession of England, extending from Cairo to within one hundred and fifty miles of Khartoum except a short break between Luxor and Wadi-Halfa. This great African railway system was purchased by an English syndicate, of which Cecil Rhodes is said to be the moving spirit. The Sultan is said to have protested strongly against this transfer of the road to British control on the ground that it was Turkish government property, but the Khedive of Egypt claims that he was forced into compliance with the demands of England by the presence of a British fleet at Alexandria. The demand of England was based on the cost of her wars in the Soudan in blood and money, and the reconquest of that country for Egypt. This road is to be extended to the Cape of Good Hope, according to intimations, thus giving to England a railway system in Africa of equal importance to that of the great trans-Siberian railway in and to Russia. England's interests and rapid developments in Africa seem to be outstripping those of all other European countries.

On Friday there was a strike declared by the Stereotypers' Union, of Chicago, and as a result the citizens of that great city were without dailies on Saturday morning. Coming at the time of the great battle of Santiago, when everybody was most anxious for news, the strike was certainly an exceedingly annoying one to the people, to say nothing of the loss to the press of that city in the enlarged sale of dailies. The stereotypers, whose union includes about 200 members, have been getting $3.25 for their day's work of eight hours. They demanded a day of seven hours and $4 pay. In case of working overtime they wanted 75c. an hour. These demands were presented to the publishers of the big morning dailies, and the latter immediately held a meeting and decided to refuse the demand. It was also agreed to stick together in the fight and not issue any of the papers unless all came out. This answer was conveyed to the officers of the Stereotypers' Union, and they held a meeting to determine their action. It was decided to insist on the demands, and the men were ordered out, and the city was left in intellectual darkness as to the outside world and the war news, as not even bulletins were to be seen at any of the daily offices. The papers affected by the strike were: Morning—The Tribune, Times-Herald, Record, Chronicle, Inter-Ocean; evening—The News, Post, Journal, Dispatch. The shut-out includes not only all of the papers printed in English, but the Staats Zeitung, the Frie Presse, the Abend Post and other German daily papers which use stereotype plates.

Admiral Camara is not having smooth sailing on his way to the Philippine Islands. The difficulties at Port Said, which he encountered, were numerous and discouraging. He asked for coal, but was refused. He then began to coal his ships from colliers from Spain, but was notified that he must stop. He was also told that he must leave Port Said, as the time-limit had expired. The Admiral then claimed that some of his ships needed repairs, under which plea he will endeavor to prolong his stay in that port. It is rumored that he will turn his torpedo boat destroyers back to Spain and proceed toward the Philippines with nine ships instead of twelve. It is also said that all of his ships are in need of repairs and in no condition to undertake the voyage to Manila. All the coaling stations along the way are under British control, and this alone would make the trip an exceedingly perilous one, to say nothing of the Indian Ocean storms at this season of the year. The United States Consular Agent, at Port Said, had bought up all the available coal thereabout, and thus lessened the Spanish Admiral's prospects of success. The Suez Canal tolls for his ships was also a staggering item for a bankrupt nation, and so withal it is not at all certain at this writing that the Spanish fleet under Admiral Camara will attempt to enter the canal.

Later word says that Admiral Camara coaled at sea, and has returned with his entire fleet to Port Safd, presumably to enter the canal.

The demand upon the Bureau of Engraving at Washington for adhesive stamps required by the new revenue law is something enormous. The requisition of collectors under the new tariff act approximates four hundred millions, and of this number about one-fourth were printed and shipped to the different states before the close of business on June 29th. The Director of the Bureau, Mr. Johnson, says that seventeen hundred employes are at work on stamps, and that work is continued day and night without ceasing. In one day, from eight to eight o'clock, 21,200,000 revenue stamps from new plates were printed besides imprinting one million postage stamps. And yet the demand for these war-tax stamps in the larger cities cannot be met, and much annoyance is experienced by many persons thereby. Owing to this inability to get stamps the authorities have been compelled to make some provisional arrangements so as not to interfere with important business matters too severely. But this difficulty will soon be obviated, and stamps can be conveniently had in any quantity wanted. In the meantime the treasury of the government is rapidly filling up with cash from the sale of these stamps.

OUR SPECIAL OFFER.

With the view of introducing the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to a large number of new readers, we are offering the paper from the time the subscription is received until the end of the present year for seventy-five cents. We earnestly solicit the active assistance of our old readers in making this offer known, and in extending our circulation. It is hoped that the new form in which we make our appearance this week will be acceptable to all our friends, and may be made the occasion by them of a special effort in its behalf.

PROSPERITY OF SOUL.

In his letter to "Gaius the beloved" the apostle John prays that his friend and brother may be prospered in all things and be in health "even as thy soul prospereth." What the apostle desired for his friend seems to us most desirable for all of us, namely, that our prosperity of soul should keep pace with our prosperity in material things. When this is not the case the soul is in great peril. If there be an abundance of physical health, and an increase of wealth and of power, without any corresponding growth and development of the spiritual nature, there is great danger of moral shipwreck. The reason for this is plain. With the increase of our worldly possessions there is an increase, not only of responsibility, but of temptation to luxury, to pride, to the inordinate indulgence of the appetites and to an undue attachment to material gain. Unless this temptation to evil is offset by spiritual increment, by the growth of spiritual forces, the soul is sure to be shriveled and to perish for lack of proper nourishment and care.

Most persons are much concerned about their earthly possessions, and whether their worldly condition is growing better or worse, but comparatively few are at pains to enquire into the condition of the soul and its possessions, and whether, on the whole, it is prospering or suffering loss. But on every consideration of reason and sound judgment spiritual prosperity is to be preferred to prosperity in material things. The man who is growing in faith and hope and love, in strength and symmetry of character, in moral and spiritual power, in the capacity to be useful in good works, is getting rich in a higher and nobler sense than one whose bank account is on the increase, whose stocks and bonds are advancing, but whose soul is starving.

It is amazing, when we stop to think about it, with what a small degree of spiritual prosperity many Christians are content, while the desire to increase material possessions is rarely satisfied. It is only truth to say that the average church membember is living a poor, cramped, starved spiritual life. He is groveling in the dust where he ought to be soaring in the empyrean. He is living on less than half rations, spiritually, whereas his soul might be feeding upon all the lucious fruits that grow in the garden of God, and delighting itself in fatness.

A recent author, writing on this subject, says: "We are not straitened in the Lord, but always in ourselves. The question of the prophet, 'O thou that art named the house of Jacob, is the Spirit of the Lord straitened (Micah 2:7)?' carries with it its own answer. It is always God's way to provide more than we can use. In the natural world He has given us a water supply that we can never exhaust; He has given sunlight for a thousand worlds like this; He has stored up an almost illimitable supply of electrical power which we are just beginning to tap; He has held in reserve new forces which we are just beginning to discover. His supplies are always ahead of our necessities. So in the spiritual world, only a small portion of what has been provided is being used up. The resources placed at our disposal do not grow less, however freely we may draw upon them. They are bottomless, they are infinite, they are eternal. What folly, then, to remain poverty-stricken and live poor, pinched, hunger-bitten lives, when there are unsearchable riches at our command! Why be content to eat the crumbs which fall from the Master's table when it is our privilege, as the friends of the King, to sit at His board and enjoy the bountiful banquet which He has prepared? Why remain in a condition of spiritual pauperism? living a hand-to-mouth sort of life, expending all our strength in the effort to keep ourselves alive, when the invitation is sounding in our ears, "Eat ye that which is good and let your soul delight itself in fatness?" Why be satisfied to suck a few drops of refreshment from the shrunken wineskins of a formal faith, when we may come to the fountain of life and drink our fill? What is required is, not an increased supply, but an increased capacity of spiritual reception. Nothing could be more out of place than the prayer, "Lord, increase our supplies.' And nothing could be more in place than the prayer, "Lord, increase our faith."*

It is in view of this condition of things and the relation of the soul's desire to its prosperity that the Savior said, "Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." It is the absence of this soul-hunger and soul-thirst that is the cause of so much spiritual leanness in the church. Too many are content with their worldly prosperity and do not realize their need of spiritual supplies. It was to this self-satisfied class of Christians that Jesus said in his letter to the church at Laodicea, "Because thou sayest I am rich and have gotten riches and have need of nothing and knowest not that thou art the wretched one and miserable and poor and blind and naked: I counsel thee to buy of me gold refined by fire that thou mayest become rich; and white garments that thou mayest clothe thyself and that the shame of thy nakedness be not made manifest; and eyesalve to anoint thy eyes that thou mayest see." Jesus means by this stinging rebuke that these lukewarm Christians of Laodicea should think less about their material gains and more about spiritual riches or the prosperity of the soul. The lesson is as applicable to many Christians in our times as it was to the members of the Laodicean church.

Our message, therefore, in this article, to all those who have been prospered in material things, is that they see to it that their souls also prosper. The proof of this prosperity will consist in their zeal for Christ and the church, and in their liberality and good works. "If thy riches increase," says an inspired writer, "set not thy heart upon them," but rather set thy heart on the Lord and upon the interests of his kingdom. So shall thy soul prosper, even as thou art prospered in earthly possessions. None of us could pray a wiser prayer than to ask the Lord that our worldly prosperity should never exceed the prosperity of the soul.

MORE ABOUT TEXAS.

Only two states in the Union have a larger number of church organizations than Texas, and these are Pennsylvania and Ohio. The religion of the Texans is of the good old-fashioned, orthodox variety. The Baptists stand at the head of the column, with 248,523 members. And the Baptists in Texas are but little like the people who bear this name in New York. Texas Baptists are the closest kind of close communionists. They decline to sit at the Lord's table with each other away from home; that is to say, a Baptist whose church home is in McKinney will not commune in a Baptist church in Dallas. Texas Baptists do not recognize baptism administered by any other than a regularly ordained Baptist minister as valid Christian baptism. This is the closest kind of close communion. Next to the Baptists, in numbers, are the Methodists. There are of this variety of Chistians in Texas 218,890. The Roman Catholics number 99,691. According to the last United States census report there are 41,859 Disciples of Christ in Texas. But there are Disciples and Disciples. More of this anon.

The Christians who call themselves and who are called Presbyterians number 37,811. Of Episcopalians there are 7,097, or were in 1890. Universalism and Adventism do not thrive in this climate; of the former there are but 514, and of the latter 773. There are only 112 persons in the state who plead guilty when charged with being Christian Scientists.

There are about fifty colleges in the state. Some of them are called universities. Add-Ran College, under the patronage of the Christian Church, is located at Waco. It has just closed its twenty-fifth session, one of the most satisfactory in every respect in its history. This institution was founded in 1873 as a private enterprise. In 1890 the proprietors made a donation of the school and its property to a board to hold in trust for the Christian Church in Texas. It was then located at Thorp Springs. On the second day of January, 1896, Add-Ran University began work in its new home at Waco. The Waco property is valued at $120,000. This is an excellent location for a school. It is an unusually healthy place. Its artesian wells and mineral waters are becoming noted. The Paul Quinn College, a school for negroes, and Baylor University, are located at Waco. The population of Waco in 1890 was 14,445. It is larger now. Add-Ran University reports annually to the "Texas Christian Missionary Convention." Much attention in this school is given to Bible study. On a railway train the catalogue of a military school was picked up. The Bible in that school is used as a text-book. Every person who pursues the prescribed course of study in this military school must study the Bible from the first chapter of Genesis to the last chapter in the book of Revelation. And this is in the state of Texas! It looks as if more attention is given to the study of our sacred literature in the Southland than is customary in other parts of the country. J. B. Sweeney is Dean of the Bible department in Add-Ran. The Disciple Christian Endeavorers in Texas are collecting a fund to be used in the education of young men for the work of the ministry. This amounts at the present time to about $3,000. It is loaned on long time and without interest. The brethren in Texas are justly proud of this school and of its work. There is before it a bright future. There is no discrimination, in this institution, based on sex.

The missionary convention held by the Disciples of Christ in McKinney the first week in June was a meeting of unusual interest and profit.

A. McLean represented the Foreign Christian Missionary Society; C. C. Smith was present as the representative of the American Christian Missionary Society; and Mrs. Persis L. Christian, of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. These added greatly to the interest of the convention.

Reports of work done under the auspices of the Texas Christian Missionary Convention were inspiring. Some of them were thrillingly interesting. The conclusions left on some minds by these narratives was that there is a heroism manifested in the Home Mission field closely akin to that of which we hear so much in connection with work for the Master in foreign lands. It was a privilege to be present when pledges were taken for the work of the next year. The Texas brethren know how to give. M. M. Davis presided over this part of the great meeting. The spirit was simply perfect. There was no pleading, coaxing, wheedling, badgering. Stories were not told to keep the people in a good humor. Jokes were not perpetrated. There was an apparent eagerness to give. The pledges were promptly and cheerfully made. As giving goes among us they appeared to be generous.

The fact ought to be noted that the Board of Church Extension was well represented by J. T. Ogle, of Missouri.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions occupied an entire day. The meeting was unusually profitable. There are sixty-five auxiliary societies in Texas, with a membership of eleven hundred. Two thousand two hundred dollars were collected last year. The Young Ladies' Missionary Circle of the First Christian Church, Ft. Worth, contributed $300. This is said to be the banner young ladies' society among the Disciples in the United States. The following are the officers of the Texas Christian Woman's Board of Missions: President, Miss Grace Carlton, Bonham; corresponding secretary and organizer, Miss Olivia A. Baldwin, M. D., Austin; recording secretary, Miss Leila Fort, Paris; treasurer, Mrs. J. M. Campbell, Van Alstyne; press superintendent, Mrs. Ida V. Jarvis, Ft. Worth; superintendent of children's work, Miss Bertha Johnson, San Antonio.

The following are the officers for the ensuing year of the Texas Christian Missionary Convention: President, A. S. Henry, Blooming Grove; vice-presidents, J. J. Cramer, Lockhart, and Plummer Harris, McKinney; secretaries, J. M. Campbell, Van Alstyne, and Philip F. King, Belton.

No little interest is felt among the Texas brethren in the mission to the Mexicans at Monterey, Mexico. M. L. Hoblit is the missionary. Miss Bertha Mason, daughter of the beloved J. C. Mason, of Houston, was associated with Bro. Hoblit in this work, but on account of her impaired health is no longer actively engaged. This work was begun at Cindad Juarez. Monterey, it is believed, is a better basis for an educational and evangelistic work among the Mexicans. "Go" is the name of a paper published in English in the interest of this work. The Mexican mission owns a printing-press, which it will use in spreading abroad the good news. A paper the size of "Go," called La Puerta Abienta, is published in the Spanish language. Brethren from the United States visiting Monterey are cordially invited to call at the mission, which is open every day from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M., at No. 50 Calle del Roble. This work is worthy of moral and financial support. It is a mission of the Chistian Woman's Board.

The Texas state Christian Endeavor convention was held in Dallas June 7-9. The Disciples were much in evidence in this convention. They are not anxious to have their names appear on the official program. They can be heard without that formality. But in Texas, in the recent convention, their names were on the program and were also seen in the list of officers. Having shown efficiency, their official positions are continued. The Cumberland Presbyterians have 108 societies in Texas, and the Disciples have 102. The Disciples are determined to be in the lead at the next convention. In our rally money was pledged, about three hundred dollars, to the Ministerial Education Fund.

It is estimated by intelligent and conservative brethren that there are not more than 25,000 Disciples in Texas. Some who were formerly with us are now pronounced Anabaptists. They are also anti-missionary. They refuse to have fellowship with those who desire to be known as Disciples of Christ, or Christians. We are not permitted to preach the gospel in their houses of worship. This privilege is granted to Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, etc., etc., but not to Disciples of Christ. The reason given is that the former are consistent, while the latter are not.

These notes would be unpardonably imperfect, if they failed to call attention to Carlton College at Bonham, and the Carr-Burdette College at Sherman. The former is conducted by the venerable and venerated Charles Carlton; the latter is conducted by Bro. and Sister O. A. Carr. Carlton College has been in existence for more than a quarter of a century. The Carr-Burdette has just closed its fourth session. These schools are for the education of young women. B. B. T.

Hour of Prayer.

THE DUTY OF REPENTANCE.

(Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, July 13.)

The times of ignorance, therefore, God overlooked; but now He commandeth men that they should all everywhere repent.—Acts 17:30.

This is a single statement from Paul's discourse before the idolatrous but cultivated Athenians. No amount of culture of mind or body, no amount of artistic skill, no height of intellectual attainment, precludes the necessity of repentance. At Athens idolatry and intellectual development were joined in the same people. Paul did not preach to them that they needed more art, more poetry, more literature, more intellectual development, but instead, that they needed repentance. The "unknown God" whom they ignorantly worshiped and whom Paul declared unto them was a God of righteousness and holiness, and inasmuch as all men everywhere have sinned, He commands all men everywhere to repent.

This word repent, in the sense in which Paul used it, was no doubt a new and strange term to these cultivated Greeks. The gods whom they worshiped were not of such a character as to create in man the conviction of sinfulness and the need of repentance. For this reason God overlooked much of the shortcomings in the Gentile world, but now that Christ had come into the world, revealing the true character of God and His will, their ignorance is no longer to be regarded as a shield for their moral derelictions, but all men are commanded to repent.

The repentance of the gospel implies at least three elements: a knowledge of God's will, a knowledge of one's own personal demerit and sinfulness, and a desire and purpose to turn away from the sins of the past and live in harmony with our knowledge of God's will and character. It was "repentance and remission of sins" that was to be preached to all nations, "beginning at Jerusalem." These are the two great key-words of Christianity. They look to the rectification of life and character, without which man cannot be at peace with God. It was a prominent requirement made known by Peter in that first sermon preached on Pentecost under the new dispensation. It has ever been and is yet an imperative demand upon all men who would come into a state of reconciliation with God.

It is evident from the very nature of repentance that its thoroughness depends upon the completeness of our faith or knowledge of God, and of our own spiritual condition. There are many Christians who need a more thorough repentance, because they are living a kind of life that is inconsistent with the highest attainable knowledge of God's will and character. As these Christians come to know God better and to see more clearly their own moral defects in the light of the high ethical standard given to us in the life of Christ, they will repent of many practices in which they indulge at present without any seeming conscientious scruples. Indeed, progress in Christian life consists largely in the clearer apprehension of God, and of our duty in the light of His character, together with the effort in our part to bring our lives up to the level of our knowledge of the divine will.

Repentance, therefore, is a duty that concerns Christians as well as those who have never named the name of Christ. As long as we are conscious of moral infirmities and of departurers in thought, word or deed from the perfect law of liberty, there will be need for repentance. The more carefully and conscientiously we enter into judgment with ourselves in the light of the gospel, the less need have we to fear the ordeal of that day in which God will "judge the world in righteousness by the Man whom he hath ordained." Let this hour of prayer, then, emphasize to us both the universality and the necessity of repentance and cause each of us to search our hearts and scrutinize our conduct that we may understand to what extent this duty of repentance applies to us.

PRAYER.

O Thou who art the Searcher of all hearts, and who knowest our sins and transgressions as we cannot know them, we thank Thee for the revelation Thou hast made of Thy character and of human duty. We thank Thee, too, for the grace of repentance by which we are enabled to turn away from the sins of the past and to receive forgiveness from Thee. We thank Thee, our Father, for the promise of remission of sins through the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord. Help us, we beseech Thee, as Thy children, to be continually growing in the knowledge of Thy will, and continually bringing our lives more and more into harmony with our knowledge of what Thy will is concerning us, so that at last we may prepare to dwell with Thee and the saints in light, where there is no need of repentance because there shall be no more sin forevermore. And this we ask in Christ's name. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

One of the things we prize about dear old Macatawa, now, is the familiar faces that we meet on our annual return hither. It is not a procession of curiosity-seekers and pleasure-hunters that come here, from year to year, but in the main those who come once come again, and the place grows on them from year to year. Already many of the well-known cottagers are on the ground, although the hotels, as yet, are meagerly patronized. Later on they will have all they can do. Among those whose names are familiar to our readers, already present, are Dr. H. W. Everest and wife, H. S. Earl and family, J. S. Hughes and wife, the family of W. F. Richardson, also the families of F. G. Tyrrell and Sydney Thomson. Brother J. H. Duncan and family, of St. Louis, are here and have rented one of the handsomest cottages in the park, fronting on Lake Michigan. The family of Bro. Smith, of St. Louis, son of our well-known Bro. B. H. Smith, of Canton, Mo., are also among the visitors here from St. Louis. Arthur O. Garrison, editor of the Pacific Christian, with his family arrived this morning from the Pacific Coast to spend the summer at Macatawa. His physician having advised him to escape the San Francisco climate for awhile on account of throat trouble, he was glad to accept our invitation to spend the summer at Edgewood-on-the-Lake, and we are glad to have the company and companionship of himself and wife, and of the little granddaughter, the patter of whose feet and the music of whose voice supply an element that was lacking in our home.

One contrast between Macatawa Park and the average city was quite noticeable on yesterday—the Lord's day. The stillness of Sunday was unbroked by the voice of the newsboy, crying the Sunday papers. By no possibility could a daily paper be secured anywhere on the grounds on yesterday. In these times of war when our boys are at the front and battles are imminent, and even in progress, one does feel some anxiety to at least look over the headlines of the news even in a Sunday paper. But we would gladly forego, forever, the privilege of hearing the news from our army and navy on Sunday, in order to escape the evil of the Sunday paper. One of the things that make an ocean voyage so restful is the absence of all disturbing and distracting news that comes from the daily paper. After a week or ten days spent upon the bosom of the ocean without even seeing a daily paper one feels no great mental impoverishment as a result of this abstinence. A few questions as to the most important news brings one up to date without any sense of permanent loss. No doubt there is a vast amount of precious time wasted in a too careful perusal of the daily papers. They are important, and we cannot dispense with them for at least six days in the week, but we can save much time and mental dissipation by reading them discriminatingly.

Chicago is a way station between St. Louis and Macatawa. We tarried there long enough to get a glimpse of its metropolitan life and to be impressed, as we always are, with the magnitude, the energy and enterprise of this marvelous city. We took time, of course, to call at the office of the Christian Oracle, and were pleased to find Dr. Kirkham looking in better health than for years past. The Oracle of late we think shows evidence of improved health and of consequent increased mental vigor on the part of the editor. We were glad to learn that sti prospects are brightening. We took time also to visit the university, where we were hospitably entertained for the night and part of a day in the home of Bro. C. A. Young, and where we also had the pleasure of meeting Bro. H. L. Willett. Bro. Young is studying hard and will receive his degree of Bachelor of Philosophy in the forthcoming convocation. While doing a great deal of outside work he has for years been steadily preparing himself for larger usefulness. Dr Willett is of course busy, although he had just completed his examination of his classses in the university. He is a man who knows how to make good use of all his time. He and his family go to Europe in the autumn. He reports that we have a number of very bright and promising young men at the university who are likely to be a credit to the cause they represent in the years to come. We also met Bro. Gates, pastor of the Hyde Park Church, and were glad to learn that the outlook for this congregation is full of encouragement. He is proving himself to be the right man for that work.

Questions and Answers.

How could Paul preach, as he did at Athens, that Jesus had been ordained to be the judge of the world, and that God had given assurance of this to all men by raising him from the dead, without preaching his death? It seems to me that if Paul omitted the death of Jesus, his declaration found in Acts 17:31 must have been wholly unintelligible to all his hearers. In this view of the case it is no wonder that the many mocked, but a great wonder that any "clave unto him and believed" as some did. What did they believe, if Paul did not preach so vital a point as the death of Jesus? B. F. Manire.

It is not probable that Luke gives us anything more than a brief synopsis or outline of the discourse which Paul delivered at Athens. There is enough given, however, to indicate the fact that Paul adapted his discourse to the condition and character of the people addressed. It is probably true that Paul did not lay as much emphasis, in this discourse, upon the death of Christ as he did in addressing the Jews, but we have never seen any reason to doubt the wisdom of his address at Athens nor its adaptability to the conditions under which it was spoken.

Does the minister who is chosen pastor of a church become an elder of the same without being elected by the congregation?

J. D. J.

The proper form of this question is, Do the pastor and the elder represent two distinct orders of the ministry in the local congregation? In other words, is the ministry of the New Testament church adequately represented by elders and deacons, or were there three distinct orders—pastors, elders and deacons? We take it that elders and deacons, or bishops and deacons, comprise the New Testament officiary. The term pastor does not refer to a distinct rank, but to an elder or bishop who devotes himself exclusively to the care of the flock. If this be correct, when a minister is selected as pastor of the congregation he is elected to its eldership or episcopate, and needs not a second election as if it were a distant office to which he was being called.

An elder in a certain church had gained the reputation of being dishonest and tricky in trade. His example had become a stumbling-block to those without. The pastor or minister of the church went to him and told him of his fault, whereupon the elder said he would have the pastor removed and went about the work at once; first attempting to circulate a petition to that effect and afterwards refusing to contribute to the church while the present pastor remained. The workers in the church are satisfied with their pastor. Should the preacher remain at the request of a majority of the members of the church, and what action should be taken against the men who circulated the petition? D.

An elder, or any other officer of the church, who would find fault with the preacher and seek to have him removed because he had discharged his duty in telling him of his fault, shows plainly by such action that he is unfit for the office he holds. If the facts show that the opposition to the preacher is based on such cause of offence, the majority of the church would do wrong in yielding to such opposition, and the preacher should remain at their wish to carry on his work faithfully in the fear of the Lord and not of men.

As to the men who circulated the petition, if they are content to abide by the action of the majority and continue their relation to the church they should be pardoned for the mistake they made, but the "tricky" elder should be required to vacate his office, and unless he reformed in his business methods should forfeit his standing as a member of the church. So it seems to us, at least, judging from the facts stated in the communication from which the question is taken.

by saying that "whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin" is, that he does not habitually or abide in sin, because that would be contrary to the seed of God abiding in him; but that even the children of God are sometimes overtaken in a fault, from which, however, they seek to recover themselves at once, because a life of sin is contrary to their renewed nature. In other passages in this same epistle John teaches that all men sin and need the advocacy of Jesus Christ the righteous, and the forgiveness of God.

Current Religious Thought

The Independent thinks the following from the Church Standard startling, yet true. And it is interesting and apt as well as "startling and true," we give it as quoted in the Independent, but without the Independent's comments. The Church Standard (Esiscopal) says:

Every catholic church is ipso facto Episcopal. Hence, the use of that word in the corporate name of our church is useless if the church is catholic, and its only purpose is to differentiate our communion, and so to emphasize our separation from Christian bodies which have not the Episcopate. Thus, like Protestant, the word Episcopal, as an ecclesiastical designation, is a word of division, and as such we dislike it. We go so far as to think that the Lambeth Conference committed a capital blunder in the tactics of conciliation when it made "the historic Episcopate" one of its four indispensable conditions of unity. If it had said the historic Ministry, that phrase would have meant the same thing, and while it would have been understood to mean the same, it would have been less objectionable to many non-Episcopalian Christians. In short, longing for and looking to the unity of Christ's church, which will come in God's good time, we cannot rejoice in the adoption by any church of any name or qualification which bears on its forefront the idea of division; and therefore we cannot love the name Protestant Episcopal.

Teunis S. Hamlin, D. D., has an article in The Independent, June 23rd, on "The Most Urgent Duty of the Hour," in which his perception of the same is expressed in these words:

The question of national concern, however, is, How shall we treat ourselves in this novel situation and in the face of this novel duty of loving our "enemies?" They will not suffer in person or fortune more than the exigencies of war imperatively demand; shall we suffer recklessly in our Christian character? Shall we relapse from a civilized to a barbarous temper? Shall we throw away our hardly cultivated good-will, filling its place with suspicion and enmity? It all depends on whether or not we hold ourselves to the lofty purpose of righting grievous wrongs and helping an oppressed race to that freedom which we believe to be the universal birthright of man. We must banish thoughts of revenge "Remember the Maine" must not be our battle-cry; not because that hideous wrong should not be righted—it should be, and shall be—but because revenge is a barbarous battle-cry; because the blows that it inspires fall indiscriminately, and, most of all, because it kills all Christian love in the hearts that cherish it. That love does not demand that we make war feebly; that we stifle our patriotism in apologizing for the vigor of our national conduct; that we belittle by a breath the righteousness and the majesty of our cause; that we feel the faintest touch of indifference as to which flag finally floats over the cruelly oppressed and the dust of the starved and otherwise murdered Cubans. But it does demand that we leave vengeance to God, while we strike only for righteousness and freedom, pitying the sorrows and loving the persons of those "neighbors" whom for a time we are most reluctantly obliged to count and call our "enemies."

The distinction between the transient and the permanent in religion is evidently becoming more apparent to the religious world, as witnesseth the following from The Christian Intelligencer:

The law of gravitation did not have its origin with Newton, nor the power of steam with Watt; but as revolutionizing science and mechanics, they are barely a century old. The same is true of much that pertains to religion. What may have been eternally present in the mind of God, what form the first has been in his written Word, becomes forceful and vitalizing only when truly understood and grasped, it has all the power of novelty. Being a living force, it necessitates a new adjustment, a fitting environment.

Because of this there is a transient as well as a permanent element in religion; and the condition of life for the church is a continuous adjustment of itself to modifications imposed by its own clearer apprenension of truth and its changed environment. The church only fulfills its mission when it keeps itself in harmony with the age in which it lives—as it chang[illegible] balance against this complicity with evil, but but were defeated. What then? Shall they, having been defeated, therefore relinquish all work for temperance in a place affording such wide opportunities for the dissemination of our principles? Such action would, it seems to us, be exactly in accordance with the enemy's desire. Such action would have made it impossible for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union ever to exist, for our Crusade mothers would have laid down their arms as soon as it became apparent to them that what they had striven for with herculean effort was not accomplished. "Where sin abounds, grace should much more abound." Because the licensed saloon is to be a feature of the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition, there is so much the more reason why temperance forces should gather there, and why the utmost should be done to offset the iniquitous work of that licensed saloon.

After all, when one considers the question carefully, is there not a splitting of hairs on these points? If the Government of the United States protects the saloons, and we are citizens of the United States, does it so much matter whether that licensed saloon exists in Alaska or in Chicago, at an exposition, or down a back alley? It is one people, one flag, one nation, and if we were to drive the liquor traffic out of every state and city in the Union save one, the fact that it existed in that one, under the protection of the law, would be a blot upon our nation's escutcheon, and so far as we were accessories to its existence, whether through silence or through vote, the blot would be upon us as individuals as well. Perhaps we need an occasional object-lesson of this nature to show us that one spot cannot be really clean until all are cleansed, that the degradation of one becomes the degradation of all.

Our duty as a people, and as temperance workers in particular, is not to sit down and bemoan defeats, but to rise from every defeat with a strong determination to fight the saloon in the stronghold of its power, the national government itself; and when we shall have won the battle, then exposition grounds, city streets and country lanes will be alike safe and free. And to our thought one of the best ways for carrying on this warfare lies in entering every open door, in going to the places where the power makes itself most manifest, and there by distributing temperance literature, by circulating pledge-cards, by delivering addresses, and by all other means fighting till the death.

If the Woman's Christian Temperance Union goes to Omaha, it will go there to hold up the white banner of temperance and purity. Who will say that it would be better for the Exposition, and for our nation as a whole, if we were to stay away? Let him who would say this be logical, and let the plan be at once unfolded for deporting the Woman's Christian Temperance Union as a body outside the territory of the United States! Doubtless it is a matter of great importance that the sale of liquor be prohibited in such places. Doubtless, also, it is a thing of infinitely greater importance that it be prohibited throughout the length and breadth of our country. To live in America without protest and refuse to work in Omaha because liquor is sold there, reminds one strikingly of the Master's words, "Ye tithe mint, anise and cummin, and omit the weightier matters of the law."

The close relation between present character and future happiness is quite aptly stated by The Advance in the following paragraph:

Many Christians seem to think that if they can only reach heaven, they will have gained all that the soul need desire. They are disposed to indolently take refuge in the plan of salvation, saying, "I cannot gain heaven by works, so I will trust in the saving merits of Jesus, and all will be well." It is true that the reward of the Christian is of grace, and not of merit, yet there is an individual work for each Christian to do, and his future happiness will be affected by the way in which that work is done. Heaven will be heaven to all who through God's abounding grace find entrance within the pearly gates, yet in a certain sense it will not be the same heaven to all. Nothing morally imperfect can enter there, all sin will be washed away, yet, in a certain sense it will not be the same heaven to all. The redeemed will enjoy as much of heaven as they have soul to enjoy, and no more. Enjoyment will be determined by the degree in which character has developed in this or that individual towards the perfection of Christ. But will not character and capacity be developed in the other world? Doubtless they will; but during the period of earthly service we should make attainment for service and happiness in heaven, as fast and as far as possible.

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION AS A FACTOR IN THE WORLD'S PROGRESS.*

MR. PRESIDENT, FRIENDS AND MEMBERS OF THE GRADUATING CLASS:—Gathered here as we are to-day, on this anniversary occasion, on a spot which, for half a century has been dedicated to Christian education, the one theme that suggests itself more naturally than any other, is that of Christian education as a factor in the intellectual and moral progress of the world. The theme is one that might easily lead us into a discussion of the condition of the world at the coming of Christ, and of the decadent civilizations which existed before the Star of Bethlehem rose on the world. But all that may be taken for granted before an audience like this, while we attempt simply to point out the fundamental relationship of Christian education to human needs, and to the highest development of the human race. My purpose is to emphasize the value, not simply of education, but of Christian education, as an essential factor in any scheme that looks to individual, social or national progress.

If we open our ears to the voice of history, and our eyes to the lessons inscribed on its pages, we shall not make the mistake, at the close of the nineteenth century, of supposing that an education which simply stands for intellectual development, meets all the essential conditions of human progress. The history of Greece, alone, stands as an everlasting refutation of such a theory. Intellectual development reached its acme in the days of Socrates, Plato and Aristotle; but with all her intellectual greatness, in art, in literature, in logic, in rhetoric and in philosophy, there was wanting the dynamic force which lifts up individuals and nations, and starts them forward on a new career of progress.

Roman civilization added, as its contribution to the solution of the great world-problem, the value of external power in an organized government, with its center of unity and authority, and the state as the embodiment of its morality and religion. But Rome, with all its political greatness, with all its wisdom in civil administration, and with all its conquering legions, failed to furnish the basis for an enduring and progressive civilization.

Judaism made its splendid contribution of monotheism as against the polytheism and atheism which prevailed among the other nations. It presented the lofty conception of the one true and living God, infinitely holy in character, and requiring righteousness among men. And yet Judaism had degenerated largely into formalism, and at its best lacked that life-giving quality which the world needed to set it forward on an upward career toward the table-lands of a higher and purer civilization.

At the confluence of these three ancient civilizations—Jewish, Grecian and Roman—and when each of them and all of them had failed to furnish the dynamic force to lift the world out of its moral decline, Christianity was born, and reached forth its puissant hand to lift up to a new order of life and growth the sinking peoples and nationalities of earth. Its power to accomplish this for any people or nation coming under its transforming power may be seen in the contrast between the condition of the Christian nations of the earth to-day and the condition of the world at the coming of Christ, or the condition of that part of the world to-day which is without the illuminating power of the gospel.

It would seem to be entirely relevant to an occasion like this to inquire, briefly, what it is that Christianity, permeating and dominating the higher forms of education, has done, and by its very nature is fitted to do, to accomplish this renaisance for the race. It is only as we come to apprehend clearly the power of the Christian ideal, in faith and culture, to do for humanity what nothing else had done or can do to enable it to realize the purpose of the Creator, that we are prepared to make the necessary sacrifices in its behalf. It is only in the light of these facts that we are enabled to realize the greatness of the men who, here and elsewhere, have laid the foundations for Christian institutions of learning, and out of such scanty resources as belonged to those pioneer days, made sacrifices to sustain them. It is only as these truths are present to our minds that we can give due honor to that splendid army of consecrated men and women who are devoting their lives to the cause of Christian education. A clearer apprehension on the part of Christian people of the relation between our Christian institutions of learning and the advancement of the kingdom of God would do much to quicken the zeal of the churches in the endowment of such institutions.

Coming, then, to the question we have raised, as to what we have a right to expect from Christian education, and what it has done and is doing to lift up humanity to higher levels of civilization, we summarize some of these things briefly as follows:

1. As we are indebted to Christianity for a new conception of human life, and a new interpretation of its meaning, so we are indebted to Christian education for the apprehension of this new ideal of character and the power to realize it in some measure. With the coming of Christ a new force entered into human history. This new and divine force has revolutionized the ideals of the past and has changed the current of the world's thought and life. It is the province of Christian education, therefore, to interpret to us the meaning of life and to furnish us high and worthy ideals. No education that leaves out Christ as the model of human character and ignores His sublime thoughts concerning God and man, and duty and destiny, is adequate to meet the needs of humanity. To the shame of our modern civilization it must be said that there are theories of education yet extant that either give to Jesus Christ an inferior and subordinate place or entirely ignore Him as having any essential place in the scheme of education designed to fit men for the solemn ordeal of life. Be it said to the everlasting honor of the pioneers who within this grove half a century ago laid the foundation of Eureka College, that they had no such false and inadequate conception of education. They believed that Christ was the splendid and majestic pattern of a perfect man, and the highest aim of culture was to fashion men in his likeness.

2. Christianity, entering into education as a transforming force, has transferred the emphasis from the material to the spiritual. No rational system of education can be formed without a true conception of man, the being to be educated. If man be an animal only, he requires one kind of education. If he be an immortal spirit, abiding temporarily in a material body, but destined to live forever, either in weal or woe, according as his character has or has not been conformed to the will of God, then this demands a very different kind of education. As Christianity furnishes us the only true conception of the nature and possibilities of man, so Christian education is the only education adapted to the needs of man. Civilization advances just in proportion as men learn to discriminate between the material and the spiritual, and to accord to the latter the superiority which belongs to it. The age or nation that is in bondage to the sensual and the material must necessarily occupy a low place in the scale of civilization until emancipated from the prison-house of its materialism.

3. By accentuating the worth of the individual soul and the inherent dignity of human nature, Christianity has fostered the love of liberty and the growth of democracy throughout the world. Hence, our free institutions, our civil and religious liberty, are the outgrowth of Christian education. The men who brought the seed-corn of civil and religious liberty from the Old World in the Mayflower, and planted it in the virgin soil of the New World, were not only Christian men, but they were men who knew the value of liberal culture. Hence, one of their first enterprises was to establish an institution of Christian learning, which became a mighty ally of the church in the ensuing struggle for national independence. This shows that the charge of other-worldliness, to the exclusion of the proper regard for the duties of this present world, cannot be justly made against Christian education. It has been the steadfast champion of human rights, and the uncompromising foe of tyranny and oppression in every form. The graves of Christian scholars may be found on every battle field of human liberty. The conception of manhood which Christ furnishes us is in utter antagonism to the wearing of chains, either on the body or on the mind.

4. By bringing the moral and intellectual natures into harmony, Christianity has developed a rotundity of character and a sanity of judgment and action, which has made for human progress and for the development of the highest types of individual character. As a kingdom divided against itself cannot stand, so as long as man's mental and moral natures are arrayed against each other, there can be no healthy growth and development. When the intellect and the conscience are seen to be different aspects of the same personality, and when they enter into co-operation and cease their war against each other, we have the highest and most satisfactory results in individual character, which in turn becomes the agent for social advancement. Nothing but Christian education can effect this union of man's intellectual and moral powers. Faith without knowledge may make a bigot; knowledge without faith fosters intellectual pride and gives a superficial view of life and duty. We must look to Christian culture to save Christianity from narrowness and sectarian bigotry, and secular learning, whether in science or philosophy, from superficiality, irreverence and gross materialism. Both science and philosophy have been and are yet to be of great value to Christianity, but it is only as they are mediated by Christian thought that they can be made to serve the advancement of the kingdom of God. Without Christian scholarship there must be an impassable chasm between religion on the one hand, and unsanctified learning on the other. Christian scholarship mediates between the two, passing over into the church whatever truth, science or philosophy may disclose, and imbuing science and philosophy themselves, with Christian faith. Thus by making Christianity more rational, and science and philosophy more reverent and Christian, the chasm between the two is bridged over or closed up, and the useless war between science and religion, Genesis and geology, faith and culture, is closed by a perpetual armistice.

5. In a word, are we not justified in saying, in the light of nineteen centuries of Christian history, that we are dependent upon Christian scholarship for the true interpretation of life's meaning and purpose, and of man's place in creation, for a right understanding of history as the product of a divine force acting upon the world; for knowledge of a proper relation between the material and the spiritual worlds; for the true province of reason in religion; for the ability to lay under contribution all the results of investigation in every department of human thought and research in order to the upbuilding of a diviner manhood and the extension of the kingdom of heaven on earth, and especially for the unveiling of those treasures of divine wisdom and knowledge, found in the ancient writings of inspired men, which must needs be translated and interpreted in the light of the times in which they were written? If this, indeed, be the high function of Christian scholarship, if it be thus vitally related to advancing civilization, and to the ongoing of the kingdom of God, you, indeed, have done well in gathering here to-day in these large numbers to celebrate the inauguration of this institution of learning. It is an event altogether worthy of celebration.

It often happens that events of far-reaching importance are concealed from ordinary view by what seem to be commonplace surroundings. Perhaps the sturdy pioneers who settled in this community a half century ago, whose brains conceived and whose hands executed the plan of building here an institution of learning, understood only in part the vast import of what they were doing. They believed in God, however, and in the omnipotence of truth, and inaugurated an enterprise the scope and power of whose influence, in all the years to come, neither they nor we who are here to-day could adequately measure. Let us do honor to-day to the names of Elder Benjamin Major, who is called the founder of the institution, together with E. B. Myers, Wm. Davenport, David Deweese, A. M. Myers, B. J. Radford, Sr., Elder E. Dickinson, Elder John T. Jones, Wm. P. Atterberry and R. M. Clark, who co-operated with him in the infancy of the enterprise. Nor let us to-day forget that princely man of God who, in its later struggles, sustained the institution with his liberal gifts and with his wise counsels, the beloved John Darst. It would be a grateful service, if time permitted, to call up here the long list of faithful teachers who have labored in the institution faithfully, on inadequate salaries, because of their supreme interest in the cause of Christian education. Perhaps we ought to mention here, in this connection, the names of P. H. Murphy, J. C. Reynolds, J. W. Butler and A. B. Murphy, who were connected with the founding of Abingdon College, which subsequently became consolidated with this, and whose children have become the adopted sons and daughters of Eureka College, entitled to all its rights and privileges. Whatever may have been the causes contributing to the consolidation of the two institutions, we can but rejoice to-day in the union of our educational interests in the state of Illinois, and in the reasonable hope which this unity inspires of a brighter future for our beloved Alma Mater.

A half century is not a long period in the life of an institution, but wonderful have been the changes wrought in the world, and in our own country, since the founding of Eureka College; but every one of these changes emphasizes the value to society, to the church, and to the nation, of an institution of learning like this. We can in no way so fitly honor the memory of the noble men, who laid the foundations of this institution, as by endowing it and equipping it, so that it may more worthily accomplish the work for which it was established. As a son of Eureka, by adoption, I offer my hearty congratulations to the friends of this institution, on the success that has attended their efforts, under the present administration of the college, to lift its burden of indebtedness and give it a more adequate endowment. In what has already been accomplished we read the prophecy of larger things in the years to come. What will the next half century do for Eureka College? Those who are permitted to attend the hundredth anniversary of the founding of the institution will, no doubt, see this campus filled with stately halls dedicated to Christian learning, and filled with the noblest youth of the land, who shall come hither for that mental and moral equipment which is so essential to success in life. There will then be a large corps of teachers and tutors, supported by a liberal endowment, and enabled to give their best thought and energies to the cause of Christian education. But the Eureka College of that day may have reason to look back to the Eureka College of this jubilee occasion with proud satisfaction and grateful remembrance for what this day has accomplished. May this bright jubilee be the harbinger of that brighter centennial whose program most of us here to-day will witness from the upper and unseen galleries, whence departed spirits witness the procession of human events.

Young ladies and gentlemen of the graduating class, I am sure you will excuse me if to-day I have taken some of the time which I owe to you in speaking of the past and the future of your beloved Alma Mater. You will never cease to feel the debt of obligation which you owe to this institution, for the new light and inspiration which have come into your lives since you have been students within its halls. You will leave behind you as you go forth, a prayer for its continued prosperity, and will not fail, I am sure, to do what may lie in your power to further her interests. You will not forget, young friends, that though you close your college life to-day, you are henceforth to be regarded in an important sense as representatives of this institution. In the circles in which you move, Eureka College will be judged, in a measure, by what you are and what you have accomplished. Institutions, like trees, must be judged by their fruit. As this institution has reason to be proud of the many sons and daughters she has sent forth in the past, it is safe to assume that she will have reason in the years to come to be proud of the class of '98.

I congratulate you upon entering the active duties of life at so interesting a time in the history of the world, and of our own country. It is a great thing to be an actor in the scenes that are now being enacted on the stage of life. It is a time of wonderful possibilities. You are to go out and take your places amid these stirring scenes, and to contribute your share to the progress of civilization toward that golden age which the prophets and seers of humanity have seen since the foundation of the world. You are to illustrate in your lives the value of Christian education. Your choices in life, the tasks you assume, the spirit in which you prosecute them, the helpfulness of your lives to other lives about you, the inspiration of your example, the movements which you approve and disapprove, the causes you espouse, your continued progress or lack of progress in the knowledge and in the development of character—all these will be exponents to the world of the value of Christian education. Above all, your relation to Jesus Christ, and your success in following his sublime example of unselfish service to humanity, and of dauntless heroism in the defence of right, will be the standard by which your Alma Mater, your fellowmen and the great Judge of all will at last measure you. It is a part of the responsibility that rests upon you to refute the charge that is sometimes made against education, that it tends to create a chasm between the educated and the great uneducated masses, and to create a disrelish for that personal contact with the needy and the untaught, which is so essential to their elevation. If you have, indeed, caught a vision of the Christ, as the highest exemplification of exalted manhood, your education will but qualify you for ministering in more manifold ways than you otherwise could, to the needs of our sinning and suffering race. It is yours to show that Christian education, whatever may be true of an education that is not Christian, strengthens the bonds which bind men into a common brotherhood, and deepens the sense of mutual obligation of each to each, according to every one's ability. It is in your power to correct, to the extent of your personal influence and acquaintanceship, the misapprehension that there is anything in scholarship to antagonize faith in God, and in the eternal verities. If men have sometimes been educated out of their faith, it was because the education itself was fundamentally wrong. The ripest scholarship and the most childlike faith are often found together in the same person. It is only a "little learning" that is a "dangerous thing," and that little of the wrong kind.

The President, representing the College, will speak to you words of advice from your Alma Mater; it is only for me, as representing the larger outside community which you are about to enter, to welcome you as re-enforcements, armed and equipped to help us in the conflict of right against wrong and truth against error. May every one of you prove to be a valiant and efficient soldier in the army of righteousness. May you so fight as to win the approval, not only of your Alma Mater and of your fellow-soldiers in the great conflict, but as one by one you lay down your armor here, and pass onward and upward to another and higher sphere of action, may you receive the divine approval of Him who, in the stress and storm of life's struggles, has been your guide and inspiration.

Citizens of Illinois, Friends of Eureka, fifty years of history are looking down upon you to-day! The spirits of that heroic Company, who in faith and hope laid the foundation of this institution, must be among the unseen witnesses of this day's events. Stirred by the heroic memories of the past, and animated by the bright hopes of the future, may you achieve a victory here to-day that shall—

"Tell on ages, tell for God!"

PROTRACTED MEETINGS.*

D. R. DUNGAN.

It is doubted by some as to the good resulting from efforts of this kind. The abuse has entailed discredit upon them. Churches have been trained to live on the extra interest of these occasions. And when the meeting is over and the revivalist has gone, the Holy Spirit seems to have boarded the same train, and the church has no power left. The converts have been made largely to the revivalist; many have joined the meeting; they were swept off their feet by the occasion and the excitement. To join the church became the thing to do, and they joined the multitude. But after the enthusiasm has died out they see there are no grand evidences of spiritual uplift; they do not feel the elevation which they experienced during the revival; the assistance which they had a right to expect from those who were in Christ before them is entirely wanting, and they become discouraged and fall away, or become lethargic, and the church dies and sinks by its own weight. Many a church has gone up like a rocket and come down like a stick, leaving the space all the darker by virtue of the over brilliancy which had just preceded. Many a pastor, too, who was doing a good work before the meeting, has been counted out by the evangelist. He has poured out the stream of all his spiritual intelligence, and the converts especially are left to pine for the great preacher and the joyous time when Brother B. was with them.

If a church has been trained to live from this abnormal excitement it will be but a few years when nothing less than a spiritual whirlwind will seem to be of any avail. The work necessary before success with such a church will be its conversion. Their holiness is irregular, and they seem to be sanctified only in spots.

But we have given the unusual, the extreme; the abuse and not the use of protracted meetings. No revivalist should be employed, as a rule, who is candidating for a pulpit. He will have too many opportunities to suggest a change in the pastorate of that congregation. While most preachers are above anything of the kind, there are others who are at home in the body, and are of the earth. The preacher himself has no right to give everything into the hands of an evangelist; he should be at the helm all the time; he should take the confessions and do the baptizing, and it should be the object of the revivalist to make the pastor stronger with his people than ever before. The church should know the difference between the pet sermons which have been prepared for these occasions and delivered a large number of times, and the regular draft work of their faithful minister. And the preacher for such a people should have given them a better way, something more enduring than this fluctuating sensationalism. Religion, which is a life, not simply a heated or a sweetened atmosphere, will live. Unction and zeal and pathos are good, but if it cannot be seasoned and salted so that it will stay and be a living power, it is good for nothing.

There is still another objection to protracted meetings; the expense. There are many churches which are unable to pay an evangelist and maintain their regular work. This, however, is rarely insurmountable. If that church has a pastor for all, or even a part of the time, the arrangements can be made without the increase of expense for the meeting, and if they have not been able to support a pastor any of the time, the means will have to come from some other source. It is a missionary field.

It is said sometimes that we have a good pastor, but he has been here a good while and the people would not turn out to hear him in a series of sermons. This is basing the hope of success entirely on the attractions of the pulpit. But the success of the meeting should depend, at least one-half, on the work of the members. And that good pastor is just the man to bring about that organized effort which will insure success. It might be well, however, to exchange his time in a meeting somewhere else for help of the same kind, end in that way a new man would be found for each place. There would be but a few dollars in that case of extra expense, and they could be gathered during the meeting, which would not otherwise find their way into the church coffers.

A more serious objection comes from the condition of some communities which prevent the people from attending any meetings at night during the week. There are churches in many of our cities where not only the church members, but the people generally, especially the men, are employed as clerks, as merchants, or are in business, in which their time in the evening is required. The large number of them are not at home till seven o'clock and could not be at the church for an hour later. In the morning they are up at six, and they feel that their rest at home is a question of life or death. They must have their rest or arrange for their funerals. I feel that there are hindrances from this source in places. Though the members might make this sacrifice, the men they hope to reach would not, and so the meeting would go on without any results in the way of gain to the membership. The trouble is in such places to work up the interest to the point of bringing out those busy men who are not already Disciples. This can many times be done by a united effort of preacher and people.

I am ready, therefore, to conclude that while there are difficulties in the way, there are none that are insurmountable. And in the large number of places there is nothing in the way unless it is the indifference of the people who are already in the church. Of course non-members are not going to take much interest in such matters unless the church leads the way. In fact, a revival can hardly be said to have begun till the church members begin to work. But if there are a few places where a meeting of this kind will not accomplish good, they are the exception and not the rule. Nine churches out of ten could hold protracted meeting with good results. And my opinion is that all could.

It is in order now to ask what are the benefits of such efforts? If there are no evils which cannot be avoided and all can hold them, still it is a question as to their value.

1. In the first place, it is an opportunity to teach the people "what be the first principles of the oracles of God." If the pastor in his regular Lord's day ministrations should give them the teaching which even the members need, it would be regarded as tame, and it would be said that these doctrinal sermons are not called for; that not one in ten of the congregation was in need of the instruction. Perhaps that is not true, but the effect is the same; the preacher has to give them something else till a large part of the congregation do not know the difference between God's way of saving sinners and the human plans which have come in to take the place of the things which Christ commanded, and the people are left saying, "Lord, Lord," but do not his will. During the meeting, however, and especially if the preacher is some other than the pastor, this teaching will be relished, and the strangers who do not know the gospel will have an opportunity to learn.

2. In the second place, the people can be held to the study of the subject long enough to get it fixed in their minds, not only that they ought to be Christians, but how to become Christians. Those who come on Sunday, and if they are yet in the world, they will not come regularly enough to retain very much of the New Testament in any consecutive way. They may get some kind of nebulous knowledge of divine things, but like star-dust it will require a long time for such adhesion of particles that you can see that there is likely to be a new body brought into activity.

3. There are a great many men so imbedded in business that it requires a flood to wash them out; you seem to have to undermine the bank in which they are covered and let them drop in. Some one will be ready to say, "Well, how will you keep them afloat afterwards? Of course the torrent will subside a little, and the interest will abate somewhat when the meeting has closed, but if you manage to keep them in the middle of the stream for awhile they will go on well enough. I know that some of this sap-rotted timber may lodge on the sand-bars, but a great deal of it will come through all right enough.

A third question is how to make protracted meetings of greatest usefulness in the Master's cause. This is a study that is worthy of the best talent of the age. In my opinion, all the bad results of protracted meetings are due to bad management. There may be comparative failures, without anything in the arrangements or in the execution, deserving criticism. The elements may be indisposed, storms, floods, cyclones, or as it is many times other matters of interest come up which could not have been foreseen. Usually, however, the meeting should go right on till these oppositions give way.

In the first place, the church should be in working condition. If the meeting has to be held to convert the church, the time and strength are wasted and but little accomplished. On the other hand, if all are ready and begin at the first, the work will soon go forward, and soon will the ripened grain be brought in.

Some have accomplished a good deal by committees. I must say that I never yet received much help in that way. You can not accomplish by machinery what has to be done by the piety and faithful work of all the church. You can not so sharply define work that you can ever know what belongs to this one and what to that one. And it would be a great weakness if you should. I have known a committee on shaking hands with the people—a kind of "smilem-up" committee; another on prayer, and another on distribution of tracts, and so on to the end, if there is any end. If the people have been so trained that they will do one thing and nothing else, it may be the best, but it is a pity that they have been trained in that way. It reminds me of the man who had an understanding with his wife that all the affairs of the house were under her control, while he would give himself to business considerations. One day while engaged in his office, a runner announced to him that his house was on fire. He said, "Tell my wife, that department comes under her supervision!" That was a fine division of responsibility, but common sense would have done better. If cottage prayer-meetings are held during the meeting, it will be well enough to have a committee to find the places where they may be appointed and to assist in looking after the attendance at these meetings, another on advertisement; but still better, if the whole congregation should be an advertising committee, hand-shaking and invitation committee. I have no objections to the effort at this kind of organization, and yet for many years' observation I am not able to say that I have found much help in this way. If the church is all alive in the work, the preacher can easily get all the help he needs, and he is ordinarily the best committee on prayer-meetings during the revival.

Up to this moment I have never known a preacher who depended largely on the kind of organization I have mentioned who was much better than a failure. Depend rather on the piety and willingness of your people to work, know what is needed and then direct the whole affair as you proceed.

The time has something to do with the success or failure of protracted meetings. If you are in the country, aud it has been wet for a long time and the farmers have a chance at last to get into their fields of corn, you can depend on it that they will be more interested in getting the fox-tail out of their fields than in the revival. So, too, in our cities, it is hard to start a meeting during the holidays. And yet, if we are waiting for everything to become perfectly favorable, we will not have a meeting. The farmer who constantly counsels with the moon and the clouds rarely has his bins full of grain. And the church can be indulged in the waiting for a good time to come until there will be found no time which will be exactly suitable, and protracted meetings will never be held.

What to preach during the meeting depends on the needs of the people. Some one says that we do not now preach so much on first principles as we did once, and our success is a great deal better. They forget that the people now listen to us because we have large numbers and much wealth, whereas when we were but a few, they could afford to despise us and neglect the meetings. The conditions much more than any change in the matter of sermons, give us a hearing. I should say from first to last, give the people the gospel of Christ. It alone is the power of God unto salvation.

If we preach as Christ did, as the apostles did, we will give offense. We can not help that. Men must know that they are sinners, they must know that Christ is the only Savior, that to be saved we must accept of the Christ and do his will. We must preach this same gospel without apology.

I recommend that a prayer-meeting be held in the church as well as in a nnmber of houses. If you cannot have this meeting at ten or eleven, have it at seven in the evening, and let this be a time for the building up in piety and devotion of those who have lately become Christians. You will come from such service prepared for better work in the pulpit. Acquaint them with the work of a soldier, and then there will not be much danger of any falling away after the meeting is over.

A good leader of song will be a great help. You can sing truth into people as well as preach it to them. I have no objection to a large number of good singers being on the platform, but what is known as a choir is rarely of much value during a protracted meeting. Provide books and get all to sing if possible. A good solo singer is a great preacher of the gospel. The people do not only hear the noise but hear the words, and are thrilled with the sentiment.

Be importunate. Ask the people again and again to accept of Christ. If you make the sermon thirty minutes in length, and to the point, make everything clear so far as you go, you will still have time for several invitations accompanied with songs. I have known strong men to come at the third or fourth invitation, who would have gone from the house without any acceptance of the Savior, and business preventing, would not have been there again durirn the meeting. Or if he should come again, the influence of that occasion would be lost, and he would go back again into his former lethargy and never become a Christian. There is a squeamishness in in such matters not born of piety or earnestness in the salvation of souls.

Last, do not stop the meeting too soon. That is the great mistake and the most common one. One or two weeks may only get up a little interest, and because some are getting tired the managers get togother and decide to stop the meeting, just at the time when they could have begun to harvest the ripened grain.

PATRIOTISM.

[The baccalaureate services at Butler College, June 19th, were probably the most impressive that have ever been held in the forty-three years' history of that institution. President Butler's baccalaureate sermon on "Patriotism" is regarded by those who heard it as one of the greatest addresses, both in elevation of sentiment and in elegance of style, ever delivered in the college chapel. The large audience was lifted to the highest enthusiasm and inspired with the deepest devotion. The whole address ought to be published as a piece of classical patriotic literature. Below is given an abstract which appeared in the Indianapolis News.

J. D. FORREST.

Irvington, Ind.]

Society, though made up of innumerable atoms, is one whole. Civilization, through the changing product of changing conditions, is not some wild whirl of star-dust drawn in erratic course through interstellar spaces. Civilization holds relation to a central sun of truth and answers to universal law. There is a moving, a transforming, force in the world. We cannot read its meaning in a day; scarcely in a thousand years shall men be able to note its progress. What wonder if there be those that doubt? Strange destiny is ours. Man's brief span of life seems to hold so little, and that little so weak, so purposeless, so futile. But this thought saves: We are part, not of the brief present only, but part are we, too, of all the past, and of the future years, how many soever God's purposes contain. In this way: Humanity's progress is an unresting march. Men fall by the way, and other men are born to take their places, and these, too, die and others, and yet others, succeed them, and no man that lives knows the beginning, nor shall any see the end. And yet, because humanity is one, because the life of the individual is inseparable from the life of the race, because the soul's breath is in the universal world spirit, therefore he that is false to the social instinct, that rejects society, that refuses to have faith in civilization, that separates himself in unbelief from the struggles and the hopes and inspirations of his kind, he is guilty of most heinous crime; he sins against himself, he violates his own nature, he assails his own soul. Disloyalty to society is, therefore, disloyalty to self. Denial of the ascension progress of humanity is denial of determinative destiny for one's own soul.

WHAT IS CIVILIZATION?

Do we speak of the past as perished and say of its civilization that it was corrupt, that it had in it the seeds of inevitable decay? That its movement was ever deathward? So far, true. The sands of the desert have buried ancient Egypt; Phœnician cities in undistinguished ruins are covered by the unbetraying seas, or overgrown with the rank verdure of neglect. Greece is dead. Rome's treasures are sunk in Tiber's muddy bed, or laboriously collected and conjecturally labeled, are exhibited in antiquarian museums to inanely curious sight-seers. So far the past is as if it never had been. But this is not civilization. Civilization is not pyramid; it is not Parthenon. No more is civilization, steam, or electricity, or Bessemer steel, or product of electrochemistry. Neither is civilization a microbe. Civilization is thought—the same from the beginning—it sleeps; it never dies. Spiritual force it is that guides the world—God's Spirit. Let me explain myself in terms of the nineteenth century. In the realm of mortals, too, prevails the principle of survival of the fittest. Achievement destitute of high moral quality is short-lived; it perishes from the earth and from the memory of man. That survives that is of the nature of higher truth; that is, of God. And though in any age men's conceptions and acts are their own, thus does God rule in history—thus does his Spirit rule through man's spirit. This spiritual survival is the world's possession, and it unifies humanity to the end of time.

And yet, this were a cold and insufficient definition of patriotism. Patriotism means this; but it means more. It always meant more. For you to-day it means more than it ever meant for man before. What is it, then? What is it to you? Patriotism is love of country. But what does country mean? One thing to one, another thing to another, according to quality of mind and range of experience. To all it is, at bottom, a sentiment rich and full. This is elemental patriotism, the patriotism that is of the soil. The heart clings to its own. It may be barren rock in desert lands. * * * * For whether it be cold north land or sunny south; whether it be high mountain ridges, swept of winds that blow around the world, or whether it be deep valley beside still-flowing river, the heart loves its own—is in thrall to it. However long a man live and however often in later life he changes abode, I believe that he will know but one home, and that he will know that always. Who has not awaked from dreams to find that in spirit his rest had been within the wall that early sheltered him? Hard, then, it is to square one's wandering consciousness with present bearings. Such power has association.

What does patriotism mean? Why, earth, mother-earth, seems to enwrap us in her incense-laden breath; the very sod on which we rest seems to heave with the pulse of life; the beech trees, heavenward mounting, reached down benedictions on us from their drooping branches. We love our country because it is our country; because it is part of us; because the very juices of its soil seem to tingle in the blood that courses in our veins.

This is elemental patriotism, the patriotism of sentiment, the patriotism of passion—God has made us that way. Grand passion! Nature gives it to us—to all of us; none so mean as not to feel its dignity; none so proud as not to be ennobled by its possession. But though the basis, the soul, the inspiration of all true devotion to country, such feeling has its limitations. It is personal; it has to do with immediate belongings. It is short-sighted, it is sectional.

GIVE BACK THE CONFEDERATE FLAGS.

We older ones remember how a few years ago this question tried many earnest souls. viz., whether patriotism was sectional or national. They that fought for state against the National Government yielded to a sentiment misleading them, though noble always. Give back the flags. War's justification is that strife should end in peace. We fought to make our country one. Without oneness of heart and mind and purpose, North and South, our victory were vain. The union of these United States purports to be in humanity's cause and for God's high purposes—a union of brotherhood and love. So long as there remain on the one side boasting and on the other side bitterness, so long the fruit of victory is unrealized, our high profession is but hypocritical mouthing our union is false and unnatural. The brave and generous judge an honerable opponent fairly. We whom in the days of the civil war the better fortune favored in that with us loyalty to state meant loyalty to nation, we may not unduly boast the superiority of our civic virtue. It might have been otherwise with us. I make no doubt that if Indianapolis had been Atlanta, beset by Federal invaders, many a Hoosier soldier that marched with Sherman to the sea had died in rifle-pits around the line that the Belt road these years has held for commerce; if Pogue's run had been Peach Tree Creek, it had so rushed red with blood of Indiana's sons, arrayed in deadly war against the general government, that not all the sewage of all the cities of the earth could ever defile its sanctity.

We of this section may only thank God that in our country's fratricidal strife patriotism for us ran in the line of the higher duties of citizenship, ran in the line of his eternal purpose.

The men of the sixties in their day and generation did their part—they made us one. A third of a century has cemented our union and enriched us in material resources. God, from the beginning, did the rest for us, for he made us a people quick to fight, strong in battle and of profound ethical convictions. He has further work for us. Yesterday we were content within ourselves; to-day we are face to face with world-problems.

OUR FLAG MUST STAY IN MANILA.

For some of us who are here to-day youth began with the drum-beat and tramp of armed men. Since then the peaceful years have lengthened out till now again our times are fallen on war. What does it mean? To my ear the guns that from Manila Bay sent their echoes around the world were God's own trumpet-tones summoning his people out of its isolation into the broad arena of the world's great life—and that, not for dominion, not for possession, not for power, but for humanity's cause—for the world—extension of that principle of justice which our governmental theory embodies. The summons has come to us unsought. We began a fight to drive the dechristianized civilization of the sixteenth century out of the Western Hemisphere; we find our standard planted on the other side of the globe—it has to stay there. Does that mean larger navies; increased armament; an isthmian canal; a chain of possessions reaching round the world? Does it mean imperialism?

Whatever it means, it is not our doing; it is destiny; it is God. Young men, I want to say for myself—and now while I shall speak in the first person, please to understand me as speaking for the generation I represent—I want to say that while as I trust I appreciate this greater glory of my country and my people, yet I have to confess it, amid these preparations for war that we have been witnessing, my heart has been filled with sadness—not for precious treasures that must be spent—not for brave men that must suffer and must die—not for heart of womankind that must be anguish-torn—none of these; but when I look on the generation of my countrymen born and brought to manhood since time when we that were boys in the sixties made our fight for country and for God; when I see their serried ranks of stalwart forms, and under the slouch of brown hats catch the gleam of bright eyes; when I look along the lines of glistening steel and in the distance catch the undimmed glory of the banner that they bear—God help me, how could I but feel sad—to think that my life lies behind me—to think that while these, the men of the twentieth century, march on, proud vanguard of their country's greater glory, I can only dream my senile dreams and feel the heart-aches that women feel that wait.

Love the land that gave you birth. Is that our own section here of these United States? Nowhere shines the sun on fairer. God made it from lake to river, from mountain to "Father of Waters," made it broad, plain, sloping hillside, forest and field, and clear water course—to be the home of a prosperous civilization, of a strong, a brave, a generous people. That people you may well be proud of.

But you will love your country, then, your whole country, the union of the United States, America, for the luster of her name, for the glory of her arms, for her greatness, her power, her beneficence.

But more than that—love your country for her high aims. Love her because in her are centered humanity's hopes. Love her because among the nations of the earth to-day, she it is that stands for eternal right and justice. If to her lofty purposes you be true, so shall you be true even unto God.

Our Budget.

—Great naval victory at Santiago Sunday.

—Great convention at Nashville this week.

—Great news from Santiago on Independence day.

—Smaller pages makes the demand for shorter articles more urgent.

—If you want to read some classical patriotic literature turn to the extracts of President Butler's address in this paper.

—The Jamaica Letter in this paper, coming from a country so near one of the centers of the present war, cannot fail to be of interest to our readers.

—F. M. Green, of Kent, O., furnishes us an excellent report of the Hiram commencement this week. It is somewhat lengthy, but the interest of our Ohio readers and others will not falter in it to the end.

—The New England Messenger, edited by R. H. Bolton, Everett, Mass., is a model magazine for condensed news. It shows that correspondents can say much in a few words when they try.

—The Orphan School Record, Fulton, Mo., for June, is a fine compliment to the young ladies who have contributed its literature and to the school it represents. If freed from its debt this school would soon become a great factor in the intellectual and moral welfare of the church and people of this great state.

—The New York Voice rightly insists that if the United States, maintaining its present form of popular government, is going to enter upon a new career of wider dominion and vaster territorial possessions, some political change must be made. If the saloon power is to be continued and the new territory to become simply new fields for corruptionists then our territory is already overgrown. But, if we can have just and equitable laws, strong and pure municipal and state governments, and a sound and sufficient circulating medium, the addition of a few thousand square miles will not be so hazardous.

—It will be conceded without argument that the educational interests of our country are of the foremost importance. They may not be greater than our commercial, agricultural and religious interests, but they cannot be less, and yet our government is not giving that equal portion of its attention to our National Bureau of Education which it seems to merit. We are all familiar with many of the national bureaus, but of the National Bureau of Education many, doubtless, have not so much as heard. We do not expect the government to champion any of our religious movements, although it might profit by a closer acquaintance with them, yet such is not its attitude toward our schools. It has made the plea of the popular education of its citizens one of its pillars and cannot afford criminal negligence in that direction as we fear has been the case, judging from the facts set forth in an article found elsewhere in this paper from the pen of Prof. J. Fraise Richard, of Washington, D. C. This article was written for the Washington Post, but is of such importance that we give a portion of it space in our columns this week.

—Our C. W. B. M. is to co-operate with the Y. M. C. A. of Virginia in the support of a three months' course of Bible study at the University of Virginia during the sessions of 1898-'99. The third course in this Bible study is to be given by Charles A. Young, of Chicago, beginning October 5th. This course contemplates fifty lectures. In view of the added expense of the new work the C. W. B. M. have appealed to their auxiliaries in Virginia and elsewhere to assist by increased contributions, and new liberal subscriptions for this work. Also to solicit from individuals and churches donations to the permanent endowment fund of the University of Virginia Bible Lectureship. The expenses up to a maximum of $750 will be met out of the English Bible Chair Fund; but the C. W. B. M. has assumed the entire responsibility of the three months' Bible course at the next session of the University and will need liberal assistance.

—In the absence of the editor-in-chief of this paper the office editor is responsible for the appearance of his half-tone picture on our first page this week. In view of the fact that this is the first paper in our new form it seems appropriate, and we believe it will be appreciated by our readers. W. W. H.

—A timely suggestion:

Bills come due in the summer just as in the winter. No business man lets his notes go to protest simply because trade is dull. Church members who go away for the summer and never think of paying their church debts until they return double the burdens of the pastor, the treasurer, the janitor. Just remember this, and pay before you go. True, also, of newspaper bills.—The Standard.

—The indifferent attitude toward religion on the part of a large number of our young men is tersely told in the following published dialogue supposed to be of recent date:

"What's yer religious persuasion?" said the sergeant to the recruit.

"My what?"

"Yer what? Why, what I said. What's yer after o' Sundays?"

"Rabbits, mostly."

"'Ere, stow that lip. Come now, Chu'ch, Chapel, or 'oly Roman?"

"I ain't nowise pertickler. Put me down Chu'ch of England, sergeant; I'll go with the band."

—The Missionary Intelligencer for July speaks encouragingly of the offerings for Foreign Missions so far this year. There has been a loss from bequests of $5,601.40 during the eight months of this year compared to the same period last year. But this shortage is more than supplied in the gain of $6,646.33 from the regular receipts from churches, Endeavor Societies and schools, and a gain of $4,800 from annuities. This is encouraging.

—The writer of an obituary of Sherman D. Reeder, who died at Stockton, Kan., failed to sign his or her name. Will the writer please supply the information wanted?

—Through the efforts of President B. C. Hagerman—who has resigned the presidency of Bethany College to accept the presidency of Hamilton College, Lexington, Ky.—$30,000 of the $100,000 endowment fund necessary for Bethany College has been raised.

—Churches taking up a special collection for a specific purpose, such as Home Missions, Foreign Missions, or other definite end, should not fail to forward all moneys so raised to the proper treasurers. To use this money for any other purpose than that for which it was raised, on the part of those into whose hands it passes, such as paying up old pledges, or for current expenses, without the order of the people by whom it was given, would be a species of deception.

—We acknowledge the receipt of the catalogue of the Nebraska State Normal and Training School, at Peru. It is a magazine of 54 pages, three full-page pictures of the buildings, and a full outline of courses of study. The students' roll shows it to be a well-attended, popular center of learning.

—We don't wonder that W. A. Jarrell, a Baptist minister of Texas, wants to emigrate from that state, when one of his own church papers, The Baptist Standard, says: "He has been known for years as a blown-in-the-bottle, dyed-in-the-wool, uncompromising, 18-karat, knock-down-and-drag-out Landmark Baptist. His ecclesiastical diet has been aboud as follows: For breakfast, Campbellite on toast, Presbyterian dressing; for dinner, Congregationalist bullion, Episcopalian fricassee and Methodists a la J. R. Graves; for supper, Lutherans cold, with Y. M. C. A. sherbet;" and the Christian Courier comes at him from another quarter, describing him as "a stalwart of the stalwarts among strict-construction-unbroken-chain-succession-anti-alien-immersion-anti-Whitsitt Baptists." We should think it about time for him to move. Grape and canister from two ways at once ought to make almost any man willing to move.

—President Jones now claims to lack but $14,000 of having funds enough to meet the debt of $30,000 now threatening the Orphan Schoool at Fulton, Mo., and urges the churches and preachers to rally to its support by subscribing for the lack, at once.

—Should the responsible position at the head of the procession of Christian Endeavor ranks ever come to the Christian Church by natural law in the spiritual world, well and good; but let us not betray a selfish, sectarian spirit in seeking the place by committee strings and religious noises.

—Optimism or Pessimism Illustrated is the theme of the Chicago Letter this week. The field on either side is amply large enough for the full activity of the largest mind during the longest life, but to become wholly committed to either side is a dangerous mistake. Every man should be optimistic enough to prevent discouragement, and yet pessimistic enough to see and rebuke sin in high places. Try to properly proportion these two unknown quantities in your nature or forces in your character.

—In the way of a rebuke for dereliction of duty in the taking and reading of a good church paper we have seen nothing better, more pungently pointed than the following from the Pacific Christian:

"What Christian paper do you take?"

"None."

"Why?"

"Hain't time to read one. Take more papers now than I can read."

"When and where is our next state convention?"

"Don't know."

"What is our foreign society doing now?"

"Don't know."

"Or in India?"

"Don't know."

"Or in Africa?"

"Don't know."

"Have we a foreign society, anyhow?"

"Think we have, but don't know for certain."

"Who is its secretary?"

"Dont know."

"What is it doing?"

"Don't know."

"Is it doing anything?"

"S'pose it is. Don't really know."

"How much money did it raise last year?"

"Don't know."

"Who are our home missionaries?"

"Don't know."

"Where is home missionary work most needed?"

"Don't know."

"What is our membership in the United States?"

"Don't know."

"What is it in this state?"

"Don't know."

"Where are we strongest?"

"Don't know."

"Who are some of our strongest men?"

"Don't know."

"Is our cause making much progress at present?"

"Don't know."

"What good are you to the church, anyhow?"

"Don't kn—— that is, I ——— well you see———."

—We have seen and heard some preachers who seem to think that a preacher's energy should exhaust itself in scolding the brethren. This is a serious error. A larger portion of this force directed toward loving the flock would produce far better and more satisfactory results. Scolding was not one of Christ's foremost characteristics—not even a visible one throughout his whole life.

—If a circular letter sent out from the "Law Enforcement Society," of Brooklyn, N. Y., now a part of Greater New York City, hints at facts, and the circular is well authenticated, we certainly cannot advise our friends to visit Coney Island during the summer. One of the mildest statements of this circular is that "it is rotten with a rottenness that is indescribable." We are glad to know that this "Law Enforcement Society'' is to wage a war against the evils hinted at, and trust that it may be ably seconded by every law-abiding, purity-loving citizen in Greater New York; and also that a similar war may be waged against every other moral sink-hole in the land. Money spent in such a war is well invested and will return gracious benefits to society.

—Our English Topics, this week, is particularly interesting, dealing after its own lively fashion with lively topics. The question of better conditions in the industrial world is not an insolvable nor unsolved question, as some suppose, and as the first part of this letter shows. The truth is, we have the solution, but the business world, the ''on-tops,'' will not permit their use so long as they can prevent it. They are like some railroads in their attitude toward better equipments; they will not adopt them until they find that it pays to do so or the law compells them to do so, as it so often has done. We hope, however, that a few more business men like Mr. Hartely in the Topics this week, and others that could be named, will make Christian activity more popular among the business men of the world. You will also be interested in what the Topics has to say about Dimleby's prophecy of the world's end and of Andrew Lang's new book.

—The admirable treatise on ''Protracted Meetings'' in this paper, by D. R. Dungan, of this city, will bear close inspection. Coming, as it does, at this season of the year, it will be less liable to affect any protracted meeting in progress, or the prospects of any particular evangelist, but it will help churches to a wiser management of these meetings in the future. Next week we expect to publish an excellent paper on ''Ministerial Courtesy.'' As announced, we have a number of ably written papers on practical church themes to appear consecutively in our new paper.

—Cardinal Gibbons has asked President McKinley to appoint more Catholic chaplains to the army. The request, it is said, is based on the great number of Catholic young men in the army and navy and the few Catholic chaplains. It will now be in order for every other religious body in the land to make a similar request.

—The 47th annual catalogue of Christian College, Columbia, Mo., is by far the handsemest catalogue we have yet seen from that institution. It is elegantly printed on good paper and contains a large number of full-page pictures, executed in the best skill of the engraver's art. The literature of the catalogue and pictures make a book of 80 pages, and the information imparted therein ought to add many names to its roll the next school year. The tinted cover of the catalogue, with its raised gilt letters, is fine.

—The Christian Quarterly, July, just to hand, contains the following themes and authors: ''Denominationalism,'' by Joseph Franklin; ''The Apostolic Age,'' by W. M. Forrest; ''Paul's Letter to the Romans,'' Clinton Lockhart; ''Bishop Merrill On 'Buried by Baptism,''' by J. B. Briney; ''Evolution and Christianity,'' by A. M. Chamberlain; ''Machiavelli,'' by I. J. Cahill; ''Stumbling-Blocks: A Word-Study,'' by A. S. Carman. The other departments are filled with inviting literature.

—In the program of the Missouri Christian Lectureship at Carrollton, July 18-21, which we published last week, too many things appear to be in one session. We aimed to designate the hours of each session instead of the time of each lecture, but by mistake got some of the sessions run together. The program will appear again next week. It is a strong one and those who attend will have much presented to their minds for contemplation.

—Mrs. Rachel Errett, mother of Davis Errett, now pastor of the church at Canton, Mo., died June 25th. A tribute to her life, written by E. J. Lampton, of Louisiana, Mo., will appear in our next number.

Beulah Notes.

During the absence of the pastor, E. M. Smith, who is spending his vacation at his old home in Virginia, the following program for Lord's day services has been arranged by Beula Christian Church, of this city: July 3, 11 A. M., Preaching, Dr. J. H. Foy. July 3, 8 P. M., Union Patriotic Services at Mt. Cabanne Church. July 10, 11 A. M., Preaching, Dr. J. H. Foy. July 10, 8 P. M., Services conducted by Y. P. S. C. E. July 17, 11 A. M., Preaching, W. W. Hopkins. July 17, 8 P. M., Preaching, Dr. J. H. Foy. July 24, 11 A. M., Preaching, Jno. A. Owen. July 24, 8 P. M., Services conducted by C. W. B. M. July 31, 11 A. M., Preaching, W. W. Hopkins. July 31, 8 P. M., Preaching, Dr. J. H. Foy.

A new church, of which Roy L. Handley, of this city, has been chosen pastor, has just been organized in Argentine, a part of Kansas City, Kan.

The church was formed with a nucleus of thirty-eight members, and additions are constantly being made during the meeting which was still in progress at last accounts.

There is a Bible-school of fifty members in connection with the movement.

Bro. Handley is a young man held in the very highest esteem in this city for his talent, his uprightness and his energy. This is his first pastoral work, but his friends in St. Louis expect great things of the church at Argentine if the membership is nearly as faithful as the pastor. W. D. CREE.

PERSONAL MENTION.

We are glad to report that A. M. Atkinson, of Wabash, Ind., is able to go about again; not to his work but for the increase of his physical strength. All will rejoice that the Lord has returned him to us from the very jaws of death.

R. B. Neal, of Grayson, Ky., has issued his Anti-Mormon tract No. 2. This one is entitled, ''Smithianity,'' and deals some hard blows at the pretentious claims of that pretentious people.

A sketch of the life of J. J. Haley, one of the corresponding editors of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, together with his picture, appeared in the Christian Guide last week. The picture is not a flattering one, but the loss is more than met in the sketch of his active and extended life and work.

A note worthy compliment has been paid to our brotherhood in the selection, by the Society of Pedagogy, of St. Louis, of Dr. Joseph H. Foy, principal of the Shields Public School, as Ethical Lecturer, a position fomerly occupied by Dr. Wm. M. Bryant. The society is to be congratulated on its good selection.

W. S. Wood, pastor of the church at Boonville, Mo., and Miss Susan Jones, of Milan, Mo., were recently married. The ceremony was spoken by James. S. Todd, of Galt, Mo. The newly married started for Omaha, for a trip, soon after the ceremony. May our congratulations overtake them.

Dr. W. A. Belding is in his 82nd year of life, and says he is able to preach as much as ever, if not as well.

Duncan McGregor, a man of scholarship and refinement, from the Progressive Dunkards, a preacher, united with the Disciples of Christ at Washington, Pa.

Bro. J. W. Bolton, editorial contributor of N. E. Messenger, has been called to remain at Westport and Tiverton, Nova Scotia, another year, it being his third year.

Bro. Chas. S. Medbury, pastor of the Church of Christ, in Angola, Ind., has been elected chaplain of the third Indiana Regiment and has gone to battle Spaniards.

A. C. Smithers, of Los Angeles, Cal., preached the baccalaureate sermon to the graduates of the California State Normal School, of that city, June 19, 1898. The class numbered 80. He is also to deliver four lectures on the Bible at Long Beach convention, July 7-17.

D. H. Bays, of Persia, Iowa, author of Doctrine and Dogmas of Mormonism, published by this house, has been lecturing in Ohio on that subject this summer. Dr. Bays has thoroughly mastered his subject and knows whereof he speaks. Any audience not composed of Mormons will be profited by hearing Dr. Bays lecture on that subject.

A PREACHER'S REPORT

Interesting Statement by Elder Joel H. Austin of Goshen, Ind.

"I was a victim of catarrh and had almost constant pain in my head. The trouble was gradually working down on my lungs. I was weak and irresolute. My wife had the grip and Hood's Sarsaparilla cured her. After this I had the same disease and resorted to Hood's. In a short time the aches and pains were relieved and I also saw the medicine was helping my catarrh. In six weeks I ceased to have any further trouble with it and I am now a well man. The pains and bloating I had in my limbs are gone and I am relieved of a heart trouble. I am thankful for a medicine so intelligently compounded and so admirably adapted to the needs of the system." ELDER JOEL H. AUSTIN, Goshen, Indiana.

B. C. Hagerman, having been elected President of Hamilton Female College, has removed from Bethany W. Va., to Lexington, Ky.

''F.L. Hayden, D. D.,'' of Kearney, Neb., has joined in the new literary crusade against Mormonism. He is just out with a tract against this peculiar ism, and states that he will be glad to give personal aid to pastors wherever Mormon propagandists are at work. Address him for particulars.

Christian College Chronicle, Columbia, Mo., highly complimented F. G. Tyrrell, of this city, for his masterly address in Columbia on Sunday preceding the college commencement. By the way, the June number of the Chronicle is an exceptionally good one.

A. R. Adams, pastor of the church at Blandinsville, Ill., was recently pleasantly and profitably surprised by the members of his flock. Both purse and larder were largely replenished.

Mrs. M. J. Fergusson, wife of the pastor of the church at Riverside, Cal., passed through this city on last Friday, en route to Bowling Green, Ky., where she will spend the summer.

Geo. T. Smith has removed from Chicago to Albia, Iowa, where he now preaches, having accepted a call to that place.

W. E. Garrison reports a delightful voyage across the Atlantic, excepting one day of rough sea. His first correspondence—Tourist Letter—will appear in our next number.

BUSINESS AND RELIGION.

Some of the noblest of living English Christians are men deeply and lucratively engaged in life's daily business. One of these is Mr. W. J. Hartley, a great Liverpool jam manufacturer. Here is one of the most remarkable men whom the world has produced. He is one of the very busiest employers of labor in the the land, and yet he takes so much part in the religious affairs of his denomination, the Primitive Methodist, that a newspaper recently aluded to him as the Reverend W. J. Hartley. This must have greatly amused the jam-maker, as it did all who best know him. But the mistake proved the many-sided character of the man. Near his own residence is a model village, consisting of fifty houses, in which some of his workmen live. This village is a beautiful sight, with its trim gardens and pretty green lawn. Mr. Hartley says that he has never had any trouble with his workpeople, either in relation to hours or wages. He accounts for this by saying that it has been his first aim to do unto others as he would be done by. Three times within recent years the wages have been advanced unasked. Nearly twenty thousand pounds he has given to the men and women employed in profit-sharing according to the prosperity of the business. He believes that the system of profit-sharing would go a long way towards solving the problem of capital and labor. Mr. Hartley says, after the experience of years, that he does not see any solution of the difficulties of the day without the application of the spirit of Christ. In England several other great men of business are thus quietly working out what may prove to be splendid preparations for the establishment of the millennium. Mr. Lever, the founder of the wonderful town called Port Sunlight, where mountains of "Sunlight Soap" are made, is another of the princes of labor who are also leaders in the Christian community. Port Sunlight is a magnificent sample of incipient, practical Christian Socialism. Its streets of workingmen's villas, its large, handsome public hall, its literary institute and library, its baths, its gardens, all make this creation of a man who was a poor boy a real paradise of industry. Here master and men are bound together by solidarity of interests. It is so also with Huntley and Palmer, who have constructed the largest biscuit bakery in the world, at Reading, forty miles from London. These gentlemen are Quakers. The Brothers Tangye, of Birmingham, the great engineers, are known throught the land as beneficent Christian philanthropists. As employers of an army of men, they manage their works on similar lines, bringing into action the practical principles of a true Christian communism, while the dreamy dilettante Socialists of the Bellamy school, and the anarchists of the Fourier and Krapotkine models, follow Owen into the quagmire of wild and hopeless confusion. I have come to this conclusion from a long study of the different phases of modern Socialism, that only the Christian capitalists who have taken their men into actual partnership are paving the way for a better age. The splendid results they have achieved constitute object-lessons which the world will sooner or later begin to study, instead of the nostrums of the numerous fallacy-mongers who leave out of account the Bible and its economics on the one hand, and the essential faults and difficulties of human nature on the other.

SCIENCE AND THE END OF THIS WORLD.

Grim joking is being indulged in at the expense of Mr. Joseph Dimbleby and the Rev. Michael Baxter. These two gentlemen are professional prophets. They are engaged like Professor Totten in your country in reckoning up how many years, months, weeks, days, hours, minutes and seconds this poor old Terra on which we live and move and have our being has yet to exist. Now, Mr. Dimbleby has been for sometime past publishing pamphlets to show that the great cataclysm was to ensue on Easter Sunday last. Well, that was the very day when your war with Spain actually commenced as far as fighting was concerned. But the terrestrial terminus does not appear to be close at hand, and Mr. Dimbleby and his followers are in an awkward position. So is Mr. Baxter, especially as he has just taken the long lease of large business premises in which to print and publish his newspapers, which are very popular with numbers of people who crave for incessent sensationalism. But other people are making great fun of the prophet, for Michael Baxter has for many years been predicting tremendous catastrophes to come on all the earth just about this present period. The "everlasting smash" was to come for certain before the century should run out. "Forty Coming Wonders" is the title of a most appalling prophetic book at which I sometimes look for a few minutes in order to give Mr. Baxter a chance to convince me. For he argues everything from Scripture. The pictures in the "Forty Coming Wonders" are blood-curdling and horrific. They might have been left to tell their own story with advantage, just as Mendelssohn's wonderful "Songs Without Words" are far more effective than if the musician had put language to the music. All the imaginable beastial monstrosities of the infernal menageries are depicted, and the letter-press describes all the horrors which ought by this time to have fairly started the crack of doom. My perplexity in studying this sort of literature, in which thousands of good Christians implicitly believe, is to find out how, after two or three dreadful and annihilating "Wonders" had had their turn, there could then be any of us mortals on earth left to face the next. A very few of these stupendous plagues, in which heaven and hell seem to shake hands in strange alliance out of spiteful malignity to this poor little globe, would clear off so many millions, including lots of the Baxterians and Dimblebytes, that I do not see who would be surviving to be the subjects of any of the further series of woes. Mr. Baxter is being derisively challenged in many of the newspapers to say how he could in good faith have leased fine premises for a long term of years when his predicted collapse of sublunary spheres is already a little over due. He has taken the trouble to formulate a laborious reply. The funny thing about this is that he explains that in the millennium there will be far greater need of books and newspapers than ever before, so that he is only making consistent preparation for the age to come. As his "Forty Coming Wonders," however, more than suffice to show that the earth will be swept clear of everything that has lived (for such pestilence, such earthquakes, such invasions of angels, demons, beasts with all sorts of heads, bodies, claws, jaws, crowns, stings, hoofs, tails and tongues, and dragons foul, firey, scaly and slimy, would surely make a total end of men, women and children), it is difficult for the student to understand who will be existent to read the sheets that are expected to be issued in such millennial masses from Michael Baxters's apocalyptic emporium. However, it has to be admitted that larger numbers of people than ever are greedily swallowing this kind of prophetic literature. The sillier the nonsense poured out by the old Roman augurs and vaticinators, the more eagerly Demos believed it. So it is at this day. The more audacious the soothsaying, the more acceptable to a certain large class of minds. And yet, prophecy is the finest of all studies. I take leave to say that the fooling of charlatans with this subject is in great part to be ascribed to the neglect of it by the majority of preachers. They have for the most part left it to the tricksters. Writers like Birks, Fleming, Elliott and Guinness have taught us a more excellent way, but only a few are profiting by it. In theological colleges eschatology is often openly derided.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE IDEA OF GOD.

A handsome volume has just appeared on one of the greatest controversies of our time. Mr. Andrew Lang, now accounted by many our foremost English critic, has given to the public his new work, "The Making of Religion." His main contention is that religion is born in us, not made by us. He combats at every point the views of the anthropologists. These declare in all their expositions that man derived the conception of "spirit" or "soul" from his reflections on the phenomena of sleep, dreams, death, shadow, and from the experience of trance and hallucination. First men worshiped the departed souls of their kindred, and then ghosts became gods. Finally these gods became unified, and thus arose the conception of the one God. Meanwhile man retained his belief in his own existence after death and so reached the conception of his own immortality. Thus the ideas of God and the immortality of the soul are the result of early fallacious reasonings about misunderstood experiences. This is a fair view of what is taught by anthropologists like Herbert Spencer and Grant Allen. But Mr. Andrew Lang will have none of this doctrine. He shows that certain tribes of low savages are as monotheistic as some Christians. He contends that there are two currents, the mythical and the religious, following all creeds. The religious current even amongst savages is quite distinct from the magical, ghost-propitiating habit. The other current, the mythological, is full of magic, mummery and scandalous legend. The anthropologists have kept their eyes on the impure stream, the lusts, mummeries, conjurings and frauds of the priesthoods, while neglecting the higher and purer thoughts of the people. Mr. Lang even has the courage to oppose Max Muller, and he does so with conspicuous success. He contends with great wealth of argument and illustration that in the most backward peoples known to us there is found "among men just emerged from the palæolithic stage of culture, men who are involved in dread of ghosts, a religious idea which certainly is not born of ghost-worship." In their hearts, in their moral training, we find, he says (however blended with barbarous absurdities), the faith in a Being who constructed the world; who was from time beyond memory or conjecture; who is eternal, who makes for righteousness and who loves mankind. I believe this new book will lift up Mr. Andrew Lang to fame equal to any of the greatest thinkers of our time.

Jamaica Letter.

Infrequent doing of a thing makes that thing difficult to do. Letter-writing is no exception. I realize this now as I take up my pen to put into practical effect a purpose that I have had a number of times during the past three months. However, your columns have not lacked interesting matter—probably more interesting and profitable to most of your readers than anything likely to originate in this, to them, obscure and unimportant island.* Still, we would like to have your readers interested in our circumstances and work, and interest can hardly be expected without knowledge

As regards the affairs of the island generally, there is nothing very exciting or promising in its condition to communicate. The low state of trade and the scarcity of labor for the laboring classes, the languid circulation of money and the poor price of island produce continue much the same as when I wrote at the close of last year. If there is any improvement it is little; and in some districts the people are said to be in a very impoverished condition indeed. In Kingston, and two or three of the larger towns, there has been a larger influx of Cubans who have sought refuge here from the various troubles and dangers incident to a state of war. Their presence is putting some money into circulation. Out of their misfortune some good comes to us. There is scarcely a day that some American or Spanish warship or some other vessel does not run into this port. The other day the Harvard came in, and after being there twenty-four hours (the time limit), was ordered to leave. The captain reported something wrong with her machinery and his consequent inability to get away. It was commonly reported around that two Spanish warships were waiting for the Harvard outside! However, after three days she steamed quietly on her way. All our Sunday-school children had a good look at her, as we happened to be out having our annual picnic on the seashore, within about a quarter of a mile of where she passed. She seems to have encountered no opposition. Of course we are so situated that a very lively interest is taken in the conflict; and telegrams are anxiously looked for twice a day. These, however, are found to be very unreliable. We should be very thankful to hear that peace negotiations, of which there have been some rumors, are a reality.

The hard times are affecting churches throughout the island. When the Episcopalians held their synod early this year, it was found that it would be impossible to keep up their expenditures from their usual sources of income. Very considerable reductions were made all round. The Archbishop expressed his fears that the work would suffer. Two of their leading clergymen have been sent to England as a deputation to represent their case and to solicit funds to meet deficiences. This is the church of which most of the wealthy people, who are identified with any church at all, claim to be members.

Dr. Barratt and the Rev. Mr. Woods, of England, who, not long ago, where sent as a deputation, by the London Missionary Society, to the Congregational Churches here, recently stated to the Congregational Union that if funds were not devoted to the keeping up of the mission in Jamaica, the information they had led them to doubt if the mission could be continued. The Baptists are finding it very difficult to carry on their work. Their mission money has fallen off nearly one-hal,; and some of their ministers who have from 700 to 1,500 members under their care, are in great difficulties as to their support. (I may mention here, as an interesting item, that the oldest missionary in connection with this body died last week, at the age of eighty years, during fifty-four of which he labored on this island. He has left of his children, two sons and one daughter missionaries in Jamaica; one son a missionary in Burmah, and one just gone as a medical man in connection with mission work to Africa.)

In view of what I have said of the difficulties of others in this field, it will not be surprising if we have to report diminished funds. Still, we hope that these trying financial times will soon give place to something better. They say that even now there are signs of improvement. Doubtless the hard times tend greatly to prevent advance in our mission work. Many persons cannot attend the services because they have not the apparel in which they like to appear. Want of boots is one of the commonest hindrances. Still, we are making some progress. Up to the present time we have had over twenty additions to the church at Duke Street and branch this year. Bro. MacLeod expects to baptize six persons at King's Gate next Lord's day morning. The other churches are having additions also. This month we had the largest number that has ever gathered at our annual picnic. One hundred and forty went out on the cars, and had a splendid day. We have still enough to make us hope, and hope keeps us at work. We still have the droppings and plead for the showers.

Salt Lake City.

Temple Square, which is ten acres in area, is inclosed by a wall about three feet thick at the base and about twelve feet high. This wall rests on a foundation of masonry and is capped with stone slabs, the intermediate structure being of cemented adobe. The adobe portion is painted a straw color.

The streets are all numbered from the temple and are named according to their numbers. The streets adjoining Temple Square are known as North Temple, South Temple, East Temple and West Temple. Then come 1st South, 2nd South, and so on. All the cardinal points of the compass have their numerically named streets. This is a little confusing at first, as it is quite easy to get West 2nd South mixed with South 2nd West, although they are widely separated. West 2nd South is the west end of 2nd South, or the west end of the second street south of South Temple Street, which is the first street south of the Temple. When I say that I live at 578 East 4th South Street, I mean that I live at that number on the east end of the fourth street south of South Temple Street. A line drawn diagonally across the city from the southeast corner of the Temple would lie diagonally across the intersections of East Temple and South Temple, 1st South and 1st East, 2nd East and 2nd South, and so on. The blocks are 660 feet square and the streets are 132 feet wide. This is not peculiar to Salt Lake City. All Mormon towns and cities are and have been thus laid out. The large squares have nothing to commend them. The centres of them cannot be built upon to advantage, and space that would be valuable if it fronted on a street is rendered undesirable by being hemmed in behind lots and shut out from view by surrounding houses. The wisdom of such an arrangement is not apparent. The finger of time points out many mistakes that when born were thought to be the children of inspiration. He who builds for future generations generally builds better than he knows. He who builds no better than he knows generally builds for his own generation. If his work is seen at all by future generations it is as a moss-covered ruin—the embodiment of an antiquated idea.

At the intersection of Main and South Temple Streets stands a bronze monument of Brigham Young, standing with bared head, with his left hand resting on his cane, and his right lifted in a graceful gesture as if addressing a public assembly. His tomb is on 1st (north) between State (1st East) and A Streets. It is a grass-covered enclosure with the graves of several of his wives. It is covered with a single granite slab about six by eight feet and surmounted by an iron railing set in the margins of the slabs. The slab bears a simple inscription which embraces his name and dates of birth and death. The casket is embedded in masonry and cement twelve feet deep. There is a story—probably apocryphal—to the effect that dynamite cartridges were imbedded in the cement about the grave to prevent the stealing of the body. It was suggested by one to whom the story was told that it was a cruel thing to expose one who had been the husband of twenty-six wives to the possibility of a postmortem blowing up!

With the advent of the railroad and a large Gentile population came many changes in Salt Lake City—some for the better and some for the worse. The little ward schoolhouse, modeled after the country schoolhouse of the beginning of the century, has given place to the modern public school building, large, airy and well equipped with modern appliances. Salt Lake City has an actual population of perhaps 50,000; 12,000 being children of scholastic age. Our teachers, drawn from the ranks of both Mormons and Gentiles, are wide awake and up to date. Books are furnished free of cost. This places an education within reach of all.

With the railroad and the Gentiles came the saloon. Now many business blocks are literally honey-combed with these recruiting offices for ths inebriate army, and both Mormons and Gentiles are found on both sides of the bar. Yet Salt Lake City is as orderly and quiet as the average city of its size. As in the West, Sunday desecration is so common as not to attract much attention. It is by the classes who would desecrate it anywhere.

Fishing for Health.

When a man breaks down with that dread disease, consumption, and recognizes his condition, he starts out to fish for health. He tries this thing and that thing. He consults this doctor and that doctor. He indulges in all kinds of absurd athletic exercises. He tries first one climate and then another. He tries the rest cure and the work cure. He grows steadily worse.

That is the story of most consumptives. Finally, when the consumptive dies, the doctor shrugs his shoulders and pronounces consumption incurable. A thirty years' test of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has demonstrated that it cures 98 per cent. of all cases of consumption, if taken in the earlier stages of the disease, before the lungs are too far wasted. In a consumptive there is a weaker spot than even the lungs. That spot is the stomach. A consumptive never really begins to die until his stomach gives out. The "Golden Medical Discovery" not only braces up the stomach, but acts directly on the lungs, healing them and driving out all impurities. Honest medicine dealers will not urge you to take an inferior substitute.

"I had a very bad cough, also night-sweats, and was almost in my grave with consumption," writes Mrs. Clara A. McIntyre, Box 171, Ashland, Middlesex Co., Mass. "A friend of mine who had died with consumption came to me in a dream and told me to take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and, thank the Lord, I did so. By the time I had taken half of the first bottle I felt much better. I kept on until I had taken three bottles. That was all I needed. I got well and strong again."

Whenever constipation is one of the complicating causes of disease, the most perfect remedy is Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets, which are always effective, yet absolutely mild and harmless. There never was any remedy invented which can take their place. They never gripe.

The Chicago Letter.

Shall we be optimistists or pessimists? This question is not so easy to answer as the light-headed and shallow-hearted suppose. Some of the greatest philosophers, from the writer of the Koheleth to Schopenhauer, have been pessimists. It is not always easy to say with the optimistic Browning, in the song of Pippa:

> "God's in his heaven,

Yes, God is in his heaven. Let us never doubt that "all things work together for [the ultimate] good to them that love God." But does it necessarily follow that—

> "All's right with the world?"

At times we must take short views in life to keep our frail hearts from breaking with their weight of woe. Again, we must look through long vistas of time to reassure our questioning hearts of the goodness of God and the ultimate triumph of truth and righteousness. Let us "be brave," and though our eyes be filled with tears because a loved boy has wandered far from home in health, or another is called home from far away on account of threatened disease, let us trust God and say with the poet of optimism:

"My own hope is, a sun will pierce
The thickest cloud earth ever stretched."

Shall we be optimists, or pessimists? This question not only forces itself upon the fond mother because her boy is working his way in some great city, or fighting for his native land on the high sea, but forces itself upon the noble philanthropist who sincerely struggles to ameliorate the condition of his workingmen, upon the lover of civic righteousness, upon the preacher, who prefers Christ to Kant, and sincerity to sham. It is sometimes difficult to realize that humanity is sloping upward through darkness to God by slow degrees, by more and more. The progress is so slow and there must be such constant tacking against the winds of tendency and the hurricanes of sin. Four years ago the disgraceful and demoralizing gambling at the Washington Park races aroused the public conscience sufficiently to make the mayor and public officials take steps to stop the races. Mayor Harrison's administration, however, has been trying to make gambling respectable, but like the man in the fable he finds the warmed serpent unmanageable. Indeed, as he is reported to have said that "a game of poker is good," some fear that he enjoys running a wide-open town. Nothing could be more discouraging to our optimistic hopes, that we were to have good government in Chicago, than the opening of the Washington Park races again. For over a month Chicago will be wild with the gambling spirit. Mothers, plead with your boys to shun Chicago during these days as they would shun perdition itself.

"Experience is the best of teachers." This is an old adage, but is it always true? I doubt whether a bad experience is ever a good teacher. The thoughtless man says: "Let the boy sow his wild oats; he will learn better by experience." Alas! there are some experiences which the dear boy cannot unlearn. And if it it is well for the boy to smoke a little and for the business man to gamble a little to learn that it is injurious to smoke and gamble, why not advise our girls to sin against their bodies and our women against all business principles? Is the girl who goes to the dance clad so as to insure a severe cold any better for an experience which puts her emaciated form under the beautiful daisies in a few months? Thirty-five per cent. of the young men who offered themselves for naval services recently were rejected because their sight was impaired, or their lungs weakened by the smoking habit. Can such an experience be construed as beneficial to our young men? While Leiter dealt in cash wheat his success was phenomenal. One month's dealing "in futures" cost him from three to five million dollars. People say: "He has learned a good lesson." I should rather say, he has learned a bad lesson. The habit of gambling, like the habit of drinking, grows by experience. But will not other men learn by Leiter's experience that gambling in wheat is bad business, as well as bad morals? No. There are hundreds of men, some of them deacons in Christian churches, who will read this paragraph and go on gambling; trusting their fortunes and the happiness of their wives and children to the men who run "bucket shops" in Chicago, and who call the country merchants entrusting their fortunes to them "suckers."

Brother and Sister J. H. Garrison passed through the city on their way to Macatawa Park. They remained over one night in Chicago and Mrs. Young and I esteemed it a great privilege to have them in our home. Such associations make us optimists.

"And all is well, though faith and form
Be sundered in the night of fear;
Well roars the storm to those who hear
A deeper voice across the storm."

C. A. YOUNG.

Our National Bureau of Education.

At a meeting of the superintendence departmet of the National Educational Association, held at Washington in February, 1866, a memorial to Congress signed by State School Superintendent E. E. White, of Ohio; Newton Bateman, of Illinois, and J. S. Adams, of Vermont, urged the establishment of a National Bureau of Education. The memorial was presented to the House by Gen. Garfield and strongly championed by him. The same course was pursued in the Senate. After some efforts and delays an office of education under the control of the Department of the Interior was established, and a meager sum set apart for its maintenance. The act securing this result was dated July 28, 1868, and took effect June 30, 1869, which is the real beginning of the bureau.

The original purpose in the establishment of this bureau was that of "collecting such statistics and facts as shall show the condition and progress of education in the several states and territories, and of diffusing such information respecting the organization and management of school systems and methods of teaching as shall aid the people of the United States in the establishment and maintenance of efficient school systems and otherwise promote the cause of education." At first the theory of state sovereignty, still entertained by those in regions most likely to be benefited, was jealous of the operations of a bureau whose purpose was confessedly just and philanthropic. It was secretly intimated that this new bureau would attempt to unify and control educational interests manifestly within the sphere and jurisdiction of the respective states. This fear, confessedly not well grounded, did much to hamper and circumscribe the usefulness of the bureau by limiting its yearly appropriations to a mere pittance, and otherwise checking the beneficent work it was intended to accomplish.

Edmund Burke said, "Education is the cheap defense of nations." That this language was given a very literal and, perhaps, unworthy interpretation is manifest when we remember that despite the most excellent work this bureau has done, and the incalculable benefits it has conferred upon the schools and school systems of the country, the aggregate appropriation for its maintenance has, after thirty years, reached only the meager sum of $57,270, distributed as follows: Salaries, $52,020; collection of statistics, $2,500; purchase and distribution of documents, $2,500; increase of library, $250.

Ten of our great battleships, viz., Alabama, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kearsarge, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Oregon, Texas and Wisconsin, cost in the aggregate $32,280,000. This expense being a necessity is not unreasonable. We all rejoice at this time that they have been built, and some are doing efficient service in the present war with Spain. But stop to think of the "cheap defense" to the nation our Bureau of Education, which costs annually only about one-fiftieth part of the least expensive of these battleships, the Texas. The Bureau of Education, however imperfectly equipped it has been, and crowded in its apartments, has built up the largest pedagogical library in America, if not in the world. In its library, on the 30th of June, 1897, were 72,725 books and 150,000 pamphlets. It is doing an immense amount of educational work in the way of furnishing statistical information of great value, and it is gratifying to know that this information is being eagerly sought by schools, colleges, libraries and progressive public men everywhere. Within the last few years the publication of annual reports, previously much hindered, has been facilitated, and the management hope to see all work of this character brought up to date within the next year.

Within the next month superintendents, teachers and educational workers from all parts of the nation will visit our city in attendance upon the sessions of the National Educational Association. Probably 25,000 people will be here, the advance guard of the great hosts of educators who constitute the true standing army of the republic. It is sincerely hoped that in the near future such statesmanship will be developed in our legislative and executive departments as shall secure these results:

1. Raise the Bureau of Education to the rank of a regular department on a footing with those of Agriculture, War and the Navy—a rank which it legitimately deserves; 2. Give it an equipment in the matter of building and grounds commensurate with its importance as one of the agencies in the "cheap defense of nations;" 3. Furnish an appropriation in harmony with the value and importance of the great work it is accomplishing and qualified to accomplish; 4. Recognize the worth of talent in its management as in other branches of the public service. In that case a man of national, yea, international, reputation would not be expected to give his services at a salary which is a mere pittance of what like ability would command in other fields of intellectual activity.

When this happy day shall have arrived the teachers of the nation will, on visiting the nation's beautiful capital, be thoroughly convinced that our government practically believes the declaration of England's eloquent statesman, that "education is the cheap defense of nations." J. FRAISE RICHARD.

Texas Letter.

The wheat and oat crop of Texas, unusually fine this year, has suffered much from recent rains—perhaps one-third. Cotton, though late, is promising, and corn prospects and hay are good, while cattle are fine. So, on the whole, the outlook is full of comfort.

J. J. Cramer, of Lockhart, is off on a well-deserved vacation. He has been at Lockhart about eight years. One of the best evidences of his good work there is the $10,000 house now being built.

L. G. Ament, who has lately come into fellowship with our "progressive" work, locates at Sabinal and will labor in the regions near there.

C. A. Mullens, an Add-Ran boy of promise, locates at Pearsall, an important place in the southern part of the state near the Mexican line.

J. H. Rosecrans, our "sweet singer," is well enough once more to enter the field. He will hold a series of protracted meetings this summer.

J. A. Tabor leaves Corsicana for Oklahoma City, Ok., where his wife will teach, while he preaches to churches adjacent.

T. D. Secrest, of Coleman, is recovering from a dangerous sickness, and our people rejoice, for Bro. Secrest is one of our purest and strongest men.

J. B. Haston, of California, returnes Texas to take up the work at Galveston. He is a good successor of Bro. E. H. Kellar, and the Island City church is fortunate.

G. B. Crenshaw goes from Taylor to San Antonio, a strong man for an important place. San Antonio's trouble has been that her men do not stay long enough; hence we hope that Bro. Crenshaw will be a fixture with them.

G. H. Morrison leaves El Paso and goes to Alvarado. He is one of our best young men, and he locates in one of the best sections of the state.

W. K. Homan is in a meeting at San Angelo. Editing the Courier is not enough for him. Occasionally he must hold a meeting to work off his surplus energy.

G. A. Hoffmann made a flying trip to Texas a few weeks since. He broke bread with us in our home and preached a sermon at the Central. Hoffmann is a success. He scented something good for the Bible College at Columbia, and he at once came, saw, and conquered about $20,000. If Missouri wants anything else from Texas, let her send down.

Miss Jennie Belle Terry, of the Central

Church, has been given the Chair of Elocution in Randolph College at Lancaster, and she wil prove the wisdom of the selection.

B. B. Sanders is in a meeting at Sulphur Springs, and among his converts is J. H. Davis, familiarly known in political parlance as "Cyclone" Davis. He is a man of ability, and capable of great usefulness in the church.

B. B. Tyler seldom slips in a sentence or fact, hence the surprise of all Dallasites when he puts down our population at 38,067, which, according to a census of last year, is 64,224. A town and a marriageable maiden are much alike; both are sensitive, one over her age, and the other over her size. Tyler's aim was good, but his statistics were ancient.

At Hiram in '98.

The 48th annual meeting at Hiram on commencement day has just closed. Thirty-one of these meetings represent all years of the life of the college proper; the remaining years represent the life of the Western Reserve Electic Institute, out of which Hiram College grew.

Commencement week is always an interesting week in any wide-awake and growing literary institution. Hiram is no exception to this rule. The baccalaureate sermon to the graduates was delivered by President Zollars, June 19. This was the tenth annual sermon he has delivered and those who are competent to judge pronounce it one of the very best of the series. As Hiram has grown in power, so has its president, and the limit of growth in power and efficiency has not yet been reached by either.

The various literary societies of the college held their annual meetings on Monday night. These meetings close the business of the year, and besides are made the occasion of honoring those who go out from their halls with the graduating class of the year. This year the society meetings were exceptionally fine.

Hiram now has a "Conservatory of Music," under the direction of Prof. Eugene Feuchtinger. I think I speak within modest bounds when I say that the musical department of Hiram College is not surpassed by any college in Ohio, and probably in the United States. If any other college is equal to it, it is to be congratulated. The rendering of Rossini's Sacred Oratorio and "Stabot Mater," on Tuesday night, was an event. Sixty voices, well trained, thundered its choruses. The leading solos were sung by Misses Jennie M. Welch, Mabel Phillips, Alice Dean, Lucele F. Snow, Mrs. J. C. Ellis, Mrs. Addie Zollars Page, R. C. Barth, Justin N. Green and Frank C. Rulon. None of these were imported for the occasion, but were of the home force, trained by the accomplished Professor Feuchtinger. As I listened to this oratorio, so well rendered, I though I could realize the truth of Addison's words—

"Music religious heat inspires,
It makes the soul and lifts it high,
And wings it with sublime desires,
And fits it to bespeak the Deity."

Wednesday was devoted to the "class of '98," to the annual meeting of the board of trustees, and to the literary entertainment and banquet of the Delphic Society.

Thursday, commencement day, was an ideal day. A more perfect one never dawned on Hiram Hill. A great congregation was present to listen to representatives of the graduating classes. The entire class numbered 37. The following are their names, each of which is worthy of mention:

CLASSICAL COURSE.—Howard Allen Blake, William Herbert Boden, Will Jay Crum, William Robert Davis, Alonzo Willard Fortune, Annie Laurie Gould, Delbert Edgar Graver, John Samuel Kenyon, Ernest Dale Long, Ella Poppy McConnel, Willard Rodolphus Moffet, Myra Alice Pow, William Alexander Scott, Burt Woodward Wilson, Percy Howard Wilson.

PHILOSOPHICAL COURSE.—Mary Alice Canfield, Earl Brockway Newton, Henry Wallace Murray, Elizabeth Roberts, Elizabeth Lorena Way.

SCIENTIFIC COURSE.—Clinton Mason Young.

LITERARY COURSE.—Thomas Leland Baxter Blanche Mabel Beck, Ethel Carrie Caskey, Harvey F. Fetzer, Justin N. Green, Zach A. Harris, James Johnson, Orville Titus Manley, Levi J. McConnel, Clara Worst Miller, Lorenzo Orville Packer, Esther Buckingham Patterson, Susie Letitia Rawson, Carl David Thayer, Samuel Traum, Leonard J. Wilson.

Besides these there were several who received diplomas for post-graduate work, and the degree of A. M. in course. On four persons honorary degrees were conferred as follows: The degree of LL. D. on Judge Don A. Pardee, of Louisiana; LL. D. on Hon. Andrew Squire, of Ohio; A. M. on W. H. Brett, Librarian of the city of Cleveland, O., and A. M. on J. H. Calvin, of Salem, O. These are worthy of the honor bestowed on them. The brief addresses to the graduating class by the class professors, Colman Bancroft and G. A. Peckham, and the address of President Zollars in presenting the diplomas, were gems of their kind.

The afternoon of commencement day was given up to the Alumni of the college and the old students. After the literary program had been executed, about 125 sat down at the Alumni banquet.

Hon. C. B. Lockwood was chosen president of the board of trustees, F. M. Green vice-president, and Alanson Wilcox secretary. The meeting of the board of trustees revealed the fact that the affairs of the college are in good condition. What Hiram needs now more than anything else is a large increase in its permanent endowment. About $30,000 have been added during the past year to this fund. The proceeds, however, of this addition are not yet available for college purposes. The permanent endowment ought to be immediately increased $100,000. This is necessary for the present needs of the institution. The average attendance by terms during the year that is past is the largest in the history of the institution. The average term attendance for 1897 and 1898 was 338. There were 421 different students during the year, of which 156 were ladies and 265 were gentlemen. Hiram makes no plea for help except on the basis of merit. It stands high among the colleges of the state of Ohio, and takes no second place among the colleges that represent the Disciples of Christ. Liberty in the noblest sense, loyalty to the Word of God, and abiding confidence in the great mission of the Disciples are characteristics of Hiram. Here any one with the form of a man, the mind of a man, and the heart of a man, is welcome no matter what the color of his skin, the character of his ancestry, or the conditions of his childhood, and until he forfeits his place by his own wrong-doing his welcome is not abridged and his tenure to the friendship of the college is unbroken. Hiram has a history, but she rests not on that only for her recognition. With dauntless face she looks into the future and promises a rich harvest to those who invest their means for her present success and her future enlargement and possibilities. Hiram is no provincial school. Her students during the year just closed came from Ohio, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Mississippi, South Australia, New York, Iowa, Canada, Japan, Minnesota, Kentucky, Texas, South Dakota, New Mexico, Illinois, Virginia, Washington, D. C., Florida, Georgia, Wisconsin, Maine and Missouri.

Hiram enters on the new year in her history with high hope, and may her hope be realized.

Farmers Break the Buggy Monopoly.

It is claimed that for years buggy manufacturers have secured exorbitant prices for their goods, but recently, through the combined assistance of the farmers of Iowa, Illinois and other states, SEARS, ROEBUCK & Co., of Chicago, have got the prices of open buggies down to $16.50; Top Buggies, $22.75; Top Surries, $43.75 and upwards, and they are shipping them in immense numbers direct to farmers in every state. They send an immense Buggy Catalogue free, postpaid, to any one who asks for it. This certainly is a big victory for the farmer, but a severe blow to the carriage manufacturers and dealers.

Notes and News.

The Harlem Avenue Church, Baltimore, has secured a corner lot in the northwestern part of the city and contemplates a new house of worship soon.

The annual convention of the New York Christian Missionary Society will assemble with the Church of Christ at 169th Street, New York City, N. Y., August 31, 1898 and continue to September 2nd.

The annual meeting of the Disciples of Christ on Prince Edward Island will meet at Montague, P. E. I., from July 8 to 11, 1898.

The annual convention of Disciples of Christ in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, at Tiverton, N. S., Aug. 11-14, 1898.

Owing to the continued absence of Dr. Klapsch, superintendent of the Sunday-school at Sterling Place, it has been well managed by Bro. John R. Tuler, a faithful Disciple. The school is in a promising condition. A large donation in cash was made to assist the church. Reports show an increase of attendance over last year. Dr. Klapsch was present but one Lord's day during the year. Bro. Tuler seemed to fill his place successfully. The school adjourned last Sunday for the summer vacation until Sept. 13. T. De Quincy Tully.

Brooklyn, N. Y., June 23, 1898.

We are now in the fourth week of a meeting conducted by H. Warner Newby, of Denver, Col. Much wealth has been added to the church in heads of families. The additions to date are mostly middle-aged people. Bro. Newby is a forcible speaker. He is highly spiritual and is a power in the pulpit for good. No church will make a mistake in securing him as evangelist. I have known him personally several years and know of many hundreds of baptisms by his hands.

A. A. Arthur, pastor.

Washington, Kan., June 25, 1898.

Monday, June 20th, 1798, at Greeley, Ia., I had the pleasure of uniting in marriage Bro. C. L. Organ and Miss Katie G. Kleckner. Bro. Organ is the popular young minister of the Church of Christ at Greeley. This is his first work in the ministry. He is loved by all classes for his work's sake. Sister Organ is an estimable and worthy young lady, and will be an efficient helpmeet in her husband's chosen work. W. M. Hollett.

Arlington, Ia.

Our Children's Day exercises were held in the church on the 17th inst. Our auditorium, which had just been refrescoed and recarpeted, was filled to its utmost capacity. Many were turned away. The collection has exceeded all all anticipations. It has reached $130.17, with others to hear from. The birthday box gave us $14.84. W. J. Morrison, Supt.

Bellaire, O., June 27, 1898.

During the year just closing we have added 22 to the Forest City congregation and succeeded in getting all the discords harmonized. At Bluff City we baptized six during the year. This is my mission point and the Lord is blessing our labors there. We have gathered in about 36 members there. The Forest City congregation has given me a call for another year, one-half time. The third Lord's day in this month we baptized a gentleman 53 years old at Forest City. His wife has been a member for a long time and he has been a good man. The Baptist pastor attended our meeting in January during the delivery of a series of discourses on first principles and the leaven changed the lump and Elder A. R. Hunt united with the Church of Christ at Tarkio, the third Lord's day in June. He is a young man of unblemished character. Has been the pastor of the Baptist Church here for four years. Everybody likes him and the congregation that secures him as pastor will always rejoice. Bro. Hunt is a conscientious man of good education. He is a graduate of the Baptist College of Liberty, Mo., and brings to us the experience of a six years' ministry. W. H. Hardman.

Closed a meeting of three weeks last Lord's day evening at Carthage, S. D. We had only four added during the meeting, and they by letter. We found a few badly disconraged Disciples, but succeeded in locating a pastor in the person of H. C. Shipley, of Drake University. He takes the work for three months, and if suited to the field will continue. Bro. W. H. Mullins, president State Board of South Dakota Missionary Society, had been running over from Hetland and preaching to them twice per month, and had succeeded in sufficiently reviving them as to undertake the meeting. Miss Pearl Wiley led the singing. She is a good leader and a very fine soloist. She belonged to the Congregationalits, but united with us during the meeting. She is ready to sing for meetings. Churches or evangelists wanting a singer for meetings cannot make a mistake in getting Sister Wiley. Address her at Carthage, S. D. This state is a fine field and young men willing to work can find plenty to do. Most every town has more or less Disciples. Go look them up and establish a church and preach to it.

Evangelistic.

MISSOURI.

Golden City, June 27.—Filled my regular appointment at Nashville yesterday. There were eight additions. Three came in the month before. Four additions here at last meeting.—W. A. Warren, Jr.

NEW YORK.

Gloversville, June 23.—I began a meeting here on Wednesday, the 22nd, in the W. T. C. U. parlor. This is a beautiful little city of about 17,000 people. I find no church organization, but 15 or 20 good people, who are loyal Disciples. Our meetings are growing in numbers and in interest. I hope to plant a good church. —J. M. Morris, state evangelist.

ILLINOIS.

Taylorville, June 27, 1898.—Baptized two yesterday; four additions since last report.—W. W. Weedon.

LaHarpe, June 27.—Preached four nights at Trumbull, last week; baptized eight. There were four added at our regular services here Sunday night.—K. C. Ventress.

NORTH DAKOTA.

Ellendale, June 27.—We began a meeting here yesterday. W. A. Foster is doing the preaching. I am leader of song.—T. S. Noblitt, pastor.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Carthage, June 26.—Two additions.—H. C. Shipley.

ARKANSAS.

Eureka Springs, June 28, 1898.—One confession and baptism. Summer visitors arriving and prospects brightening in every respect.—Daniel Trundle.

Kansas City, Mo.—I had a delightful visit at Newport, Ark; five confessions. Bro. J. H. Fuller is the pastor, and I have never met a young man who impressed me more favorably. Why he is allowed by our larger churches, that need strong men, to stay down there and labor largely at his own charges, can only be accounted for on the ground that they don't know him. Let some strong church that wants a man call Bro. Fuller. July and August, especially the latter, are fine months for tabernacle meetings. I want to help some congregation during these months; write me.—T. W. Cottingham.

INDIANA.

Portland Mills, June 23.—We closed last night the best meeting Portland has had for 40 years. We had 37 additions. Started the congregation on a self-supporting basis and have reorganized for permanent work. Bro. Jack Ashley, of Indianapolis, did the preaching and the singing was conducted by Bro. Walter Rhodes, of Peoria, Ill.—Samuel McManus, Elder.

TERRIBLE BREAKING OUT

CURED BY CUTICURA

I was afflicted with a terrible breaking out. I was treated by the very best physicians, who pronounced it blood poison, but it got worse. I was suffering untold agony, and finally had to give up work. Cuticura Remedies were suggested, which I immediately procured. From the first, I experienced a soothing relief, notwithstanding my intense pain. I improved right along till at last I was entirely cured, and not a sign on my body anywhere indicating that anything had ever been the matter with me.

IOWA.

Mt. Auburn, June 27.—Closed a short meeting here the 15th inst. Results 15 additions.—Jas. T. Nichols.

Stuart, June 27.—One confession here yesterday at our regular service.—E. T. McFarland.

Dows, June 27.—Two additions at regular service. We organized a Y. P. S. C. E. last night. This is a new field. We will begin the Endeavor work with about 15 members and perhaps several honorary members and some associate members. Most of the members here are old people, but we hope to get the young ones interested.—F. L. Davis.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

South McAlester, June 27.—Meeting closed after two weeks' work. Poor preaching and no work by the members. Small collections and six additions by letter. I go to Mena, Ark., where my next meeting is.—Arthur W. Jones, evangelist.

TENNESSEE.

Clarksville.—A fine meeting June 26th; one confession.—A. M. Growden, pastor Church of Christ.

MINNESOTA.

Evangelist A. B. Moore is now at Redwood Falls in a tent meeting with good attendance. Prof. J. Howard Sweetman is his colaborer as singing evangelist (D. L. Smith, the former singer, having been obliged to leave the state in consequence of a slight throat affection), and a good work is anticipated. But one cloud dots the horizon, and that is that K. W. White, the pastor, has resigned to leave for another field, July 6th. Another pastor will be secured at once, or at the earliest day practicable. The Austin meeting, held by Bro. Moore, continued three weeks with three additions, though Bro. Moore continued with the brethren three weeks longer in the interest of the erection of a church home. Thirty-one brethren are congregated in this town of 500 population, of whom Bro. Moore writes: "They are a plucky little band and I can't help admiring them. I have not based my standard of success on simply numbering accessions, but on service to Christ; being willing to work with and for them to the end that a church should be established that would go on. Allowing for my hopefulness, I think a chapel can be completed by winter and no bigger burden be on the congregation than it now bears in paying hall rent. People are now getting the impression that we mean to make it a success and considerable interest is manifested by some of the people outside. Offers of money in small amounts have been tendered, if we build, and this unsolicited. Regarding the meeting proper, will say that it started well the first week, but that war excitement killed it. A regiment was raised and we could not recover from the effects."—Frank H. Mellen, Sec.

MAGAZINES.

A master hand has pictured the life and influence of the late William Ewart Gladstone in The Chautauquan for July. Pres. Charles J. Little, of Northwestern University, has shown the "Grand Old Man" as a statesman, a man man of God and a stern advocate of justice. "Old Ironsides," by Edward S. Ellis, A. M., is a character sketch of "Commodore" Charles Stewart, who in his eighty-third year demanded of President Lincoln to be allowed to enter the service of his country.

The Review of Reviews continues strong on war topics. In the July number the editor reviews the whole campaign up to the landing of our troops for the advance on Santiago, showing the precise part which Lieutenant Hobson's exploit had in the general scheme; Dr. William Hayes Ward treats of Hobson's career as that of the typical young American student; Mr. Edwin Emerson, Jr., the brilliant young newspaper correspondent, gives notes of his adventurous journeyings in Porto Rico last month; and Dr. Max West, the statistician and economist, summarizes "Our New War Taxes" in an interesting article. "International Cartoon Comments on Our War with Spain" and the "Record of Current Events" also cover the situation up to date.

The leading article in Pall Mall for July deals with naval problems to be solved in the present war. The author, Mr. H. W. Wilson, is a naval expert and his opinions will attract a wide interest in the naval world.

The Woman's Home Companion for July is a companionable number. The patriotic articles in prose and poetry are in touch with the times, and all departments filled with fresh interesting literature.

The new features of the midsummer number of the Ladies' Home Journal makes it one of the handsomest and most interesting numbers of the year. The August number, it is announced, will be made up almost entirely of fiction. The July number is a compliment to our President.

The table of contents of the July Century is suggestive of an exceptionally interesting number. It breathes strongly of the patriotic spirit, while its numerous articles bearing directly and indirectly on naval and army maneuvers and men make a historic number of no little value. Variety in its literature, however, is not wanting. Its characteristically broad scope of subjects is as prominent as usual.

There are many seasonable features in the July number of St. Nicholas. All boys and girls will be interested in "Some Ships of Our Navy," a series of fifteen pictures of representative American war vessels, reproduced from photographs. Lieutenant Philip Andrews, U. S. N., describes the "Ceremonies and Etiquette of a Man-of-War," showing the honors with which distinguished visitors are received on board, the different kinds of salutes, etc.

The Lectureship.

The Missouri Christian Lectureship and the Missouri Christian Ministerial Association will convene this year at Carrollton. July 18-22 is the time and now is the time for you to decide to attend, if you have not already made such decision. An unusually fine program has been announced, and the church at Carrollton is anxious to entertain you. Let all who expect to attend send to me their names, that homes may be provided. Come. J. T. OGLE.

The Pennoyer

is a healthy building in a healthy climate. The imperfect sanitary arrangements at some summer resorts counteract all the benefits derived from the pure air.

A Health Resort

first, and a place for recreation second, is The Pennoyer. Medical care, skilled nursing, luxurious baths and home comforts make it an ideal place for convalescents and those worn or tired in body or mind. The house and grounds —75 acres—are situated on the banks of Lake Michigan. Cool breezes, fresh air, pure water, perfect drainage and choice food make an ideal summer resort. Amusements follow naturally. Write for illustrated booklet telling all about it.

A Hidden Singer.

LISA A. FLETCHER.

She sang with all the tender grace
Of one who knoweth Sorrow's face,
And beautiful of soul and strong,
Breathed forth her ministries of song.

Beauty her spirit strangely stirred,
Thrilled it with music like a bird,
Who to its winsome mate its love
Pours forth ecstatic song to prove.

Though life to her seemed unfulfilled,
Yet down the years her songs distilled
In many a heart to her unknown,
A joy responsive to her own.

Could she have seen when some sweet thought
With deep and tender meanings fraught,
Winged comfort to some soul afar,
Shining upon it like a star,

Her own heart had the happier been,
And throbbed with keener joy within;
Yet no sweeter strain had breathed to earth
Than that which drew from pain its birth.

Afar from worldly din and strife,
Patient was lived the hidden life
Of one who bore the cross of pain,
Bequeathing us the final gain.

One who in life wore not the crown,
And years have passed and years have flown,
Since meekly all life's lessons conned,
She passed into the Great Beyond.

JUDAS MACCABÆUS.

MARY BLACK CLAYTON.

When the conscience of Cyrus of Babylon prompted him to permit the remnant of the Jewish nation to return to the city of their love, what a joyful procession must have stretched its great length over the plain. Ezra, the Scribe, tells us that the whole congregation together was forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty, besides their servants and their maids, who numbered three hundred and thirty-seven, with horses, mules and camels innumerable. This great host turned eagerly toward Jerusalem, the holiest spot on earth, made more precious by the homesicknesses and longings of seventy years. Their joy was suppressed, however, when they came upon the desolation of the Holy City. The gates were prone, the glorious temple had been leveled, and the vineyards, olive grounds and wheat fields laid barren before them. Such was their home coming, but peacefully, persistently and faithfully, they built and restored and tilled. The city gates were uplifted. The walls were partially rebuilt and fortified, but not after the impregnable manner of the days of David. A temple rose on the ancient site, which did not dazzle with gold and precious stones, and was not inlaid with such costly woods as was Solomon's magnificent pile, but within its walls the happy people practiced in peace the rites of their religion. Green came again upon the fields, and the fruits of the earth were plentiful.

The Persian kings protected the colony, the internal government being administered by the High Priest, which was an hereditary office.

Thus God's people worshiped and worked for two hundred years, making no history, and inspiring no jealousy, until, at length, the ground of Judea shakes with the tread of the army of the young conqueror of the world—Alexander the Great. Persia had fallen before his ever-victorious arms, and with it Judea had come under his dominion.

The rumor reaches Jerusalem that he, the Unconquerable One, is coming. Prayers and sacrifices are ordained by the High Priest. He clothes himself in the awful insignia of his office, the mitre upon which the name of God is emblazoned rests upon his brow, and his garments are of precious purple and blue and pure linen.

The remainder of the faithful are clad in robes of white. The High Priest leads his people, in procession, without the gates, to a high hill overlooking Jerusalem.

When Alexander reaches the Holy City, and sees the white and shining throng, and the mitre upon which flashes the name of God, he stands forth from his army, and adores the Deity of the Jews. Afterwards he gives his right hand to God's High Priest and thus taking the lead, he marches into Jerusalem followed by his soldiers, and the men of Israel.

Right gracious and gentle he was, granting the requests of the High Priest as to laws and tributes, and fascinating, by his splendor and his clemency, many of the young men of Judea who were willing to join his legions and carry his triumphal banners.

His yoke was not burdensome, but his military career was meteoric, lasting only twelve years. He died at the age of thirty-two, in 323 B. C.

Shortly after his death Ptolemy of Egypt stormed Jerusalem on the Sabbath, the Jews refusing to join battle on the holy day. Judea became the battle ground for the contending armies of Egypt and Syria.

The anguish of tyranny and destruction fell upon the devoted people of God, when King Antiochus IV. of Syria took possession of Jerusalem. His crimes against the Jews form one of the most awful stories which stain the pages of history. To begin with, he deposed the High Priest, destroyed the sacred books, stole the gold and silver vessels used in the service, dedicated God's Holy Place to Jupiter, established idol worship in it, and finally drove a herd of swine through its sacred precincts. The women and children of the Jews were carried into captivity, and a general massacre was ordered, in which, according to Josephus, 40,000 people were murdered. Antiochus also caused to be built a stony fortress upon an eminence commanding Jerusalem and the Temple, in which he placed a strong garrison of Syrian soldiers. Many of the stricken people fled to the more serene countries, Greece, Italy and Egypt. There they were peaceable and industrious, but entirely unyielding in regard to a change of religion. They carried their faith with them, and in all the large cities which gave them shelter, synagogues arose. The Apocrypha ends this story of desolation in these words: "And there was very great wrath upon Israel."

The time is ripe for a deliverer. In countries, or families, help is wont to come from Heaven when the skies grow too dark to see God's face. In Modin, near the sea, lived an old man, wise, influential, rich, named Mattathias. He was the fortunate father of five valiant and faithful sons. He was aroused to a just fury when he saw the most sacred places of his people robbed and ruined, fair Judea laid waste and his countrymen murdered for the sake of their religion. When the Syrian officers urged them to worship on the altars which Antiochus had substituted for the service of the Most High, the brave old man cried aloud with a voice like the roar of a hungry lion, "Though all the nations that are under the King's dominion obey him, and fall away every one from the religion of their fathers, and give their consent to his commandments, yet will my sons, my brethren and I walk in the covenant of our fathers!" As the words left his lips, he saw one of his people worshiping according to the commands of the wicked King. He could not control his zeal, and slew the traitor where he kneeled. While his wrath was hot he also killed the King's commissioner, whose business it was to compel the Jews to worship false gods. Roused and reeking Mattathias, followed by his sons, rushed through the streets of the city crying, "Whosoever is zealous of the law and maintaineth the covenant, let him follow me." The adherents of the wrathful old leader increased in number like the growth of a rolling snowball, and many men, women and children followed him to the wilderness. They were pursued. It was the Sabbath. The Jews refused to fight, preferring, as they said, "to die in their innocency." One thousand Jews were put to death by the Syrian army. Mattathias escaped, but was so stricken by the fate of his followers that after weighing in the balance human life, and literal obedience without reservation, he decided in favor of fighting on the Sabbath, if he should be attacked on that day. The outraged and patriotic Jews rallied around him, and, with old age upon him, he made superhuman efforts for his people. In one year he succeeded in raising an army, drove the invading Syrians from Judea, overthrew the altars of the heathen and restored the law. He did not gain his fighting material by the offer of pelf or plunder. In return for fidelity to God and country he assured his men of a glorious immortality. His last words were, "Wherefore, ye my sons, be valiant and show yourselves men in the behalf of the law, for by it you shall often glory. And behold, I know that your brother Simon is a man of counsel, give ear unto him always; he shall be a father unto you. As for Judas Maccabæus, he hath been mighty and strong even from his youth up, let him be your captain, and fight the battles of the people." Then the old man, wise in counsel, and brave in battle, went to the place set apart for heroes, at the ripe age of one hundred and forty-four years.

Judas, surnamed Maccabæus (supposed to mean hammer or hard knocks), wore the mantle of his father, and it fitted him more exactly than the mantles of most great men fit their sons.

The family name of these defenders of the faith was Asmon, but Judas, being greater and more conspicuous than his brethren, they go down in history collectively as the Maccabees.

We are told that Judas "fought with great cheerfulness the battles of Israel, so he got his people great honor, and put on a breastplate as a giant, and girt his warlike harness upon him, and he made battles, protecting the host with his sword. In his acts he was like a lion, and like a lion's whelp roaring for its prey."

Apolonius, military governor of Samaria, set forth to rid the earth of this man, so bold and rash, who, with a small and undisciplined band of men, expected to defy him—Apolonius. They clashed in battle, the hammerer hammered, and Judas the Mighty slew the military governor of Samaria, and during the rest of his career used the sword of the Syrian upon the bodies of the enemies of the Lord. It was a goodly weapon, well tempered and jeweled, and the flash of it was the last thing in sight of many men who warred with Judas. A great many of the heathen bit the dust upon the day of the sword capture, and the set showed their backs in retreat, and Judas got their spoils.

Next comes Seron, who is higher in rank than Apolonius, has more soldiers, and is commander-in-chief of the Syrian forces in Palestine. He said, "I will get a name and honor in the kingdom, for I will go fight with Judas, and them that are with him who despise the king's commandments. He chooses well his time for attack, and falls upon Judas when his following is small, and his men are weary and fasting, and appalled by the imposing array of the enemy's army. The great leader of Israel cheers his drooping soldiers by his bravery and faith in God, saying "the victory to battle standeth not in the multitude, but strength cometh from Heaven." The result justified the faith of Judas. Seron and his great army were routed. The name and fame of Judas Maccabæus became a terror to the heathen nations.

Then Antiochus, the wicked king of Syria, vowed the extermination of this rebellious horde of Jews. He gathered a mighty force, paid them a year in advance, hired mercenaries from foreign countries to help them, and vowed he would "break" Jerusalem before spring—but before that time came he had decided to break Jerusalem by proxy. He repaired to Persia to exact tribute from the various provinces, and to seize the treasures which were supposed to be hidden in royal cities beyond the Euphrates. All this plunder was to be used to trample the life out of the Jewish nation. Half his forces went with him to rifle foreign parts, and the other half were to fight under Lysias, a nobleman of princely blood, who was to be commander-in-chief, vice Antiochus, who had gone plundering to Persia. Lysias selected three mighty men of the king's household to be his lieutenants, gave them forty thousand footmen, and seven thousand horsemen, and ordered them to hunt down the rebels and destroy them.

When Judas and his brothers discovered that the eneny, in large numbers, was camping on their borders, they rallied their followers, and prepared for the greatest struggle of their lives.

The first step Judas took in preparation for the coming strife was to discharge those of his army who were newly married, who were building a house, who had planted a vineyard, or who were "fearful" lest love of life should interfere with their courage, and thus stampede the whole host. The last step he took in preparation was to ask the compassion of the God of battles, and remind his soldiers of the persecutions and sorrows of their people, saying, "Fear ye not this multitude—remember how our fathers were delivered in the Red Sea when Pharaoh pursued them with an army." Beyond the help which cometh from Above, Judas had three thousand men, badly equipped, intrenched in the mountains about twenty miles from Jerusalem. There the enemy expected to surprise the Jews and rout them. The generalship of Judas was never at fault, however, the traits of the lion and the fox being blended in his character. He discovered the plans of the foe, broke his camp, and did the surprising himself. He approached the enemy warily, and rushed his troops upon the unprepared Syrians with a force like that of the American fall at Niagara when it leaps over the cliff, the enemy showed disappearing backs, Judas pursued them, and killed three thousand of them, the number killed being as great as the size of the whole army of Judas, and took immense spoil of gold and silver, and purple and blue silk, which was hoarded for the adornment of the Temple of God.

When Lysias, the commander-in-chief, learned the awful disaster of his army he was confounded and dismayed. Nevertheless he began at once to make preparation to overpower Judea with a force so strong that it must put an end to the struggle. In the following year he attempted to carry out this plan, with the same result of utter defeat and disgrace of the Syrian arms.

This tale of war-harness, attacks, defeats, victories and pursuits, grows monotonous, and it is a pleasing variety to write that our mighty warrior before the Lord could unbuckle his armor, and between his sword flashes, go up to Jerusalem the Holy and much chastened, to purify and restore the sanctuary, which had lain desolate for five years. At the first sight of its ruin the men of war mourned, rending their garments and putting ashes on their heads. How strange this manner of exhibiting grief in the times of antiquity, seems to us, who spare our garments and our hearts are rent! Then began the sacred work, which is always better than lamentation. The altars of Jehovah were fitted for his service, the gates uplifted, the grass grown court restored, the priests' chambers prepared for them, new holy vessels were made, the front of the temple was adorned with crowns and shields of gold, and Judas protected the temple with high walls and towers which he garrisoned with soldiers, for the Syrians still held the baleful fortress, which threatened the temple and the city. With sacrifices and songs and prayers and feasting, the glad people rededicated their sanctuary, and as long as it stood, the anniversary of its restoration was held sacred and called the feast of the dedication.

Justice fell upon Antiochus, called the Great, who had gone to Persia to gather pelf with which to persecute the Jews. On his way to Judea he received news of the defeat of the army of Lysias, and the worshipers of Jehovah were in a fair way to freedom, wrought by the sword of Judas Maccabæus. Filled with overmastering fury, he was stricken with a sudden illness, which was called "distemper" by Josephus and less vaguely by Dr. Lord, elephantrasis. At any rate, he was loathsome to his friends and attendants. When he knew death was upon him, he confessed his crimes saying, "Now I remember the evils that I did at Jerusalem, and that I took all the vessels of gold and silver that were therein and sent to destroy the inhabitants without a cause." The reins of the government of Syria fell to the young son of Antiochus, whose advisers were as cruel as the arch fiend just dead.

Not yet was the sword of Judas to be sheathed. The restoration of the sanctuary of God infuriated the nations round about Judea, and they banded themselves together to restore idol worship. Truly the Jewish exiles had suffered much "by the rivers of Babylon," but this period of desecration and bloodshed was far worse. Again the Hammerer gathered his small force to make a mighty struggle against the ever-menacing fortress of the enemy. Hearing of his purpose, Syria sent into Judea one hundred thousand foot soldiers, twenty thousand horse and thirty-two elephants. Judas, as usual, with enormous odds against him, defeated the host of the heathen, but his brother Eleazer was killed in the struggle. Thinking he would strike a great blow for the liberty of his country, he watched an immense elephant who bore the royal arms of Syria, cut his way through the thick of the battle, crept under the elephant, and gave him a mortal wound. The elephant did not carry the king. It fell upon Eleazer and crushed out his life.

Enough of battle, murder and sudden death, although there is plenty of material to supply more chronicles of the same sort. At last the lion heart of Judas grows heavy. His army is dwindling on account of the great number of the men who had fallen in battle.

The fame of the Romans had reached him, how brave and strong they were, how willing to make a league of amity with all who came to them in peace, how many nations they had conquered, and how, in spite of all their glory, no one among them wore a crown. He decided to send an embassy to this far country to invoke protection for his country. The embassadors were graciously received and a treaty was made between Rome and Judea. It did not, however, prevent the hostilities of Syria.

Another great army encamped against Jerusalem. The hope of the hero was at last waning, but not his courage. His companions besought him not to give battle, but he did not heed them. Stubbornly fighting Judas Maccabæus fell, never to rise, between two wings of the Syrian army.

Thus the event is chronicled in the book of Maccabees: "Judas also was killed and the remnant fled. Then Jonathan and Simon took Judas, their brother, and buried him in the sepulcher of their father in Moden. Moreover, they bewailed him, and all Israel made great lamentation for him, and mourned many days saying, 'How is the mighty fallen!'"

His brother Johnathan kept up the fight for two years and was then treacherously murdered, being enticed to the enemy's camp under promise of amicable counsel.

Semon the wise, took upon himself the leadership. He was the son of Mattathias. He accomplished the destruction of the infamous fortress which so long commanded the Holy City for murderous purposes. He also strengthened the defences of the temple. The vine and fig tree flourished once more under his rule and the friendly alliance with Rome was renewed. He was murdered by his son-in-law in the year 135 B. C., thus ending the story of the Maccabees.

The Bravest Sailor of All.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

I know a naval officer, the bravest fighting man;
He wears a jaunty sailor suit, his cap says "Puritan."
And all day long he sails a ship between our land and Spain,
And he avenges, every hour, the martyrs of the Maine.

His warship is six inches square, a washtub serves for ocean;
But never yet, on any coast, was seen such dire commotion.
With one skilled move his boat is sent from Cuba to midsea,
And just as quickly back it comes to set Havana free.

He fights with Dewey; plants his flag upon each island's shore,
Then off with Sampson's fleet he goes to shed the Spanish gore.
He comes to guard New England's coast, but ere his anchor falls
He hurries off in frightful speed, to shell Manila's walls.

The Philippines so frequently have yielded to his power.
There's very little left of them, I'm certain, at this hour;
And when at last he falls asleep, it is to wake again
And hasten into troubled sees and go and conquer Spain.

How a Warship Fights.

Before a battleship goes into action all spare gear is stowed away, and her decks are made as bare as possible. This is in order that the enemy's shot may find but little to make splinters of should it come aboard. A warship possesses three means of attack; that is, her guns, ram and torpedoes. The guns range from 110-ton weapons that throw an 1,800-pound projectile with a charge of 960 pounds of power, down to three-pounder quick-firers.

Some of the battleships carry as many as fifty-four guns, thirty-five of which are able to discharge in one broadside, thus throwing some 3,618 pounds of iron per minute at the enemy. The effective range of the big guns is over ten miles, and ten shots per minute can be thrown by the quick-firing ones. One of the big battleships fighting at close quarters with her Maxims in play would hurl at the foe about 2,600 projectiles per minute, these varying in weight from 1,800 pounds to one ounce. Some of these projectiles would be filled with high explosives, and would destroy everything for yards around the place where they exploded. As British possessions are so widely scattered that ships have to remain for a long time away from ammunition bases, they carry much more shot per gun than do other foreign men-of-war.

When a ship is commissioned, the first thing that her crew does is to practice general quarters until they are able to clear for action and be ready to fire a broadside within three minutes from the order being given. Eventually, however, the crew get to know the ship so well that they can get her ready for action in a minute and a half. This they have to do by night as well as day. Probably the captain chooses midnight when all but the watch are fast asleep to order quarters to be sounded. Immediately the bugle rings out, every man jumps from his hammock and rushes straight for the station, each one endeavoring to be at his post first. For a couple of minutes the clanging of iron doors and the clanking of chains are heard throughout the ship; then all is silent again. The bright muzzles of the guns glisten out at the ports; down in the magazines are men ready to send ammunition to the gunners on the decks above; the torpedo crews have placed white heads in the tubes, and every other preparation has been made to give battle to an enemy.

Illuminated sights are used on the guns at night. Each big gun is worked by what is termed a "crew;" that is, a number of sailors or marine artillerymen specially told off to it. The captain, or number one, as he is called, lays the gun and fires it, the other members of the "crew" stand in file to pass the projectiles and load the gun. There is also a crew to each torpedo tube. These tubes are nearly all submerged.—Selected.

The Supreme Moment.

Two young men recently volunteered to go to Cuba on important missions for the government. They both had left their homes, entered the army, became soldiers, were selected for special service, accepted the responsibility, sailed away, and reached the shores of the island. In these things both were exactly alike, and each as good a soldier as the other. When the supreme test of their courage came, how did they carry themselves? The one, thinking nothing of himself, and only of his mission, bravely faced danger, made his way to the insurgent chief, delivered his messages, secured important information, and returned, through many privations, amid the plaudits of his countrymen, to his place in the army. The other, on reaching the Cuban port, seeing the sad plight of the half-starved insurgents, and hearing from them of the sufferings they were undergoing, refused to land with his comrades, and on the return of the ship was found hid away in the hold. Under arrest and in disgrace he was brought back to Key West. His courage failed him in the supreme moment. Differing only in this one thing, they are wholly different ever after. The first receives the thanks of his superior officers and of a grateful country, and is advanced to high promotion; the other is dismissed in disgrace from the army and is drummed out of camp for cowardice. Having been tested and found true, the one is in line for still more eminent service; the other, having quailed in the presence of danger, will never have an opportunity to retrieve himself or serve his country.

How like life everywhere. It is the men who forget themselves in doing fearlessly the duty next to them who serve their fellows, winning probably not wealth nor fame, but surely the inheritance of heaven, and the commendation of the King of kings. It is the Christian soldier, equipped, trained, armored, experienced, and victorious, of whom the apostle Paul was thinking when he said "having done all, to stand."—Religious Telescope.

The Glorious Fourth.

Soon the happiest day of the year will have come! And why should it be the happiest? Because it is the birthday of the greatest and best Republic the world has ever seen—a Republic which has demonstrated for a century the power of men to preserve union and enforce laws for the public good. The people of the United States have more comfort, happiness and freedom than any nation present or past. Doubtless this results largely from our fertile and almost boundless national domain, but still more largely from the protection afforded by laws made by the people for the people and enforced by the people. There is no country better supplied, if so well, with churches, ministers, colleges, schools and missionary societies; and no country is so far advanced in temperance reformation. The nations of the world regard these United States with wonder, admiration and awe, seeing in this Republic a nation which will, ere another hundred years, doubtless be the most populous, wealthy, prosperous, and powerful in the world. In these circumstances, thankfulness for the present, and prayerfulness for the future, should everywhere abound, from the dug-out on the prairies to the White House.

Our Beloved Land.

Patriotism and piety are inseparably united in true hearts. Whether native or adopted citizens, we are Americans, and loyal to the flag that stands as the symbol and pledge of our republic—the church without a bishop, the state without a king. To no land under the whole heavens has the tide of immigration been so strong and continuous as to free America. Whatever may be true of the Old World, it is certainly true that millions of people see under our flag opportunities of wealth, education, freedom and religion enjoyed nowhere else under the sun. The stranger has found welcome here, and we demand of him allegiance to the government and allegiance to God. The atheistic anarchist is not welcome in God-fearing and law-abiding America. If he has come to endanger our property and destroy our life, the law says he must die. Nor will we tolerate interference at the ballot-box, or in the halls of legislation, or with our free institutions. The public schools are dear to us because they are the great lever which elevates our children to the plane of idtelligent, loyal citizenship. The flag of freedom floats over every schoolhouse. No foreign hierarchy dare lay hands upon this ark of the Lord. The world furnishes no better system of public education than is furnished in our public schools.—Lutheran Evangelist.

New occasions teach new duties; Time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upward still, and onward, who would keep abreast of Truth;
Lo, before us gleam her camp-fires! we ourselves must Pilgrims be,
Launch our Mayflower, and steer boldly through the desperate winter sea,
No attempt the Future's portal with the Past's blood-rusted key.

A Lesson in Manners.

Once upon a time a young man entered a railroad office where a number of other persons, all considerably older than himself, were employed. They all were so cold and selfish, so much immersed, each in his own concerns, and so indifferent to the finer amenities of life, that they were in the habit of meeting and of separating mostly in silence, and their intercourse was characterized by a certain bluff and gruff directness that must have surprised and startled the young man, although he made no sign. The place must have been somewhat uncomfortable to him at first, for he had been carefully trained to observe all the courtesies of life, and he must have felt as though he had been suddenly lifted out of the agreeable society in which he had hitherto moved and planted in the midst of another sort of people. Young as he was, however, he had a wise head on his shoulders, and while he steadily overlooked the absence of all polite courtesies toward himself, he never omitted them in his own personal demeanor.

When any of his associates performed the most trifling service for this young fellow he invariably remarked, "Thank you." If he desired anything he prefaced his request with the phrase, "If you please." When he met his associates in the morning he bade them "Good morning," and when they separated in the evening he said "Good night." At first the practical men among whom his lot was cast, simply stared at him in silence. Then they smiled at each other. They called him "the French dancing master" or "the dude," among themselves, remarked that he was entirely too refined for the sort of company he was keeping, and in various other ways amused themselves with what they were pleased to regard his eccentricity. Nothing discouraged, however, and because it was his nature to be polite the young fellow went on observing the proprieties of social intercourse, and in the course of time, almost unconsciously to themselves, his rude associates began to say, "If you please," and "Thank you," and to manifest various other marks of good breeding and culture. The young man's example had actually won them to a cultivation of the graces of life!

The polite young gentleman no longer occupies the desk which gave him such fine opportunities for civilizing a lot of human bears. In spite of his courteous conduct and polite ways he is no drawing-room ornament, but a manly and courageous man. When the government called for volunteers to help drive the Spanish tyrant out of Cuba he was among the first to respond, and we doubt not that he will give a good account of himself, and prove as efficient a teacher of humanity, as in other fields, he has been an instructor in the graces of polite conduct. The narrative herewith given is true to the life. It has been written to show how powerful the influence of a single resolute life may be for good, and, it may be, to inspire other young men with the determination to be manly and courteous in whatever station they may be find themselves. — Central Christian Advocate.

"I want," said the excited Chicago woman at the telephone exchange, "my husband, please." "Number, please," said the polite operator. "Only the fourth, you impudent thing!" snapped back the fair telephoner; and when the operator failed to check a slightly audible smile, the bell rang off viciously.

Anxious Wife—"Do you know where my husband is, sir?" Klondyke Karl—"Th' last time I seen your husband, mum, he was goin' over the mountain." Anxious Wife—"In what direction?" Teacher—"Thomas, will you tell me what a conjunction is, and compose a sentence containing a conjunction?"

Thomas (after long and solemn reflection)—"A conjunction is a word connecting anything, such as, 'The horse is hitched to the fence by his halter.' Halter is a conjunction, because it connects the horse and the fence!"—Harper's Bazar.

Perpetuity of the Republic.

What are essential to the perpetuity of the republic? National unity; we must remain one people, knowing no North, South, East or West. Universal secular education; that man who interferes with this is an enemy to the republic, and he who would divert the public school funds to partisan or sectarian purposes would be guilty of taking a stone from the foundations of our national edifice. Toleration of all sects and beliefs and parties; essential freedom is the right to differ. The recognition of the nobility of labor; for it is the mission of the United States to ennoble labor and honor the toiler. National righteousness; "righteousness exalteth a nation."

Sacred be the trusts committed to our care, and bright the vision of coming ages. —Rev. T. H. Baragwunath, in the Preacher's Magazine for June.

Saying Grace.

Asking a blessing upon food before meals was a universal custom among the Jews, and was practiced both by Christ and the apostles (Luke 22:17-19; 26:30; Acts 27: 35). It is a most appropriate and helpful custom, and should be universal. Its spirit sanctifies the act of eating, transfigures it, even more than bright conversation renders it "the feast of reason, and the flow of soul." It is held by the Jews that he who partakes of anything without giving thanks, acts as if he was stealing it from God. Why especially over food? Because food is the basis of life, the source of supply for all other things, so that all are included under it. The formulæ in such cases were commonly short and simple, like our own, such as, "May God, the ever blessed One, bless what he has given us."—Ellicott.

THE CHAMPION OF JEHOVAH.*

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

The worship of Baal which was introduced during the reign of Ahab through the influence of his Zidonian wife, Jezebel, spread rapidly through the northern kingdom and profoundly affected the character of the nation. The more important towns and cities had their local shrines and images of Baal, and these Baals, or Baalim, scattered through the land, became the objects of worship for a large portion of the people. It is probable also that as the word Baal meant "Lord" it was not infrequently the case that the features of the Baal worship were introduced into the worship of Jehovah, and the latter thus became demoralized even where it did not lose entirely its primitive character. In connection with the shrine of Baal there was generally either an image of the god or a stone pillar representing his worship. He was the god of fire and power. His consort, Astarte, or Asherah, was generally associated with him at these local sancturaries, and her presence was denoted by a grove or tree or stake, which was called after her the Asherah. These symbols of the foreign cult possessed a sensuous meaning often found associated with religion among primitive people, and it was to this fact that the Baal worship owed it seductive character.

So far had the official sanction of Baalism gone that the prophets of Jehovah, the successors of those earlier bands or guilds of prophets associated with Samuel, were put to death or compelled to seek hiding from the fanatical enthusiasm of the foreign queen. So thoroughgoing was this persecution that when Elijah began his work, and indeed at the period of the great test on Mount Carmel, he felt himself to be absolutely alone representing the interests of Jehovah, the true God. He was afterward assured that the situation was not so hopeless as he had imagined, but that there was a remnant of the people still faithful to their ancient worship (1 Kings 19:18); and the king's steward, Obadiah, informed the prophet that he had hidden a hundred prophets of the Lord in caves (1 Kings 18:4). But practically Elijah was alone, and at the moment of crisis it was only his strong spirit that stood between the higher religious life of the nation and the prevalent and growing worship of Baal. The time of Elijah admirably illustrates that principle which all history discloses, that there is never a period in which righteousness is totally destroyed in a nation; there is always a remnant remaining, the seed of a new generation of true believers.

When the drought was at its worst the king, who had received Elijah's message of its coming with incredulity and scorn, was so harrassed by the fearful effects of the famine that he began a systematic search of his kingdom for the prophet, and when this failed he made inquiry among the neighboring nations. It was his turn to be concerned to meet the man of God. When at last they did come together Elijah met the king with bold and intrepid front, refuting the charge of responsibility for the national disaster, and in turn charging the king with being the author of all of Israel's calamities, because of his course in forsaking the worship of Jehovah. The issue was clear. Either Jehovah or Baal must be recognized as God. The nation could not live half faithful and half idolatrous, any more than a nation can live half slave and half free, or half sober and half intemperate. All the official prestige was on the side of Baal, but the prophet offered to put the whole matter to a test in one decisive moment at a conspicuous point, Mount Carmel. The king, who was probably but little concerned as to whether Baal or Jehovah prevailed, consented to the trial. The people were gathered in thousands. The four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal and the four hundred prophets of Astarte, who were particular proteges of Jezebel, were there to represent the heathen worship, while Elijah stood as the lonely champion of Jehovah. But God and one man are a majority. The heathen worship was given every advantage. Baal was the god of fire, and as his worship was celebrated by the burning of children as well as other fire-offerings, the test should be one of fire. But all day long the prophets of Baal called upon their god in a frenzy of hope and despair according to the wild practices of the ruder types of Semitic prophets. They shouted, they danced about the altar, they gashed themselves with knives to gain the ear of Baal, but all in vain. At last Elijah began to ridicule them with that biting sarcasm which the events of the day had so fully justified. It was evident that their god had gone on a journey, or was asleep, or was looking after other interests. Still he would not take advantage of their helplessness until every hope had perished that Baal would respond. At last, at sunset, after the whole day had been spent in a frantic effort to secure fire for the heathen altar, Elijah repaired the dismantled altar of Jehovah which had been the scene of earlier worship on that spot. Then after preparing his offering he drenched it with water until there could be no possibility of fraud in the appearance of fire, and poured out his soul to God in a passionate entreaty for a manifestation of power in order that the nation might be convinced of its folly in limping back and forth between adherence to Jehovah and reverence for Baal. The answer came in a shower of flame that consumed offering and altar, and brought the people to their knees in profound acknowledgment of the supremacy of Jehovah and the nothingness of Baal. Elijah celebrated his victory with swift retribution visited upon the prophets of the false religion, who perished to a man at the brook Kishon below, while the oncoming tempest compelled the king to hasten back to his place at Jezreel. The sway of Baal was broken, for the moment at least. Elijah was triumphant. Jehovah was vindicated, and the drought was at an end.

SUGGESTIONS FOR TEACHING.

There are many homes in which the altar of Jehovah which has been dismantled needs to be repaired. The same is true of individual lives where once the altar-fire of prayer arose, but where it has ceased to ascend. In all religious work the people of God are one; Elijah disregarded the divided kingdom and assumed the unity of the nation by taking twelve stones for his altar; the essential unity of Christians must be more fully emphasized and recognized; the sin of division must never be forgotten. The trial by fire on Carmel was not a foolish test of strength by Elijah, but rather a supreme appeal to God in a time of mortal danger; it is always foolish and sinful to put God to the test (Matt. 4:7); but it is just as foolish and sinful not to rely upon God to the utmost when the occasion comes for a supreme act of confidence. One need not expect miracles to-day in proof of God's presence or power; the gospel is the power of God unto salvation, and its victories are as marvelous as any miracle. Prayer that is as truly in line with God's purposes as was that of Elijah, and is uttered with as devoted and whole-hearted purpose, is certain to be answered. The miracles of the Bible group themselves about three striking personalities, Moses, Elijah and our Savior. Are there not in our own lives false gods who take the place of Jehovah and in whose interests we try to make compromise with the true faith?

CHRISTIANITY COMPARED WITH OTHER RELIGIONS.

It would be far better for us if we should adopt Paul's point of view at once, and Paul's missionary motive. Nothing can surpass the fair-mindedness and courtesy of Paul at Areopagus as he recognizes the religious spirit of his audience and their yearning after God. If we, too, instead of flinging in the teeth of those whom we seek to win to Christianity accusations of cold-hearted irreligion and benighted heathenism, were to give to the nation's credit for what they had found out about God, and were to seek to lead them by degrees from their present standpoint to higher light as Paul did, we should make greater progress in missions. If instead of talking in a despairing tone of the millions going down to Christless graves in darkest night, as if God were condemning them to some inky black fate because they chanced to be born in India or China, we were to take the manly attitude of appreciation for what light the heathen do possess and add to that light what we have in addition, missions would not suffer. I heard a nationally famous missionary worker, who is now at the head of a large missionary society in the East, say in conversation with a group of young men at Northfield, "We must never for a moment yield the heathen are without hope. If we do we cut the nerve of missions." Now that is a remark worthy of a politician who seeks to establish his work, no matter whether or not it be at the expense of truth. If we believe in our hearts that the heathen are all without hope let us say so; if not, not. Let the truth be spoken, no matter what nerve is cut. Let honesty and sincerity and manliness be ours, no matter what happens. It was ever Paul's attitude. The Presbyterian minister who was asked whether the conscientious heathen would be saved, and who replied, "That heathen hasn't been caught yet," was a little nearer the truth than many others. At the same time he was evidently afraid to take a manly stand for the truth as Paul did in the first chapter of Romans where he declares that all men shall be judged by the law they have. Indeed, in this whole matter of the attitude towards other religions, Paul with his tolerance and fairness, together with his indomitable missionary activity, is as good a model as we need this side of our Savior. Indeed, Jesus assumed the same position of respect toward Jewish law, Samaritan custom and heathen enquiry.

Paul recognized at Mars' Hill that all religions, however crude, are expressions of longing and aspiration after God, and that just as far as they had toiled upward they ought to receive credit due. And we find this very thing true of the religions which we encounter in the heathen world to-day. Some of the purest thoughts and the highest religious philosophy is to be found in the Hindu and Buddhistic systems. Some of the most admirable qualities are to be traced in their scriptures. It were better for us if we made ourselves thoroughly acquainted with these "sacred books of the East" before we denounce all Oriental though as malarial and miasmatic. It were better for all our missionaries if they took training in comparative religions before storming well-fortified Eastern citadels. The Confucian and Zoroastrian codes of ethics are by no means to be despised. It is a trite saying that Confucius uttered the Golden Rule, negatively stated to be sure, viz., "Do to no man what thou would not have done to thee," some five hundred years before our Master uttered it.

But while recognizing what there is good in these ancient religions we ought to approach them as Paul did, with the absolute confidence that we have something higher. Our light will dim theirs. The light of Asia must give place to the Light of the World. It will do no good to declare that their light is mere darkness, but it would be equally reprehensible to say that because they have an oil-lamp they do not need the arc light. The fact is that the saddest lack in the Oriental religions is the lack of life. It is morals, after all, that tells. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Religions that can foster infanticide, polygamy, child-marriage, and such, need a higher light. We need to save the heathen in this world, and God will care for the world to come. If for no other reason than to purify morals, add to human comfort and happiness and save from degradation and misery in this world, we need to send the gospel. It is the Christian life which is the strongest Christian argument. The Oriental systems preach well bnt do not practice. We preach and practice too—that is, some of the time. And here lies our warning, if we carry a more intellectual system without a pure life to the heathen, they will conquer us. We must take to them the Christ-life if we would cope with their keen mental weapons.

This is, therefore, the final superiority of Christianity—it is the religion of a person, and that Person is Christ. The world needs a center for thought and life and worship. It can find that center nowhere else so well as in a person. All other religions fail at this point and Christianity triumphs. We demand, we people, leadership. We need it in temporal affairs. We must have it in spiritual matters. We will follow a beloved leader to death. We are constituted so. So also our "heavenly vision" must be a leader, must be in the form of a man, must be endowed with the Spirit of God. Where shall we find this heavenly vision save in the Incarnation taught and lived by the Person, Jesus? With all due respect, then, and recognition for the world's religions, we say to them, "Sirs, come and see Jesus!"

Educational Conference.

The conference which has been in session two days has just closed. It is a great pleasure to be again in the atmosphere of this growing university. The meetings were held in Assembly Room, Haskell Museum, of the University of Chicago. The attendance is encouraging. Four of our leading colleges were represented by members of the faculties.

We as a people are making progress along educational lines. Prominent pastors were present from several states. Some of the points brought out were the following: The production of an educated and cultured university is our most important missionary work; more time should be given to the consideration of the college problem in our national conventions; doing missionary work that leaves out the educational question is like giving a tree plenty of air for the leaves, but denying it moisture for the roots; degrees that have a historical meaning should not be robbed of their import by conferring them for short courses of study; though it is often necessary for students to do some preaching while in the academic course; an excess should be guarded against both for the welfare of the student and the good of the congregation; the latter part of college courses may permit electives looking to the chosen life-work of the student; in the case of ministers some biblical studies may be taken; the place of the Greek New Testament is an important one in our distinctive work; many accepted theories under the keen eye of the critical Greek scholar vanish, and are replaced by more biblical and rational statements.

There was a somewhat divided opinion, not on the value of classical studies, but as to how much should give way to the demand for more room for science. Originally an A. B. meant little more than a knowledge of Greek and Latin, with elementary mathematics.

College libraries do not need to be so large as those of a university, but the books should be well selected. Not how many? but what kind? is the question. The political influence in relation to some state universities is carried to such a degree as to being an effort to cripple or destroy denominational schools. This must be resisted. The state institutions do not look after the religious side of the student's life sufficiently. We must sustain our church schools at all hazards with other religious bodies, if we would have an efficient ministry and see business life represented by Christian men and women.

After all, the man must be back of the book and the college to make the life of the instructed a moral force in erecting the stately fabric of a true and permanent Christian civilization. The Disciples' Club of the University gave a most delightful reception to the conference Tuesday evening in Haskell Hall. I shall leave this conference inspired with a greater determination to emphasize the importance of Christian education, and with the hope that we Disciples of Christ may be able to rise so high in the realization of duty and its performance that we shall see the threatening clouds of difficulty become — fog at our feet.

The C. E. Reading Courses.

THE LORD'S SUPPER.

F. D. POWER.

Our last Bible reading on the position of the Disciples in the light of Scripture deals with this important subject.

We read of a house of God on earth. This has been since the days of the tabernacle in the wilderness. The Most High dwells not in temples made with hands, yet he condescended to have a temple erected to himself and glorified it with symbols of his presence. Under Christ the church is called God's building, the temple of God, a spiritual house. In the Lord's house there is always the Lord's table. In the house over which Jesus presides as a Son, is a table more precious than gold as a part of its necessary furniture. It is declared to those who pollute themselves with idols, that they can not "be partakers of the Lord's table and the table of demons." Paul speaks of the cup of the Lord and the loaf as furniture of this table. Coming to this table with its divinely ordered furniture, the loaf and the cup, the loaf must be broken before the saints feed upon it and the institution of the Lord's Supper is thus called "the breaking of bread."

In accordance with apostolic usage we say "the Lord's day," "the Lord's table," "the Lord's house." Calling Bible things by Bible names we not say "the Sacrament" or "the Eucharist," but "the Lord's Supper," or "the breaking of bread." The loaf is broken. Jesus took a loaf from the paschal table and broke it. They received a broken loaf emblematic of his body once whole but to be broken for them. Eating of the broken loaf we remember our Lord's body was by his consent broken or wounded for us. So each Disciple breaks bread and holds communion with his Lord and communion with his brethren in the breaking of bread.

"They continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, in the breaking of bread and in prayers."

Now this breaking of the loaf and joint participation of the cup of the Lord, is an instituted part of the worship and edification of all Christian congregations in their stated Lord's day meetings. The first Christian congregation which was constituted by the apostles themselves in Jerusalem as steadily attended upon the breaking of bread in their public meetings as upon any other part of public worship. The apostles taught the churches to do all things our Lord had ordained. Whatever the churches did by appointment of the apostles they did by commandment of Jesus Christ, and acts of religious worship taught and sanctified by the apostles in one Christian congregation were taught and sanctified in all, as all were under the government of the same head.

Of the church in Troas it is expressly declared by Luke: "On the first day of the week when the disciples came together to break bread Paul preached to them." Two things are clear here, that it was the established custom for the disciples to meet on the first day of the week, and that the primary object of this meeting was "to break bread." Weekly observance of the first day as a day of meeting for the disciples and the weekly breaking of bread in those meetings stand or fall together. If one was fifty-two times in the year the other was fifty-two times. If one was once a month or once in three months, the other was once a month or once in three months. If they kept the Lord's resurrection fifty-two times a year on the Lord's day, they remembered the Lord's death fifty-two times a year in the Lord's Supper—he died as often as he arose from the dead. They did both—the Lord's death and the Lord's resurrection, the Lord's day and the Lord's Supper, go together.

From Acts 2:42 we learn that breaking of the loaf was a stated part of the worship of the disciples in their meetings. From Acts 20:7 we learn that the first day of the week was the stated time for these meetings and that the most prominent object of their assembling was to break the loaf. From Paul's epistles to churches in Galatia and Corinth we learn that the disciples met statedly upon every first day for this worship, for he bids them to prepare their offering "on the first day of every week" and rebukes some of them, because when they come together "this is not to eat the Lord's Supper." Nor is there any scriptural proof that any congregation of the Lord's people ever met on the first day unless for the breaking of bread, or that any congregation ever met monthly, quarterly, semi-annually or annually. Commemoration of the Lord's death should be a weekly institution in all the weekly meetings of Christians for worship. So Wesley taught: "I advise the elders to administer the supper of our Lord on every Lord's day." So Calvin declared: "Every week at least the table of the Lord should be spread in Christian assemblies," and the custom which enjoins communion once a year he denounced as "a manifest contrivance of the devil." So communion every Lord's day was universal and preserved so until the seventh century, and such as neglected it for three weeks together were excommunicated.

Do any say frequent communion makes common this otherwise solemn ordinance? So the Papist reduced its frequency, took away the cup from the laity, made Easter, Pentecost and Christmas great occasions, annexed a world of ceremonies and changed the elements into the veritable blood and body of Christ according to their claim. Did this give greater credit to the ordinance, or destroy it? Is this safe leadership? According to such reasoning once in seven, ten, twenty, fifty years would render the institution more solemn and men should pray, read their Bibles, go to church once a year or once in twenty years, because forsooth it would render the service all the more impressive and preserve it from becoming common!

We need this institution. Every week our spiritual condition demands this sacred approach to the cross. If we would follow the practice of the apostolic church we must conform to its usages. More and more God's people are coming to it and thus together.

KENSLER.

Henry Kensler was born in Madison county, Ia., April 13, 1858, and died in the same county June 12, 1898, having lived 40 years, 1 month and 29 days. He was married to Clidona Wright, Sept. 21, 1882, who, with 2 daughters, survives him. Bro. Kensler became a Christian during the meeting held here—Winterset, Ia.—last October by the writer. He was a good husband and a loving father. His sun set at noon, but it went down amid the rose-tinted clouds of peace, in the light of whose reflected glory the eye of faith beholds the burnished gates of day. J. M. LOW.

LIVINGSTON.

Died at her home in Kansas City, Mo., Thursday, June 16, 1898, Kate Rush Livingston, aged 37 years, 5 months and 16 days. By her own request she was brought to Tallula, Ill., the home of her childhood. She was laid to rest in beautiful Greenwood Cemetery. Before she was carried from Kansas City Bro. Frank Richardson, in a short exercise, read several comforting passages of Scripture, and his prayer was a benediction. Her body was taken to the church in Tallula where in early childhood she had committed herself to the cause of Christ, ever after leading the life of a consistent Christian. The pastor, Bro. Beshears made a short talk. By her death two sweet little girls are left motherless. Her husband, mother, sister and brother were present. S. J.

WOODSWORTH.

John Quincey Adams Woodsworth was born in Pennsylvania, Aug. 6, 1829. Died in Macomb, Ill., June 16, 1898, aged 68 years, 10 months and 10 days. A member of the Christian Church in Macomb for 40 years, honest, truthful, virtuous, temperate, pious. Sister Woodsworth is left a widow. Their five sons and two daughters, all grown, are left fatherless, but they are comforted by the full assurance that they can in Christ meet him where there is no death. Funeral discourse by the writer; text: Paul's words, "Comfort one another with these words."

To the Members of the National Educational Association and Other Friends of Public Education —Annual Meeting.

WASHINGTON, D. C., JULY 7-12, 1898.

It is peculiarly fitting that the great association of teachers, from whom the American youth receive instruction, should assemble in Washington. It is likewise sufficiently important that the great American public should know that the Baltimore & Ohio Southern Railway—THE ROYAL BLUE LINE—is the premier line through the St. Louis gateway to Washington. Its superior train service, contiguity to rivers, creeks and mountain streams, which follow its tracks the greater part of the way, serve to make it the coolest, easiest riding and freest from dust of any of the lines to the Nation's Capital. Aside from these comforts entour the historic features associated with the country through which it passes are without parallel on any other line in America.

Western connections will sell tickets via St. Louis and the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway for this meeting at rate of ONE LOWEST FIRST-CLASS LIMITED FARE, plus $2.00, FOR THE ROUND TRIP. An extension of time until August 31st may be secured on payment, to Special Agent at Washington, of a nominal fee of 50 cents.

Truth Stranger Than Fiction.

THE STORY OF A STRUGGLE AFTER THE TRUTH AS IT IS FOUND IN CHRIST.

By D. R. Dungan.

Many editions of this book have been sold, and the demand increases. It is the most popular book on FIRST PRINCIPLES ever published by our people.

This volume discusses no new themes, nor does it present novel ideas upon the old theme of Christianity. Its novelty is found in protesting against novelties in religion, and insisting upon the usages of the primitive Church. It adopts a method for the discussion of salvation from sin which is, it is hoped, adapted to the popular education on the religious issues of the day. It was written for the benefit of, and is dedicated to, the People, with the prayer and hope that it will be widely read, and that it will do them good.

The author has carefully avoided technical expressions and obscure phrases, in order that it might meet their wants. He has endeavored to take these questions from the exclusive hands of the theologians, and place them in the hands of the people for their own adjudication. Will they, like the Bereans, examine the Scriptures to see whether these things be so?

The Religious World.

The next national convention of the W. C. T. U. will be held at St. Paul, Minn., Nov. 11-16.

Memorial services were held at Prohibition Park, July 3rd, in memory of Neal Dow, Frances E. Willard and Mary T. Burt.

The preachers of Cincinnati recently adopted a resolution protesting against the establishment of canteens in our military camps and calling upon the government to provide our soldiers with pure water in abundance.

The Third World's Sunday-school Convention meets in London, July 11-16. The program of this convention appears in ful in the International Evangel, of this city. The first world's convention was held in London in 1889, and the second one in this city, in 1893. The work of the International Lesson Committee will be made July 14th.

All England is not pleased with the manner in which the Bishop of London is playing into the hands of the Papacy of Rome. The Christian Commonwealth recently quoted the following from a letter from Mr. Kensit to the Bishop of London with the comment following:

"I feel it my duty to remonstrate with you regarding your attendance at St. Augustine's, Kilburn, last week. What is the use of your lordship denouncing such functions to me when you go and take part in such monstrous proceedings? You told me in reference to another church, when they incensed you, that you would refuse to attend that church again. I think I have a right to ask you this question: How can you expect your clergy to be loyal to Reformation principles when you openly take part in and encourage lawlessness by your presence? Although several weeks have now elapsed since Convocation, not a single lawless practice has yet been stopped in your diocese." The Bishop of London seems to be unable to make up his mind as to what is his duty at this juncture. This is unfortunate. One of the curses of the church is the manifest division of opinion amongst the prelates. No wonder the nation is bewildered.

Thomas Morrison, of this city, who recently celebrated his 82nd anniversary, has been superintendent of the "Biddle Mission" for fifty years. He still holds the office, attends regularly, and is active in its interests. The Biddle Market Mission was established nearly sixty years ago. St. Louis was then simply a French trading post upon the edge of a great wilderness. It is said that this school has had a continuous existence since its organization.

The Council of Seventy announces a new series of reading courses, to commence October 1, to be conducted by the American Institute of Sacred Literature. These will be included under the Bible Students' Reading Guild, which for the present will drop its popular courses and present work for ministers and professional Bible students only. (It should be explained that the popular courses are dropped only for the present, and will be resumed as soon as a sufficient number of appropriate books have been published.)

No "times and seasons" will be observed in these ministerial courses. Any one of them may be taken up at any time, pursued in part or to its conclusion, as preferred. No examinations or requirements will hamper the student, but provisions for reports upon and credit for work will be made. The number of subjucts taken up will not be limited; but for the present only eight are announced. The topics of these eight courses have been chosen rather as fundamental than with a view to their popularity. They are: (1) "The Historical and Literary Origin of the Pentateuch;" (2) "Old Testament Prophecy;" (3) "The Origin and Growth of the Hebrew Psalter;" (4) "The Life of the Christ;" (5) "The Apostolic Age;" (6) "The Problems Connected with the Gospel of John;" (7) "Christianity and Social Problems;" (8) "The Preparation of Sermons."

Eeach course will contain six or more books, selected first by each member of the Council of Seventy, and then by a committee of the council, who shall from the results of this composite judgment make the final choice. Upon all topics generally conceded to be in controversy the best authorities on both sides will be provided. The courses will in no case stand for a particular school of thought, but will be planned to present all sides impartially.

The books to be used in the subjects announced above will be selected during the summer. They will be loaned to those applying in the order of their registration. Preliminary announcements and registration blanks may be secured by addressing The American Institute of Sacred Literature, Hyde Park, Chicago, Ill.

It is reported from Sierra Leone, Africa, that a thousaud persons were killed in the recent uprising in that district. One hundred aud twenty inhabitants of Freetown, most of them traders, are known to have been massacred, and other colonists were carried into the bush by the "war boys" and undoubtedly met a worse fate. Three hundred friendly natives were killed.

The whole Christian world will be interested in learning that in the house of Tiberius Cæsar, on the Palatine Hill, Rome, Professor Orazio Marucchi has discovered what he regards as a representation of the crucifixion in a graffito, or wall engraving. The discovery of the graffito created a sensation at the time. The graffito, by the way, is a drawing in the cement in one of the rooms which served as cells for the slaves and soldiers. Copies in photograph have already been made, and are in London. We presume they will speedily find their way to New York, where they will attract attention unless we are too busy about the war to care for anything else.

A Blood Filtering is a real necessity to all of us at times. Our blood will get sluggish and impure despite ourselves. The best purifier is Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer. It builds up the general health and imparts life to the vital organs through the blood. No druggists sell it. Retail agents do. Write about it to Dr. Peter Fahrney, 112-114 So. St. Louis Letter.

Another vacation season is at hand and finds the churches in about the same condition as did the arrival of the last one. Some have their lamps trimmed and burning, while others have not. Some have grace enough to carry them through till September without a regular pastor, and some have not. Some pastors have gone on their annual trip, and others are going, but some must remain; not because they would not go if they could, but because they could not go if they would.

The writer is of course speaking of all the preachers of St. Louis, regardless of creedal distinctions; and this, after all, is about the way preachers are sized up by the people in general of any great city. About the only distinction known to the masses is that part of the churches and their pastors are Roman Catholics, while the rest are Protestants; but this distinction they know in name only. Just why or what their differences, but few can tell, while still fewer care to know. Protestant preachers are classed off by them in a "job-lot" sort of way, as a genteel set of fellows, somewhat convenient in case of sickness or death, but otherwise as social ornaments or barnacles, as they may chance to think. The respective Protestant churches, in their estimation, are but so many social centers, to which only the well-to-do or the well-appearing may go. But these do not, except on special occasions, and the rest will not, except under force of circumstances. And thus it is that Protestant churches are seldom crowded at this season of the year—on Sunday nights.

As to Roman Catholic churches, they are held in a sort of superstitious light by a surprisingly large number of apparently intelligent persons, while their priests are looked upon by the same people as sons of the "Immaculate Mary," regardless of their children-of-this-world appearence and conduct. Costly piles of masonry in a Roman Catholic cathedral are looked upon as an evidence of sound doctrine, holy worship and apostolic power, while the same thing in Protestant churches are held as indubitable evidence of hypocrisy, oppression of the poor, and enmity toward the laboring classes. Why this is thus, the writer will not attempt to explain.

In the meantime pleasure resorts, real and imaginary, harmless and harmful, are increasing in number and in popularity, so that the effects of an exceptionally fine Sunday or exceptionally hot one are more conspicuous than those of a cold or rainy one. The audiences are smaller.

Being caught in a drenching rain in the park, narrowly escaping death in a runaway or in a collision, enduring the parching heat of the sun for hours at a baseball game, pushing a wheel homeward for miles on a muddy road, or a ducking in the lake or river from an overturned boat, and many other painful, wearisome, costly experiences common to pleasure resorts seem to have no perceptible influence upon their drawing power, while the smallest accident or least inconvenience at church will settle the matter with a family for a whole year, and sometimes forever. They "will never go back to that place again." Bad men, bloated faces, lewd women, and every vicious character, who are not at all backward about improving their liberty of presence at public places, seem utterly void of influence to deter attendance at these resorts, while a single one of them suddenly appearing in a crowd of these same pleasure-seekers at church would almost cause a panic. They would be so horrified at the sight that they would never jeopardize their purity by going back again. The fear of immoral contact at church which some people have is something awful But fortunately for theaters, this dread seldom disturbs a theatre-goer. The intervention of diamonds, fine raiment or polished brass rails is a sufficient antidote to this danger But I have come to deep water and must stop.

The monthly statement of the public debt shows that at the close of business yesterday the debt, less cash in the treasury, amounted to $1,027,085,492; a decrease during the month of $10,688,268. This decrease is accounted for by a corresponding increase in the amount of cash on hand. The increase in the cash comes largely from proceeds of the new bond issues.

A Warning to Users of Alum Baking Powders.

CASES OF POISONING IN INDIANA.

The following appeared in the Logansport, Indiana, Times:—

Dr. Souder was summoned by telegraph last Sunday night to attend the family of Braden Harper, living southwest of Logansport. Four of the family were poisoned from eating dumplings. The father and one child, who had not partaken of the dumplings, were well, while the mother and three children were in a serious condition. It is probable that had not vomiting ensued, emptying the stomach, the four would have died from the effects. It is supposed the poison was caused from the baking powder used in making the dumplings. The wife probably added a larger amount than she usually did, which in the greater quantity proved a noxious poison. The baking powder used was branded the * * * *, manufactured by the * * * * This should be a warning in using cheap baking powders, which flood the country. People buy them because they are cheap, and the merchant buys them because he can sell them for a profit. In many stores one can not purchase a standard brand. You have to purchase the cheap stuff or do without. We are of the opinion that most of the prize baking powders belong to this class.

The highest authorities in chemical science pronounce alum injurious to health and a destroyer of digestion.

Here is explicit evidence that it is a noxious poison.

Alum baking powders likewise coagulate the blood rapidly, interfering with its ready course through the arteries and valves of the heart, predisposing to heart-failure.

The laws of Minnesota and Wisconsin prohibit the sale of alum baking powders, unless they are branded as a warning to the public.

By the laws of England it is a crime to put alum in bread in any form.

NOTE. The Royal Baking Powder Co. publish the above facts because they are facts of great importance, and to say that while alum baking powders are sold cheap they have little strength, and are dear at half price, to say nothing of their effect upon the health, and the bitter taste they impart to the food.

The Royal Baking Powder is far above question as regards its quality and healthfulness, because it is made of cream of tartar derived only from grapes. No other article has ever received such high praise for its quality.

Consumers may use the Royal with full assurance that they not only get the worth of their money, but that they also get the best cream of tartar baking powder that can be had.

What We Plead For.

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

For the right against the wrong;
For the weak against the strong;
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.
For the truth, 'gainst superstition,
For the faith, against tradition,
For the hope, whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

Vol. xxxv. St. Louis, Mo., Thursday, July 14, 1898. No. 28

CURRENT EVENTS.

It now develops that Admiral Cervera was ordered out of the harbor at Santiago. In his official report to General Blanco at Havana, which he was permitted to send, he says: "In compliance with your orders, I went out yesterday from Santiago de Cuba with all the squadron, and after an unequaled combat against forces more than triple mine, had all my squadron destroyed by fire. Teresa, Oquendo and Vizcaya beached and Colon fleeing. I accordingly informed the Americans and went ashore and gave myself up." At the conclusion of his message are these pathetic words: "We have lost all and are necessarily depressed." And what makes the attempt at escape still more lamentable is that he was told from Madrid that the attempt was necessary to save the existing government from its enemies at home. Such obedience without the inspiration of fighting for his country or the hope of success in the attempt to escape from an overpowering fleet must have been very humiliating and depressing indeed to the proud Admiral of Spain's boasted fleet.

The proclamation of President McKinley, issued on July 6th, calling upon the people of the United States, "on next assembly for divine worship in their respective places of meeting, to offer thanksgiving to Almighty God who, in His inscrutible ways, now leading our hosts upon the waters to unscathed triumph, now guiding them in a strange land through the dread shadows of death to success, even though at a fearful cost, now bearing them without accident or loss to far distant climes, has watched our cause and brought nearer the success of the right and the attainment of just and honorable peace." This request was very generally complied with throughout the United States on last Lord's day. The spectacle of a great nation, in the midst of a great conflict, pausing to recognize the hand of God in its victories and to pray for the speedy return of peace is one that may well excite the admiration of the world and put fresh confidence in the hearts of the people as to the ultimate success of military efforts that are reinforced by the prayers of the nation.

The armistice at Santiago has ended, we regret to say, with the refusal of the Spanish commander to surrender the city and its garrison to General Shafter. The proposition to evacuate the city on condition that the Spanish troops be permitted to retreat was of course promptly rejected. There was nothing left to do but to open fire upon the city, and at this writing the bombardment by the army and navy is in progress. It is difficult to see what the Spanish have to gain by continuing the hopeless struggle at the cost both of property and of human life. It must be evident to even Spanish generals that Santiago is doomed, and humanitarian considerations should have permitted the surrender of the place without further bloodshed. General Shafter has already received considerable reinforcements, and General Miles, with additional reinforcements, will have arrived before this is in print. It is only a question, therefore, of a few days at most when the southern stronghold of Spain in Cuba will be in possession of the United States forces. It is to be hoped that this may be accomplished without too great a sacrifice of human life.

The second session of the fifty-fifth Congress closed at two o'clock on Friday, July the 8th. Not since the Civil War has any Congress been confronted with graver questions and greater responsibilities nor enacted laws of greater consequence. Not since 1812-'15, has any Congress had to do with a foreign war, outside of this continent, nor with international questions of a more delicate character to handle. During the session of the Congress just closed war was declared against Spain, an army of more than three hundred thousand men mobilized, the navy and coast fortifications greatly strengthened, $350,000,000 appropriated for war purposes and a war revenue law supposed to raise $150,000,000 a year enacted. During the congressional session closed the Spanish fleet at Manila and at Santiago were totaly destroyed, the city of Santiago made ready to capitulate or be taken by storm. By this Congress the Hawaiian Islands have been added to the domain of the United States, peaceably—the first addition of territory to the nation since the purchase of Alaska in 1867. By this Congress a national bankruptcy law has been enacted, the indebtedness of the Central and Western Pacific Railroads refunded and the disabilities imposed upon ex-Confederates by section three of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution removed.

After a long discussion the Senate on July 6th adopted the resolution annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the domain of the United States. The vote stood forty-two to twenty-one. The bill was signed by President McKinley, and as soon as it shall be ratified by the present government of Hawaii those islands will then be a part and parcel of the territory of the United States. These islands are about two thousand miles west of our Western Coast and lie in about the same latitude as the West Indies. It is believed that they will be of great value to us for commercial and military purposes. Its annexation is no doubt in accord with the desire of its most intelligent inhabitants. President Dole is of American birth, and it has already started a public school system after the American model. Its civilization has been created by American missionaries, and there is still work to do in this line. When in full articulation with the United States the American spirit and methods will soon prevail to even a greater extent than at present, and the real worth of the new territory will become apparent. President McKinley signed the bill at seven o'clock P. M., July 7th, and it is thought that President Dole will be the first United States Governor of the Hawaiian Islands.

Lieutenent Hobson and his fellow-prisoners of Merrimac fame were exchanged on the 7th of July. On the 3rd of June last Lieutenant Hobson and seven seamen, at the peril of their lives, sunk the collier Merrimac in the channel of Santiago harbor and became prisoners of war. Immediately upon their capture Admiral Cervera notified Admiral Sampson of their capture and praised their heroism in the sinking of the collier under the fire of the Spanish guns. They were at first confined at Morro Castle, but afterwards taken to Santiago. The Spanish Admiral proposed an immediate exchange of the prisoners, but his kind offer was interfered with at Madrid and Havana, and not until his fleet was destroyed and himself a prisoner did they consent to the exchange. Hobson had little to say in regard to his experiences except that they had been well treated by the Spaniards. He expresses high admiration for Admiral Cervera and regards his message to Admiral Sampson at the time of their capture as the act of a kind-hearted man and chivalrous officer. There was unbounded joy on land and sea at the return of these men to their freedom. This closes one of the most dramatic and daring incidents of this war and of naval warfare.

If the somwhat surprising statements of an editorial in a recent number of the Globe-Democrat on the comparative age of some of the features of our national life be true, we are in spite of our youthfulness ahead of the older nations in several matters now deemed to be of fundamental importance in government. Hugh Hastings, the state historian, of New York, is given as authority for the statement that the American flag is the oldest national emblem in the world. The oldest of the other flags is the Spanish, and this one ours antedates by more than a half dozen years. The Globe-Democrat also claims that our constitution antedates that of any other national charter in the world. Our constitutional framework, says our authority, takes precedence in age over Great Britain's present unwritten constitution, and the following figures are given in support of the statemant: "The three great franchise acts of 1832, 1867 and 1884—the first of which added 500,000 to the electorate, the second 1,100,000, and the third 3,000,000—made a sweeping alteration of Great Britain's governmental system. Prior to the passage of the act of 1832 only one person in fifty in Great Britain was permitted to vote for members of Parliament." We have not taken time to verify these dates, but we think that the point is made sufficiently clear and strong to place America in a position to command more respect by virtue of her priority in the essential features of her government than other nations have been inclined to give her.

THE NASHVILLE CONVENTION.

The Seventeen Annual Convention of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor is closing its sessions at Nashville, Tenn., as we go to press. It opened with eleven public meetings on Wednesday night last, and at each of these two addresses were delivered on some phase of the general subject of spiritual enduement, followed by a brief service of prayer for greater spiritual power. Such meetings were a fit prelude to the convention.

On Thursday at 9 A. M. the old board of trustees met, completed its business and adjourned sine die, as the times of all its members expired. Its last act was to elect trustees under the new charter, which makes several important changes in the society. It has taken about three years to secure this new and more liberal charter, so many legal snags were encountered in the laws of Massachusetts. One of the articles under the new charter provides that each evangelical religious body shall be entitled to one trustee, and one additional trustee for every one thousand societies of Christian Endeavor in its membership. In addition to this each state president of the state union, is or becomes a trustee of the United Society. This greatly increases the number of trustees.

As we have over 4,000 societies (4,547) we are entitled to five trustees under the new charter. These were elected as follows: J. Z. Tyler, J. H. Garrison, F. D. Power, A. B. Philputt and H. L. Willett. In addition to these we have several state union presidents who also belong to the board. This arrangement gives an equal and fair representation to each religious body. The new board, as thus constituted, held its meeting immediately after the adjournment of the old board, the new charter permitting the trustees to hold a meeting and transact business outside of Massachusetts. The proceedings were marked by harmony and brotherly love.

The convention assembled in the auditorium Endeavor, on the Centennial Exposition Ground, a mile west of the city, at 3 P. M. As the attendance from abroad, owing to the fear of hot weather, was not so large as it has been at other places, admission to the hall was not limited to those having the Endeavor badge, but the doors were thrown open to the public. It was a magnificent audience that filled the great and beautifully decorated auditorium at that hour. The first incident of interest was the presentation to Pres. Clark of a gavel made by a convict in one of the jails of Kentucky, who had been led to Christ by Christian Endeavorers. An "Ode of Welcome," composed by Prof. Hinds, was then sung by the convention, led by Prof. Excell.

Pres. Clark here read the proclamation of President McKinley, calling upon the people to give thanks to God for our recent victories and to pray for the speedy return of peace. Prayer was then offered, led by Rev. Jacobs, of Columbus, Miss. The scene was most impressive. Pres. Clark read a telegram he had prepared to send to the President, and Secretary Baer read a telegram from President McKinley extendings his greetings to the convention, which was received with great applause. The audience by this time was in the right mood to sing "America," and when it was announced by Prof. Excell, it evoked great enthusiasm and was sung with much earnestness.

Rev. Ira Landrith, chairman of the local committee, delivered an address of welcome in behalf of the Endeavorers, and Rev. James I. Vance in behalf of the pastors. Both these addresses were in the happiest vein and evoked great enthusiasm. The climax of interest was reached, however, when Gov. Taylor delivered his inimitable address welcoming the Endeavorers in behalf of the state. His opening sentence was specially charateristic: "As the flowers welcome the light of the morning, as the green earth smiles welcome to the summer sunshine and shower, as the possum welcomes the ripe persimmon, and the old-time darky welcomes the possum, so Nashville gives welcome unto you." He expressed the hope that the North and the South might deliberate harmoniously in this convention, "as when Uncle Rastus held Aunt Dinah's hand in his and asked, 'Who's Sweet?' and Aunt Dinah dropped her head on his shoulder and answered, 'Bofe of us!'" It is needless to say this caught the audience. But this speech was not all humor. His speech abounded in sentiments of true patriotism and religion. When at the close of his address he expressed the wish that the earth might be girdled with Christian Endeavor, and every kindred and tribe should join in singing:

"All hail the power of Jesus' name,
Let angels prostrate fall!"

and started the tune himself, the scene was indescribable. The choir and platform first joined in, and then the whole vast audience sprang to its feet and caught up the strain with—

"Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown him Lord of all."

The song was sung through, and at its close there was an applause that made the rafters ring. Never before, perhaps, in the history of this country has one of its governors led such an audience in such a song.

Responses to these addresses of welcome were made by members representing the East, the West, the South and the North, and Canada, all brief but hearty and appropriate. The last of these was by a Brother Grotthouse, of Dallas, Texas, who closed his stirring remarks by starting, "Blest be the tie that binds," in which the great audience joined, while many eyes were moist with tears. Then came the address of Dr. Clark, the keynote of which was, "Fruit-bearing"—bearing "much fruit." It was earnest, practical, wise, and touched upon the deeper things of the kingdom.

We have thus far only briefly sketched the opening session of the convention. It would be impossible to even mention the names of the various speakers on the program. The daily papers of Nashville have given such space as they could to the publication of these addresses. There were many prominent speakers on the two principal platforms, for after the opening session there was a double program and two large aaditoriums in use each evening. We can only mention a few of the more prominent features of the convention.

PATRIOTIC.

The convention was a sort of reunion between the North and South. Sectional lines were obliterated, and patriotic fervor ran high. Dr. Burrell, of New York, said he had heard of a Mason and Dixon line somewhere South, but he had been unable to find it, and he supposed that the Spanish minister on retiring had carried it off with him! Saturday afternoon was devoted to patriotism. Generals representing the Federal and Confederate armies were on the platform and addressed the convention. Gen. O. O. Howard, of Vermont; Gen. Clement A. Evans, of Georgia; Gen. T. J. Morgan, of New York, and Bishops Fitzgerald and Arnett—the latter colored—made speeches equally patriotic and loyal to the Stars and Stripes. Every sentiment expressing a unity of the North and South and their equal devotion to our common country and to our common flag, provoked the heartiest applause. Canada, too, joined in this patriotic service, and the Union Jack was draped with the Stars and Stripes over the stand on the platform. A Canadian brother said while statesmen were talking of a political alliance between Great Britain and the United States, Christian Endeavor had already formed a Christian alliance, and this was essential in order to make effective any future formal alliance. A Southern speaker said: "If there had been an international Christian Endeavor Society holding its conventions in the different sections of the country, there would have been no war between North and South. There will never be another."

One of the notable patriotic speeches of the convention was an evening address by Dr. R. S. McArthur, of New York City, on "God's Hand in the Present Conflict." It was an able, eloquent and timely address, that showed how God was guiding this nation now as in the past. It received the most enthusiastic endorsement of the great audience that heard it.

FRATERNAL.

In closing his address of welcome Dr. Vance, of Nashville, said: "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, I baptize the seventeenth annual convention of Christian Endeavor as the Convention of Brotherly Love." It was true to its baptismal name. Indeed, it seemed to be immersed in brotherly love, rather than merely sprinkled by it! Never did denominational lines seem to obstruct the free interchange of fraternal love less than in this convention. If there were any sectarian feeling manifested, we did not observe it. All who were present seemed to recognize the fact that One is our Master and we are all brethren. Never have we been so profoundly convinced of the providential mission of Christian Endeavor to promote unity of feeling and sentiment among Christian people by promoting mutual acquaintanceship, and offering a common platform upon which Christian workers can stand together in Christ's service.

SPIRITUAL.

In every meeting there was an undertone of spiritual aspiration which frequently found expression, but the "Quiet Hour" meetings, conducted by Dr. Wilbur Chapman, of Philadelphia, and attended by large outpourings of people each morning, were remarkable for their spiritual power and earnestness. Seldom if ever have we witnessed such intense interest, such evident desire for a deeper spiritual life, as marked these morning gatherings. We felt while listening to Dr. Chapman's talks that it could but prove an unmixed blessing if he could be secured to conduct such a series of meetings in connection with one of our national conventions. We might not approve of all his nomenclature, or even all his statements, but his penetrating, heart-searching presentation of God's Word, and his appeal for what he calls a "surrendered life," would find a most hearty response in the men and women who attend our conventions, and would prove most helpful in the real work of the convention. Dr. Clark is giving much emphasis to the "Quiet Hour" feature of Endeavor work, and we hope the local societies among us will keep it prominently before their members. These were the characteristic features of the Nashville convention: Patriotic, Fraternal, Spiritual.

OUR RALLY.

Friday forenoon was devoted to "Denominational Rallies." The members of the several religious bodies meet in places appointed for that purpose to consider matters of interest to themselves and to get acquainted. The Vine Street Christian Church was well filled with our members who were present, and Bro. Harvout, of Cincinnati, presided. A number of brief addresses were made, most of which were volunteer speeches, and all of which related to the general theme of "How We May Best Promote Unity." It was specially cheering to hear words from our brethren in the far South who, in the face of many discouragements, are holding aloft the banner of Christ. J. Z. Tyler, national superintendent of Christian Endeavor among us, presented his report, showing a great deal of painstaking drudgery on his part. We shall give our readers in a later issue the material facts in this report. Let it suffice here to say that he reports a gain of 547 societies in our churches since his last report. He has not been able to secure complete statistics. The Bethany C. E. Reading Courses are gaining ground, and over nine thousand copies of the three text-books prepared for these courses have been sold.

The following brethren represented us during the convention as speakers: F. D. Power, Philip Pendleton, J. Z. Tyler, I. J. Spencer, Chas. B. Newman, Z. T. Sweeney and J. H. Garrison. There may have been others whose names have escaped us. There were others that occupied pulpits on Sunday.

NEXT CONVENTION

Goes to Detroit. Cincinnati and Philadelphia also made application for it, but it was not their time. Chas. B. Newman was complimented on all hands for the very able presentation he made of the claims of Detroit, as chairman of the committee from that city. It will be a delightful place for such a convention, and a large attendance may be safely predicted.

Nashville did herself proudly, both in the entertainment of the convention and in the kind of weather it afforded. The local committee did its work thoroughly under the chairmanship of Rev. Ira Landrith, and their only disappointment was that more did not come. And yet this fact made it possible for the people of Nashville to get much more good from the convention. Nashville is a beautiful city, and its citizens did all in their power to make us all happy. The convention of '98 must be set down as pre-eminently the Convention of Brotherly Love.

A WORD FROM PAUL TO THE PREACHERS.

At the close of his Colossian letter Paul sends a message to Archippus, probably a young minister, which will bear repeating to all who, in our time, have received a like ministry "in the Lord:" "Say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfill it." This is the advice of one of the greatest preachers in the world, and an inspired preacher, too, to all young ministers, especially who, like Archippus, have received "in the Lord"—in his name and for his honor and glory—the high calling of preaching his gospel.

The admonition suggests two points, or raises two questions, which are worth considering: 1. What is it to "take heed to the ministry?" 2. What is it to "fulfill" that ministry in the age in which we live?

I. Taking heed to the ministry.

One of the most essential things to do in taking heed to one's ministry is to take heed to one's self. This was Paul's idea, for he wrote to Timothy, another young preacher, "Take heed to thyself and to thy teaching." We cannot dissociate the messenger from his message. "Preaching," says Phillips Brooks, "is truth and personality mixed." As the truth is pure, so the personality of the preacher should be. The first respect, therefore, in which a preacher should take heed unto himself is as to the purity of his life and character. No man should undertake the responsibility of preaching the gospel of purity to others unless his own life be pure. Paul admonishes Timothy to "flee youthful lusts" and the love of money, and to "follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness." A preacher cannot too jealously guard his reputation against the suspicion of impurity of life, or of being influenced by mercenary aims.

Another respect in which a preacher should take heed to himself is his bodily health. Every preacher owes it to his sacred calling to give it the benefit of the soundest and most robust physical health. This involves self-mastery, the control of the appetites. Many a preacher who totally abstains from intoxicating drinks is intemperate at the table. In eating, as in everything else, the preacher should "let his moderation be known to all men." Many a preacher's health is injured, his usefulness curtailed and his mental and spiritual development retarded by gluttonous habits.

No minister of the gospel in our day can take heed to his ministry who does not study and keep up with the thought of the age in which he lives. When Paul was in prison in Rome he requested Timothy to bring him, not only the cloak which he had left at Troas, but "the books, especially the parchments." Perhaps we may understand by the "books" the current literature of Paul's time, and by the "parchments" the sacred Scriptures of the Old Testament. If Timothy could not bring both the books and the parchments, he must be sure to bring the latter. It is well for the preacher to be acquainted with the best writers of his time, but he must be acquainted with the Holy Scriptures if he is to be an efficient minister of the gospel of Christ. Paul was very emphatic on this point. "Till I come," he said to Timothy, "give heed to reading, to exhortation, to teaching. Neglect not the gift that is in thee. . . . Be diligent in these things; give thyself wholly to them, that thy progress may be manifest unto all." Paul was evidently a progressionist, and he wanted the young preachers of his day to be progressive in the sense of growing in the knowledge of truth and in the power of the Spirit. The preacher that does not grow is likely to shrivel up very soon, and complain of having reached the dead-line before he passes the half-century mark.

Once more, the preacher must give heed to his ministry by keeping himself in vital touch with Jesus Christ. He must cultivate his own spiritual life, while he is seeking to promote the spiritual welfare of others. He must drink deep of the Spirit of God, and struggle to attain the highest spiritual gifts if he is to lead others to high attainments in Christian life. It follows that he must be a man of prayer. His sermons must be conceived and delivered in the spirit of prayer. He must pray, not for himself alone, but he must be an intercessor, praying for those for whose souls he watches.

In such ways as these must the preacher take heed to his ministry. In a word, he must magnify his calling, and put his heart and soul into it. He must not seek to do too many things, but give himself wholly to the work of the ministry if he would attain to the highest degree of excellence and usefulness in his calling.

FORM AND POWER.

Form-religion is a matter of custom and habit. The Jews had been taught from infancy to reverence certain observances, and to perform certain religious rites, and these by constant repetition, in the course of time, became merely perfunctory and formal, and ceased to represent to the mind anything but the form itself. This is the origin of formalism in religion. It is natural for men to take superficial views of things, and to do as they are taught to do, and to believe what they do is all right, and as it is much easier to perform a religious rite than it is to do a moral duty, or be a spiritual person, it is equally natural to substitute the outward form for the inward life and power.

Religion consists of two things, form and spirit, or as Paul expresses it, form and power. Form is the body and spirit is the soul of godliness. It takes both to constitute a perfect religion. The form of a religion is intended to express its truth and life, and not to act as a substitute for them. Where the external form is made to do duty for the inward reality, the religion is dead and worthless. Judaism in the time of our Lord had more than six hundred ordinances. The rites and ceremonies of later Judaism had been steadily increasing for nearly four hundred years, until it had become a system of dead and dying forms, the animating spirit and inward life having gone out of it. All ritualistic and priestly religions degenerate into a mass of dead forms, and their morals are no better than those who have no religion at all. Ordinance-religions exert neither moral nor spiritual influence on the lives of their votaries any more than the false religions of paganism do, and both of them present the most incurable forms of worldliness. A religious creed may be nothing more than a form of godliness, an intellectual form it is true, but still a form. It is as easy to substitute a theory of religion for religion itself, as it is a sacrament or a ceremony. You may worship a religious idea and live like a heathen, just as you may worship a religious form or an idol and live like a heathen. There are men among ourselves who believe that a certain interpretation of the New Testament, and a certain conception of the church and its worship, make up apostolic Christianity, and these men compass land and sea on the same mission as the ancient Pharisees, declaring that churches using organs, and contributing their money through missionary societies for the evangelization of the world, and working through Endeavor Societies, and women's auxiliaries, and regular pastors, are not churches of Christ. On miserable theories and ignorances of this kind do these provincial gentry read us all out of the church. Their literature like their preaching is all polemic, controversial, combative, abounding, not infrequently, in abusive personalities. This is a form of intellectual godliness that is neither intellectual nor godly. If I were going to substitute a theory of Christianity for Christianity, a mental conception of the doctrines of godliness for godliness, I would adopt one with some sense in it, for this Texas and Tennessee provincialism is as irrational as it is unspiritual. The endless disputes of these men about trifles and questions of no vital importance remind me of a story told by Sir Samuel Baker, the great African explorer and hunter, to illustrate the extraordinary debating proclivities of some of the native tribes of Arabs. He had shot an immense hippopotamus, which when dragged to the shore was found to be covered with scars, showing that the old animal had been a great fighter in his day. Some of the men declared that his father had thus misused him, others were of the opinion that it was his mother, and the argument ran high and waxed hot. These Arabs have an extraordinary taste for argument upon the most trifling points. Baker says he has frequently known his men to argue throughout the greater part of the night and commence the same argument on the following morning. These debates generally ended in a fight, and in the present instance the excitement of the hunt only added to the heat of the argument. They at length agreed to refer it to the master, and both parties approached, vociferously advancing their theories; one-half persisting that the old hippo had been bullied by his father, and the other maintained that it had been by the mother. Baker being referee, suggested that "perhaps it was his uncle" "Wah Allahi sahe." (By Allah, it is true.) Both parties were satisfied with the suggestion; dropping their theories they became practical and fell to with knives and axes to cut up the cause of the argument. The Arab disputer has the advantage. He does not believe in his own infallibility, in the first place; in the second, he is easily squelched by arbitration; in the third place, he abandons his foolish theorizing in the end and acts on practical common sense. The question as to whether a bull hippo in Abysinia was scarred by his father, mother or uncle, is a question of more importance than some of the issues that agitate churches, because they engage the attention of a certain class of preachers. No kinds of mental concepts worked into controversial theories are anything more than a form of godliness, and nearly always without its power.

The ordinances of the church, observed with the most scrupulous exactness, may be nothing more than a form of godliness. An ordinance is a symbol and must always be distinguished from the truth which it symbolizes. It is an object-lesson, a picture, setting forth a certain truth or truths, which it is important to keep before the mind. If the inward meaning of the ordinance is not present in the mind and heart of the man who observes it, the whole significance and purpose of it is missed, and it remains a lifeless and therefore worthless form. The meaning of baptism is the cleansing of the soul from sin; it is hence the symbol of regeneration. The Lord's supper has a sacrificial significance. It means the surrender of self to God in holy sacrifice for man. It was love and self-sacrifice that transfigured the cross, and that glorifies human character. Suppose a man's body is dipped in water when his soul is not cleansed from sin, and he sits at the communion table without a knowledge of the sacrificial spirit of Christianity: the first is not Christian baptism, and the last is not the Lord's supper. When these become mere outward forms, signifying nothing, they cease to be Christian ordinances, and become hindrances more than helps to Christian character. That which makes baptism of vital importance is not water; that which makes the Lord's supper a means of grace is not bread and wine; that which makes the church a beneficent redeeming agency in the world is not the visible organization, "for our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power and in the Holy Spirit and in much assurance." Church membership and church attendance may be mere forms of godliness without the power.

Church membership is right and according to the will of God, and church attendance is a virtue to be commended, but like everything else good they may be perverted so as to defeat the accomplishment of the purpose for which they were appointed. When church connection is merely nominal, when it imposes no restraint, and brings no obligation, when it signifies nothing to either intelligence or conscience, it is a sin to be answered for and not a virtue to be rewarded. Any spiritual duty or privilege discharged in a perfunctory manner, from force of custom and habit, usage and fashion, is the letter that kills and not the spirit that gives life. If church membership and fellowship have no power to restrain the evil that is within us, to stimulate and cultivate the good, to deliver us out of worldliness into righteousness, they are dead cinders in which all the divine fire has been extinguished. This was the trouble with the Jewish church in the time of our Lord and for many centuries before. It had degenerated into a dead formalism that made men worse instead of better. The language that Isaiah used to describe the men of his generation Christ employs to describe the men of his: "This people draw nigh to me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me." They were still zealous for the temple service, and more punctilious in the observance of forms than they had been in the best days of their spiritual enthusiasm. Because their lives were corrupt and immoral God despised their worship, although the outward form of their service was according to the law. "Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto me; new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies—I cannot away with iniquity and the solemn meeting. Your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hateth; they are a trouble unto me; I am weary to bear them. And when ye spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you: yea when ye make many prayers, I will not hear; [why?] your hands are full of blood; wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well; seek justice; relieve the oppressed; judge the fatherless; plead for the widow." Because these sacrifices had been offered by unclean hands, and these prayers had emanated from impure hearts, accompanied by corrupt and wicked lives, the forms that God himself had commanded became an abomination to him. If these offerings had proceeded from clean hands, and these prayers from pure hearts, followed by lives of justice, mercy and kindness to men, these forms would have been acceptable to God, because joined to the power they were intended to express and promote. Church membership and fellowship are acceptable to God and beneficial to us if the Spirit is in them, and they tend to foster the life of God in our souls. The power has gone out of the form when it ceases to express a pure, earnest and consistent religious life. The greatest peril to our religion is that the dry rot of formalism may set in and lead us to substitute religious forms for the divine life and a holy character, leading us to believe when we have done the form we have paid the debt, purchased the indulgence, and may henceforth lead the life of the world and do as we please.

OUR SPECIAL OFFER.

With the view of introducing the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to a large number of new readers, we are offering the paper from the time the subscription is received until the end of the present year for seventy-five cents. We earnestly solicit the active assistance of our old readers in making this offer known, and in extending our circulation. It is hoped that the new form will be acceptable to all our friends, and may be made the occasion by them of a special effort in its behalf.

LIGHTS IN THE WORLD.

(Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, July 20.)

Even so let your light shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your father which is in heaven.—Matt. 5:16.

This topic might have been legitimately called "The Influence of Example." Jesus had just said to His disciples, "Ye are the light of the world." He Himself was the true light that lighteth every man coming into the world, but His disciples are to be reflectors of that light. As the sun is the source of light for the solar system, and as all the light which we get at night is that which is reflected from it by the moon and the planets, so the moral and spiritual light of the world is Jesus Christ, and since His personal departure from the world, the light which we have is reflected from those who were and are enlightened by Him.

And yet the reflection of light from the disciples of Jesus is effected in a manner very different from that in which the light of the sun is reflected from the heavenly bodies. In the latter case these dense bodies are simply passive. The light which they reflect is not in any sense their light. Not so with a Christian. He receives the truth concerning Christ into his heart and his life is transfigured thereby, and becomes luminous through his action in believing and obeying the truth. The light must first be received within before it can shine without. We are told to be imitators of God, but this we can only do as we have the life of God within us. The "imitation of Christ" is impossible except as the Spirit of Christ dwells in us.

Among the many ways by which the kingdom of God advances in the world, and the truth of the gospel is spread abroad, perhaps the influence of the personal ex-example of those who are really Christians is the most potent. The preaching of the gospel is important, and even essential, but unless it is accompanied by right living, it is likely to fail of its purpose. Every Christian life is a sermon, illustrated and embodied. The presentation of Christianity which the world most needs and takes notice of is that which is presented in the lives of Christ's followers. Our unbelieving neighbors and friends are likely to get their conception of what Christianity is, not so much from the Bible, or from the occasional sermon which they may hear, as from our conduct and character. If our lives are pure, unselfish, noble, upright, courageous, charitable and full of good works, they are apt to conclude that Christianity is a good thing and that it would be well if there were more of it in the world. It is easy to see how the opposite impression might be produced.

The words of Jesus above quoted indicate what our experience teaches to be true, that there is a constraining power about Christian example which, to an honest heart, is irresistible. Christianity never looks so beautiful and so winsome, and never has so much captivating power, as when it is practiced in human life. As a system of truth it may charm the intellect, but as a life actually lived among men, it conquers the heart. The logic of a truly consecrated Christian life is unanswerable. It silences the stoutest infidel.

Here, then, is a power within the reach of us all, by which we may promote the extension of the kingdom of God. We may not be able to preach sermons or write books, but we can live the Christian life, with the aid of the divine Spirit, which is always within our reach. We can let our light shine in the several spheres in which we move. It may not be a large light, but it can be a true light, and it may make the home, the shop, the office, beautiful with its mild radiance.

How can we let our light "so shine that others seeing our good works may be constrained to glorify our Father in heaven?" By purity of life, by sweetness of temper, by a cheerful disposition, by a contented mind, by a sympathetic heart, by unselfish and loving deeds, by esteeming others better that ourselves, by seeking to make other lives brighter and happier, by seeking and embracing opportunities for doing good. Who can help loving one who exhibits these virtues and graces? And how can we fail to love and glorify Him whose grace and goodness make such a life possible?

What mighty results would follow this prayer-meeting, if each disciple here tonight should leave this place fully determined to henceforth let the light of Christ's life shine through his daily life? Why should not this purpose be formed and why should we not here and now seek the divine strength to carry out so high and so worthy a purpose?

PRAYER.

O Thou who art the Light and Life of men! Shine Thou into our hearts, and expel whatever lingering darkness may be found there. We thank and adore Thee that Thou hast caused the light of Thy glory to shine upon us, and that it is our blessed privilege to reflect Thy light upon a dark world. Help us, we pray Thee, to receive, in a larger measure, Thy light into our souls, that we may be more truly light-bearers to the world. Enable us to realize as we have never done before how much our conduct and characters have to do with impeding or promoting the progress of Thy kingdom. May we henceforth, strengthened and sustained by Thy divine grace, be enabled to reflect more faithfully the light we have received from Thee, that men may be constrained by our example to glorify our Father in heaven. For Thy name's sake. Amen!

OR LAKESIDE MUSINGS.

We were glad to have a visit, at Macatawa, Park, a few days ago, from our old friend, Gen. Drake, of Iowa. His friends will be glad to learn that he has dispensed with his crutches and is walking with his cane, and while his locomotion is by no means rapid or perfect, he manages to get along quite well. It was a pretty good test of his climbing ability to ascend the stairways leading up to the upper verandah of Edgewood-on-the-Lake. Since the expiration of his term as governor he has been giving special attention to his health which, as our readers may remember, was very much impaired by his fall on the steps of the State House in Des Moines, and his health has been gradually improving. We were glad to see him looking so robust. He has recently sold his railroad interests, we understand, and proposes to take a little more leisure in the future than he has been able to do hitherto. His recent gift to Drake University, in connection with his former gifts to the same institution, is building him a monument there much to be preferred to the costly memorial shafts or mausoleums that mark the graves of many men of wealth. We trust he may live many years to enjoy the vast good that is being accomplished through the institution founded and nurtured by his munificence. He will probably return with his family to the Park to spend several weeks.

In making a trip from our lakeside resort in the torrid zone, relatively speaking, we spent two days, including the Lord's day, in the vicinity of the University of Chicago and of the Hyde Park Church of Christ, and had occasion to note the progress of enterprises there in which our readers are interesed. The Disciples' Divinity House, under the deanship of Dr. H. L. Willett, is proving its usefulness and its right to be, more and more with each passing year. The number of our young men now at the University is greater, we believe, than at any previous time, and what is more gratifying is the high character and ability of those who are in attendance from year to year. They have made and are making a distinct impression upon the University authorities by their solid attainments, by their clear knowledge of biblical themes and by the strength of their religious convictions. At the annual meeting of the board of trustees of the Divinity House, held while we were there, an agreement was entered into between that body and the trustees of the Hyde Park Church of Christ, by which the former will be relieved of an indebtedness on its lot and the latter will become owners of a part of same, on which they are to erect a chapel for the use of the church. It seems to us a wise arrangement, both for the Divinity House and the church. Arrangements were made by the trustees of the Divinity House to have the work of Dr. Willett carried on during his visit to England, which will begin in the autumn and last until the early part of the following summer.

It was our pleasure to speak for the Hyde Park Church on Sunday morning, at the request of its pastor, Rev. Errett Gates. The congregation meets, as heretofore, in a hall, and the room is not well ventilated for this season of the year. In spite of this fact, however, a good congregation was present, and a very appreciative one it was. We were glad to learn that the church is making a substantial growth under the wise management of Bro. Gates, who is proving himself to be well adapted to the field. Our home while there was with Bro. C. A. Young and wife, and there are few places on earth where we could feel more at home than under their hospitable roof. Bro. Young's friends at the University and elsewhere are delighted at the fact that he has been enabled, in spite of the many calls upon his time and energy in the way of Bible lectures and work for the C. W. B. M., to carry forward his studies so successfully as to win an honorable and difficult degree from the University. He is still pursuing his studies, but his plans are to devote the autumn and winter months to giving Bible lectures at the University of Virginia and possibly of Georgia. One of the ablest men in the University of Chicago said in our hearing, "Mr. Young has before him a bright and useful future as a Bible lecturer." He has already gained considerable distinction in his field, especially in the South, and is continually fitting himself more fully for this kind of work. Mrs. Young and their little daughter, Helen, will accompany him during his trip South in the coming autumn and winter.

Dr. H. L. Willett is one of the busiest of men. Besides preaching on Sunday he delivers an afternoon lecture on some Bible topic in the central part of the city on each Sunday afternoon. These lectures are well attended and are developing a good deal of interest. He is to deliver a special course of lectures at Macatawa Park during the second week in August. Rev. J. M. Campbell, of Lombard, author of "After Pentecost, What?" and other works, will also give lectures during the summer. Besides these lectures, which will occur in the forenoons, there will be an address during the six evenings of the week by prominent ministers of our own people and the Congregationalists, on the different aspects of the subject of Christian Union. It is believed that we are to have one of the most interesting assemblies ever held at the Park. We would be glad if many readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST could arrange to spend August at Macatawa Park to enjoy this among other attractions.

A great gathering of the young people, including several of the grey-headed young, convenes this week in the city of Nashville. No doubt it will be an inspiring occasion, and the editor hopes to be there to share in the enthusiasm, and if possible transmit some of it through the pages of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to our readers. This movement among the young people is too significant not to have attracted the attention of all thoughtful people. It means much to the kingdom of God. It has in it the promise and the potency of things of which many of us have not yet dreamed. It will be a pleasure to meet and greet the people of other names and creeds who love the Lord Jesus and are seeking to promote His supremacy in the world. We shall have more to say next week.

The Presbyterian Banner incidentally gives the following excellent definition of liberty, which it denominates "a still greater height of freedom:"

The truest liberty is not outward, but inward. A man may be free outside, and yet be a slave inside. No fetters may be upon his hands, and yet there may be fetters on his mind and heart. Ignorance, prejudice, evil feelings, passion, bad habits, are forms of bondage more abject and fatal than the slave-driver's lash. A man is not really free until he is free in his soul; until he knows the truth and lives according to the laws of righteousness. The highest liberty is obedience to the right. There is no antagonism between such obedience and freedom, but the fullest harmony; the one is the means of the other. The steel track does not restrict the liberty of the locomotive, but gives it all the liberty it has. When the locomotive leaves the track its liberty is gone. So truth and right do not restrict a man's liberty, but conserve and enlarge it; when he begins to violate these, his freedom of soul is impaired. "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." The soul is free only when its desires coincide with duties and all its activities flow in one unbroken, unimpeded stream. Then the soul desires to do only what it ought to do, no sense of restriction binds it, all its impulses are harmonized into one music, and it enters into the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

The Independent concludes a thoughtful, timely article in a recent number, with the following paragraph on Christ's law of love:

Christ's law of love knows no exception. It embraces all that can be loved. It looks upward to God, the Giver of all good, and outward to every human being. It excludes no foreigner and no enemy; for even the enemy is to be loved as one's self. Above all it does not forget God. It recognizes him as the universal Father, the source of every blessing, the fountain of goodness and love, the author of life, temporal and eternal, through whose Son we have salvation; and it gives him the fullest love of the heart. It reaches out beyond family and neighbors and citizens to all humanity everywhere, the most ignorant and degraded, and it despises none, it loves all. It is the grandest, the most expansive of all sentiments, that which most enlarges the soul, that which brings man nearest to God. If the church by its ideals is lifting, and if it shall finally conquer the world, it is because its outreach is larger than any other that the world knows. Patriotism is noble, but Christian consecration is divine. Jesus gave the highest law, the most philosophical rule of pure ethics, nay, of pure religion, the world has ever heard, that beyond which human speculation cannot rise, when he laid down that law, not of justice nor of righteousness, on which Christianity rests, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself."

Edward B. Coe, D. D., Asbury, N. J., gives expression to the following sound doctrine in an article in the Christian Intelligencer on patriotism:

What, then, does an enlightened patriotism require of us? It does not require that we should close our eyes to the evils of various kinds which are prevalent among us, or to the dangers which threaten our welfare as a nation. It does not demand that we shall go about boasting of the progress we have made in wealth and power, of our superiority to everybody else, and of the great things that we are going to do in the future. In fact, a boastful spirit is far from being a patriotic spirit. In this regard we can hardly surpass, if we try, the Spaniards or the Turks. The braggart is almost always an ignorant man, and very often a coward. He may be the truest lover of his country who sees most clearly its faults and its weaknesses. Love is apt to be blind, as the familiar proverb says, but the truest love is not blind to faults that it can correct and evils that it can remedy. A carping, critical and cynical spirit is not a patriotic spirit; but on the other hand, he does not serve his country well who is not keenly alive to whatever elements of weakness and sources of dishonor may appear in the national life. It is patriotism and not disloyalty which leads a man to seek to arrest the tide of political corruption, to allay the jealousies existing among the different classes of society, to oppose any form of organized power, whether of corporations or of politicians, by which the freedom and purity and peace of the community are threatened. It is idle for us to hope that the flag which now waves over us, and which we delight to honor, will retain its inspiring power for generations to come, if it stands for what is sordid, selfish, unjust, oppressive, instead of for liberty and truth and righteousness.

Of the larger view of the war and the new responsibilities which are coming upon this nation The Interior says:

The effect of the war, so unselfishly and so boldly waged for the rescue of Cuba from its "unsufferabe condition," has struck the alarm bell of the world and set people to thinking. It has signaled the hour for a new alignment of the Christian forces of the country, rather of the whole Anglo-American order of civilization wherever there are those who have at heart the uplifting of men into the following and redeeming fellowship of the Son of Man. These days, we may be sure, will hereafter be accounted great days in human history. It is a wise church which knows the time. Any Christian life, in high or in humble place, will now be endowed with telling power, "ages on ages telling," which shall be quick to fall into line with the divine timeliness as to the next things to be done. With such a case as we are in just now we are the last people to be caught either napping or trifling. As for the churches of America, they are either decadent and dying or else, morally speaking, they are clearing their decks for action, determined, for one thing, that this shiftless and treacherous policy of everlasting "retrenchment" along our missionary lines shall be ended. The lesson on how to do things, which Dewey has taught the world, will not soon be forgotten.

Instantly the issues of the war shall have opened the way for it, there will be in Cuba and in the Philippines a new field for missions and Christian education of the most inspiring opportunity. Then, too, great China, as every one preceives, is on the eve of its most fateful crisis. Whether the present dynasty goes up or goes down, or more haply is moved by God's all-overbrooding Spirit to go forward, under the light and leading of the Christian gospel, it is clear that a new era is at hand that is to change the conditions of life among the nearly four hundred millions in that long-belated empire. Although China has lately been spoken of by Lord Salisbury as one of the "dying nations," it may be exactly the other way—the hour for its resurrection. It may rather turn out but another instance of the springing and germinant fulfillment of our Lord's saying: "The hour cometh, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live."

Sought or unsought, willing or unwilling, the American Republic is out in the open—the most conspicuous of all the world-powers. The character of its churches and other Christian organizations is being tested as never before.

In an article on "A Triumph of Protestantism," the St. Louis Christian Advocate very clearly sets forth the underlying cause of our war with Spain. It says:

The development of our influence abroad on the Western Continent means, in the highest sense of the word, the development of civilization and, what is more to the purpose, of the highest and purest form of religion. Christianity is not disseminated by fleets and armies, yet Dewey's guns in Manila Harbor, the artillery of Schley and Sampson at Santiago were, unconsciously to the gunners, helping to solve the problem of the world's progress. There are men so brutal that only by force can they be taught the common decencies of life; there are nations so low down in the scale that fleets and armies are needed to teach their rulers common humanity. The survival of the fittest is a rule as inexorable in politics as in nature; the great Protestant nations of the world have come to the front in international affairs because they deserve to live and prosper, the nations of Latin descent and Roman Catholic religion are falling to the rear because of their adherence to political systems and religious faiths which are not consistent with the highest developments of civilization. The triumphs of Dewey, Sampson and Schley are the triumphs of Protestantism no less than of civilization; they mean more than the occupation of crumbling forts, or the destruction of Spanish ships; they mean that the Anglo-Saxon influence is broadening to an extent never before known in the history of the world; that Protestantism is going to the front, is advancing with giant strides; that the time when the purest form of religious faith will dominate the earth is in sight.

The evil of athleticism, pointed out by the New York Observer in the following paragraph, cannot be too strongly condemned. If our college boys cannot have athleticism without this evil, then they had better go through life without athletics. The New York Observer says:

There is, however, a worse evil than this of possible physical injury connected with athletic exercises as practically carried on by hosts of young men, and that is the moral harm that comes of concomitant sporting abuses. The greatest curse of athletics to-day is the sporting incubus that has attached itself to almost all games. In the confused apprehension of the general public, sport and athletics seem one and inseparable. Betting, gambling and drinking in connection with field days have come to be regarded by many as the substance of the whole thing. As a matter of fact, such customs are wretched excrescences on the practice of a pure athleticism. They represent a moral insanity rather than a sound physical order. We need clear logic and vigorous common sense in dealing with these questions. Because it is well for a college boy, for example, to broaden his chest and develop his biceps, it does not follow that it is good for him to stake his father's money, or to redden with wine, instead of with the bloom of health, that cheek which often a praying mother has loved to kiss. It is time that the press of the country should discountenance the "sporty," sensational, commercial element in athletics, and champion sound, clean, manly ideals on the road and the athletic field. No one wishes the young men of America to become a set of grannies, nor should any one be willing, on the other hand, to have them turn out to be a mere crowd of gamesters.

True and false notions as to athleticism should be sharply discriminated. The whole of the subject and the best of the practice is not expressed in the sporting columns of certain great daily papers. Vast numbers of the young men of America, we rejoice to feel assured, are not gamesters, or riotous pugilists, but sensible and sound athletes. On them devolves the duty of setting an example, in their dealings with a more volatile and thoughtless class, in favor of self-control, sobriety and decent regard for the Sabbath, in the arrangement and conduct of all athletic races, bicycle runs or field tournaments.

GLADSTONE.

SHERMAN HILL.

Gladstone is dead! The words fall like a pall and their significance is difficult to realize. As after the battle we can best judge its effect, so at the close of a great life we can best judge of its influence.

Among the few universal characteristics of men, none stand out more prominently than our admiration for the great. Men are indifferent to the ordinary, but never to the extraordinary. Things have been so arranged in nature that we are continually awed by the great. The sandy wastes of our seashore provoke no thought, but the limitless expense of Sahara moves us to wonder. The little rise of earth along the "Fathers of Waters" arouses no unusual thought, but the ponderous Rockies with their robes of perpetual white move all to holy adoration. We pass and repass men, live among them and act with them, but how few greatly influence us!

I admire great men of all classes, those who stand for facts and for truths, but as poets and orators are admittedly born and not made, so all great men are great from nature. Great men are the products of nature and not of schools; they belong to the world and not to a family or a nation. Shakspeare's poetry was out of harmony with his logic when he said: "Some men are born great, some men have greatness thrust upon them, and some men achieve greatness;" for while he who is born great must achieve greatness and he who achieves greatness must have been born great, yet he who has greatness thrust upon him can in no wise be said to be great. Great men come from unexpected sources and overturn the adage, "like father, like child," and the overdrawn doctrine of heredity. What was there in Lincoln's ancestry to warrant the hope of the great emancipator? What was there in Gladstone's ancestry to warrant the production of the great Commoner?

There is a law for the production of great men, but it is the law of supply and demand and not of "kith and kin." When nature needs a thing it produces it, great men included. When nature removes a great man, men search everywhere for his successor, but none comes and none will come; his species has been extinguished with him, but not his genius. In some other and quite different field the next great man will appear.

Great men see new things, strange things, unusual things, though true, helpful and needful things. It required a Newton to see gravitation, a Columbus to see America and a Lincoln to see emancipation. Great men are rarely understood and never fully appreciated, since they see the whole when ordinary men see a part and think it the whole. Great men run more swiftly than other men, hence they come to objects, see them and report their vision to those in the rear. Their vision is more keen and clear than other men's. They see clearly and run swiftly where others grope and fall. Men become more like their contemporaries than like their ancestors or posterity. Men of the same sect, party or community become alike. It is claimed that if two persons lived together long enough we could not distinguish one from the other. It isn't difficult to know as much and become as good as our companions, and men who know the same things are not long the best company for each other. Hence we need great men to break the monotonous spell, to introduce new life, to chase away our egotism.

Great men, however, should not appear to us as the essence of greatness, as greatness itself, but as the exponent, as the representative of greatness. Accepting great men as the essence of greatness, as greatness itself, leads to hero-worship, makes monarchies possible and culminated, formerly, in the silly doctrine of the divine right of kings and to the accepting of such statements as "I am the state." It makes possible political bosses and party tyranny. It reverences party and custom rather than principle. But the accepting of great men as the exponent, as the representation of greatness, leads to truth-worship, for we see through the phase of truth which they represent the greater and broader truth, and thus they become instead of an effect, a cause, instead of an end, a means. Their ideas become a lens through which we see and not into which we see.

Great men are leaders of thought in their sphere of action and are indispensable to the welfare of the race, for no great truth has ever been thoroughly established except through a great man.

No age is better than its great and cherished men, for no stream can rise higher than its source, yet the > "Lives of great men all remind us,

> We can make our lives sublime,
> And departing leave behind us,
> Footprints in the sands of time."

Many really great men are not needed, but that Gladstone was really great and that he was needed, his successors will abundantly demonstrate what his contemporaries have not. He was the highest type of Anglo-Saxon manhood. Having thus considered the place, use and characteristics of a great man, let us specifically examine the life and work of Gladstone.

1. What Gladstone did.

(a) Pitt instituted the doctrine of English intervention and for years England's foreign policy was that of might, seizing territory, dictating terms to other nations and generally foisting her authority before the world, more in the light of a dictator than of an adviser. It was but an exhibition of the selfishness of man that always has a tendency to assert itself, especially in the strong, when not controlled by a more strongly counteracting altruistic influence. This doctrine of selfish intervention was strongly supported in turn by Peel, Palmerston, Disraeli and Salisbury. Gladstone overcame the haughty attitude and taught England the Golden Rule. Gladstone's doctrine of non-intervention carried to its lawful end would result in the disbanding of standing armies, the transforming of spears into pruning-hooks, the converting of warships into ships of commerce, the dealings of man with man on the principles of justice, the federation of the world, the parliament of man and the ultimate brotherhood of the race.

(b) Gladstone battled for free laws, free religion and free trade. He held that men everywhere should enjoy the blessings of liberty unhampered by unjust laws. He battled for the repeal of hard, unjust and class laws. He instituted many reform laws, ignoring the distinctions of nobility and royalty. He stood as a staunch friend of men. Like George he was not a friend of the capitalist or the laborer, but of man. That unjust and favorite class legislation has wrought untold evil goes without further discussion. It has enriched the few and impoverished the many. It is a relic of Feudal days, and Gladstone smote it a deadly blow. In commerce he contended that protectionism was but a shift at self-aggrandizement at the expense of others, the truthfulness of which the evolution of the humane spirit in man will demonstrate what our obtuse reason has failed to do.

In religion he held that men should be left to their individual convictions and not to men of like passions and faults. That the church was not intended to be subservient to the state is wholly evident from the attitude of Jesus and the early church under the direct guidance of the apostles. But that they should be adjuncts, Gladstone believed and contended for. He fought for liberty, industry and religion, neither one of which can be dispensed with, and only in whose harmonious union there can come universal prosperity and peace. That he succeeded beyond measure and bequeathed to humanity a rare legacy, his record abundantly attests.

(c) He was subject to his sovereign and honored the Queen, but not in the manner that makes a crowned head a divine or better head than other heads. He did more than any dozen Englishmen to make the crown a harmless bauble. Only as recently as the time of her predecessor, in the reign of her uncle, were the votes of Parliament defied. The Queen, imbued with the desires of royalty, and not reading correctly the sentiment of her subjects, attempted to defy her lawmakers. Gladstone presented a reform bill to her for signature. Being much displeased with it, she said to him, "Sir, I am the Queen of England and I will not sign that bill;" whereupon the great Commoner replied, "And I, madam, am the people of England and the people demand you sign that bill." She scowled and signed the bill.

(d) We have been led to believe that a politician and a good man were not to be found in the same individual, but Gladstone has taught us better. There has perhaps never been a statesman who carried his Christian principles more fully into his public life and actions. He made politics a conscientious duty. He believed in doing all things unto the Lord. He did much to obliterate the imaginary line between the sacred and the secular. He verily believed that "the earth was the Lord's and the fullness thereof;" hence he could not see that a thing, though evil, was allowable because it happened to be secular. No scandal ever marred his record. He was always possessed of an eager passion to do the right thing always. Lord Salisbury was quite right when he said, "Gladstone will not be remembered so much as a minister of finance or a party leader as the great Christian statesman." But all he fully accomplished will, perhaps, not be more helpful and inspiring to us than the prominent characteristics that distinguished him.

2. Type of man Gladstone was.

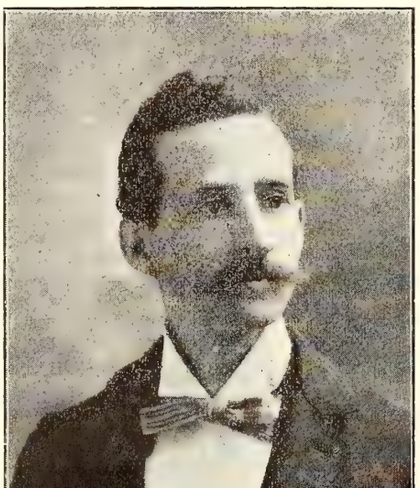
(a) There are three types of statesmen: one who is too far in advance of his time to be duly appreciated by and of the most assistance to his contemporaries. Such a statesman was Bright. He saw the future as correctly as many see the present. Another type of statesman is too far behind his time to be of practical use to men. Such a man is Salisbury. While the most helpful, and without doubt the greatest statesman, is the one who is able to grasp the future. This sort of man was Gladstone. He was not carried away by vain visions and hopes of the future, nor retarded by the regrets of lost hopes. He realized that the future was veiled from view, and that he who acted well in the present would have few regrets for the future.

(b) He spent much time in unlearning the prejudices of his life. In this he was a prince among men. More ordinary men deemed it a weakness to admit a once cherished tenet as false; but not so with him. There is perhaps no character so great who unlearned so many things. In early life he was an ultra conservative, styled by Macaulay as the rising leader of the stern and unyielding Tories. Later he became the champion of reform and an advanced liberal party. He was a conservative protectionist, but he became a radical free-trader. He changed his views on the foreign policy and was, in his life, on both sides of the Irish question. He thought of the ministry, studied law, but gave up both and became a statesman and an author. On all questions save his religious convictions he changed his views. Yet, with all his record of altered views, no one deems him to have been a vacilating man. A careful perusal of his life will reveal the fact that every view which underwent a change was substituted for a broader and more liberal one. First, a narrow—and bigoted as they always are—conservative, then a broad liberal; first a narrow—and selfish as they must be—protectionist, then a broad and world-wide free-trader. He believed that—

"Through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are broadened by the process of the suns."

(c) He followed duty and principle at any cost. The Bulgarian horrors brought forth from him a number of scathing criticisms that for a time threatened his success, but in no way lessened his ardor. The Armenian troubles likewise were considered by him at the expense of temporary popularity, but like Paul of old, his duty was his master, and what were impassable barriers to other men were stepping-stones for him to higher things. He, during the civil war in America, sypathized with the South, but future developments convinced him of his error, and true to his duty he urged the Alabama claims. He said of America as flattering things as Webster ever said, and wished us Godspeed from the depths of his great soul.



(d) Gladstone was the type of man for our time. Always open to conviction. Ever ready to espouse a just cause, though at the sacrifice of position and popularity and contrary to his presupposed conceptions. He was strong enough in vision to see that the problems of to-day were not to be solved by the methods of yesterday. He followed his convictions of right regardless of position or party lash. He was offered a peerage, but he chose to remain plain Mr. Gladstone. He has been an inspiration to our time and the legacy he hath bequeathed to posterity is beyond the range of earthly computation. May his ashes rest in peace, as we are confident his spirit is in the abode of paradise. Let us, while we pause beside his tomb, wreathe from our tenderest affection about the hallowed little mound a garland of purest love, and drop into its silent bosom a kind and tender tear, and thus pass on into the world he loved so much better and truer men.

Butte, Mont.

MINISTERIAL COURTESY.

GEO. L. PETERS.

That we may be the better able to apply the principles of Christian conduct to the minister in his work it will be well to ascertain the New Testament conception of the man and his relation to his work. The modern preacher, whether scripturally so or not, does the work of both evangelist and pastor. The church expects him to preach, and it expects him to teach from house to house, ministering to the sick, both in body and soul, in meekness instructing those who oppose themselves, and exhorting to faithfulness the indifferent. If it should be necessary to warn the unruly or to exclude the impenitent, he is looked to for counsel, for instruction and generally for leadership. Should he fail to respond to the demands of either department of his work he is regarded, in a measure, as lacking in fitness for his calling.

The gospel ministry is the most sacred calling vouchsafed to man. In the wisdom of God men are the instruments through whom the devine message is to reach the world. "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believed." In the planning for the redemption of the race only one was permitted to join, but infinite intelligence has granted us a part in the joys of its consummation. "We are God's fellow-laborers." The commission of the risen and ascended Savior has all the sacredness and pathos of last words. His work on earth was finished. He had fulfilled all things required in the law and the prophets, and made possible the proclamation of a message of joy and gladness, but it was not for him to proclaim it. He had died that others might live, but the world must hear that story from the lips of those who had been born again. Whether earth's teeming millions hear the story of divine love or not depends upon the faithfulness of the Savior's messengers. Jesus did not call his disciples to lives of ease and and luxury, nor did he promise them places of authority in an eathly kingdom. Far otherwise. Poverty, persecution, intense suffering and finally martyrdom were to be their lot. But their reward was to be sufficient to recompense them for all sacrifice. They were to have souls for their hire. "Come ye after me and I will make you fishers of men." The prospects were inspiring, the results satisfying. Under the wonderful power of the divine message they saw the miser become the philanthropist, the libertine become the puritan, the drunkard the abstainer, the bigot Jew the tolerant Christian. They rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer in such a ministry, and Paul, ever enthusiastic in his work, wrote to Timothy, "I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who has given me power, because he counted me worthy, putting me into the ministry." To such a ministry has God called us.

The minister is the central figure in the congregation. He is observed and patterned after more than any other. It is expected that he shall "be in all things a pattern of good works." The earnest ones seek to find in him a leader who will strengthen their own faith and draw them into a closer walk with God; the careless and indifferent are eagerly watchful for the least lapse in conduct tending to confirm them in their views of the Christian life; while the scoffer takes especial delight in reporting any seeming departure from the path of rectitude, either in faith or conduct. His life must be pure, outwardly and inwardly. The springs of his being must be purified by the salt of righteousness, that the stream of his life may be healing in its effects. He who is to exhort others to think on whatsoever things are pure must first take heed unto himself and give himself wholly to them. No mere platitudes from the pulpit will suffice. The surface of the stream may froth and foam, but the undercurrent indicates in which direction it is flowing. He must be humble. The Master of the household has givent to all talents, each according to his ability. Success crowns their use. He may be a Barnabas by whose earnest pleadings the number of believers greatly multiply, but he is exhorted to remember that he is not sufficient in himself. His sufficiency is of God, who hath made him an able minister of the New Testament. The greatest known preacher said, "I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase." The preacher must be bold. A strong ministry implies strong doctrine, and that comprehends not only what is pleasing, but what is purifying as well. There is a great temptation to seek the approval of all men by saying nice things, and there will always be those who, "having itching ears heap to themselves teachers" who will gratify their desire for fables instead of truth. Ministers are admonished to remember that the popular side is not always the safe side. It is not indictive of spiritual strength where all men speak well of us. Sin must be rebuked, and sometimes the salvation of the church requires that it shall be done before all. The faithful minister must have the courage to speak the truth in love, even though he endure hardness for it.

The minister's message is Christ. Self must be hidden that Christ may be seen. The world is needing Christ. Nothing else will satisfy. Philosophy and speculative theories have their place, but it is not the pulpit. A personal trust in a personal Savior alone saves. "Preach the Word," was Paul's admonition to Timothy. Not inflammatory declamations about war; not immature solutions of labor difficulties; not learned disquisitions about history, poetry, science, art or any of the multitude of subjects which delight the ears and lull the consciences of the unthinking ones. Bunyan found that in his day "the unbelieving world slight the Scriptures because carnal priests tickle the ears of their hearers with vain philosophy and deceit, and thereby harden their hearts against the simplicity of the gospel and the Word of God." His voice must ring out clear and strong in denunciation of sin, while with tender pathos presenting Christ as the only remedy for sin. He is Christ's evangel and he knows not what word of truth may be the motive-power that will lead to the salvation of an immortal soul.

The minister's right to the pulpit which he occupies is not absolute, but relative. The call to serve a congregation is not an invitation to become dictator. It is rather a request to become leader. The evident confession of their confidence and esteem implied in the call lays upon them the obligation to respect his wishes and treat his views with higest consideration. At the same time he is not authorized to overide their wishes. They are the final sources of appeal. They chose him, he did not choose them. The relation of the minister and the people is of the closest nature. They are brethren in the Lord, children of the same family, heirs to the same inheritance. He is their leader, their spiritual instructor, their sympathetic friend; the ties that bind them together are sweet and tender; his presence has heightened the joys of the wedding feast, and in the hour of darkness his voice has tenderly led them to lean upon the everlasting arms; they are, many of them, his children in the Lord, begotten in Christ Jesus through his preaching of the Word; their growth in the grace and knowledge of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ depends upon his faithful ministry. Where each realize their dependence upon the other, the question of rights is easily settled.

With this view of the minister and his work let us consider his relation to a brother minister in whose pulpit he may for a time be engaged. There are two general cases to be treated, each involving a number of subordinate ones. First, when the minister is present; second, when the minister is absent. Each will be treated in its order. There are several obvious rules governing the conduct of the visiting minister which are applicable to all cases where the minister is present. From whatever source the invitation may have come, whether through the solicitation of a friend or the spontaneous cordiality of the minister, the visitor should bear in mind that he is there by the courtesy of the other, and a proper conception of right demands that such courtesy shall not be violated. Every preacher has his own plans of work and his own method of conducting the services of the church. They may be crude and need changing. They may see much to critise, but his pulpit conduct ought not to indicate it. A word in private will generally be far more effective than a public rebuke or suggestion, and certainly will be less humiliating. Good-breeding would seem to suggest that the visitor lend himself in every possible way to the support of his host, but on the other hand it would also suggest that he refrain from fulsome eulogy and extravagant praise, both of the man and of his work. Such is suggestive of either insincerity or want of a proper conception of the fitness of things.

Probably the simplest case engaging our attention is the visiting minister, who through the courtesy of the resident minister is invited to participate in the services, either by conducting the opening exercises or by preaching. He may be visiting some member of the congregation, or the preacher himself, or he may be the preacher out of a place who has just dropped in to see the brethren. His conduct will depend very largely upon his conception of the responsibility of the public ministry. With some the reading of a portion of Scripture before an audience assembled for worship and the leading of a hundred or more hearts to a throne of grace in grateful praise or humble petition are but passing incidents. The responsibility sits as lightly upon their shoulders as the cares of citizenship upon the average politician, and the duties are discharged with about as much unction. With them an invitation to preach is evidently regarded as an opportunity for parade of their personal accomplishments, and especially if the visitor is the older and considers himself the superior preacher. But if his conception of his ministry is Pauline every duty will be so discharged as to inspire reverence for the gospel of Christ. There is a temptation to which we all are more or less susceptible in associated pulpit work, and which ought to be studiously avoided. It is what Alexander Campbell denominated "complimentary prayers, or prayers to human beings not yet deified." He was led to such reflections by observing that certain clergymen when associated with one another in public work, prayed with great earnestness for each other, but when either was absent the other asked no blessing for him. The practice of one Christian praying for another, or the one minister praying for another, is not condemned unless the nature of the petition itself indcates that it is intended for human as well as divine hearing.

It is scarcely to be expected that a preacher who has been invited to participate in the meeting of the church upon the invitation of the regular minister would use the opportunity to further his ends. But there are cases in which such opportunities become temptations to designing men. Bro. Beanblossom dwells in other places than Boomville. The minister residing in a place where he is not employed by the church will naturally be frequently called upon to assist the preacher in his public ministrations. If he is a modest Christian man he will readily see that he can materially aid in building up or in tearing down his brother's work. His own intuitive sense of right should lead him to make his public appearance such as to acquit him of any self-seeking.

The present prevailing custom of ministers exchanging meetings affords occasion for the enlargement of one's field of usefulness. The primary purpose of the exchange is the saving of souls and the building up of the church. Aside from the privilege of enlarging one's acquaintance with the people of God, the inspiration of preaching the gospel to new congregations, many of whom may be brought into the kingdom of Christ, furnishes a motive for painstaking effort not to be considered lightly. Phillips Brooks advises preachers to occasionally go and preach to a congregation in which they do not know a face, in order that they may keep the impression of preaching to humanity, and so to keep the truth which they preach as large as it ought to be. But the exchange is not free from danger both to preachers and congregations. Contemporaneous history will probably furnish instances in which after such meetings the visiting preacher has received a call to the church, while the pastor was compelled to seek green fields and pastors new. This may not be the fault of any one in particular. It may be the result of circumstances. The new minister may by his faithful preaching of the Word have so impressed his ability upon the people, and they may have so recognized their own need and their own minister's inability to satisfy it that the call followed as a matter of course. I do not speak against such a result. It is the means used to bring it about. If the call is the outcome of circumstances for which the recipient is not responsible, well; but if it is the culmination of a well-laid plan such conduct is despicable and merits the severest condemnation.

The evangelist probably occupies more pulpits and comes into contact with more people than any other minister. His ever-changing audience, making it necessary for him to dwell upon themes that move men to action, keeps vivid the impression of preaching to the world; while his constantly varying associations with Christians give him the largest views of God's people. Fortunately the New Testament gives direction concerning the work of evangelists. Timothy and Titus were evangelists who, under apostolic instructions, visited the churches, setting in order the things that were wanting, preaching the Word, rebuking sinners and comforting saints, with all long-suffering and teaching. Their work was strong and fruitful. When an evangelist is called to hold a meeting for a church, it is generally expected that he will be for the time being the leader and that all will obey his instructions. Yet is it not possible for him to assume too much responsibility? It not infrequently happens that both minister and congregation find themselves compelled to follow a leadership which is not at all pleasant and which the after effects show was not at all wise. Admitting that human nature is the same everywhere, it nevertheless is true that the faithful man of God who has labored for a year or two, or more, in a certain place knows the condition of the field better than any man can who has just come into it for a few weeks' meeting, and his views ought to command the utmost respect. It is often said that an evangelist can say things which the regular minister could not say. The people, knowing that the evangelist will soon move on and that the success of the meeting depends upon their earnest support, will tolerate from him what they would not from their own preacher. Two fundamental errors lie at the basis of this supposition. The first is that the discussion of such subjects results in permanent good, which is doubtful; and second, that the preacher's main business is to hold his job, which is entirely false. His business is to so preach the Word that sinners may be led to Christ and that they may be so taught that they will stay with Christ, and there is no subject needing public discussion that the faithful preacher of the gospel may not with the utmost propriety discuss. That men do declare the whole counsel of God and continue to grow in the affections of their people is abundantly proved by the number of long pastorates of faithful men of God among us. The apostle's instructions to the evangelists to set in order the things that are wanting are more applicable to the resident minister than to the evangelist. The same restraints that courtesy places upon one minister visiting another will apply with equal force to the evangelists.

There are some self-appointed evangelists—not many,it is to be hoped—who seem to consider that the preacher has no voice in the affairs of the congregation,and hence he is ignored and all dealing had with the church through them. This is not a fanciful case, as the following illustration will show: The writer was visited by such a brother in the second month of his ministry. He was introduced to the brethren and recommended by an old preacher who had served three congregations in that part of the country for years. It being Wednesday he was invited to preach that evening in the place of prayer-meeting. In the course of the conversation he was informed that the congregation was not in the proper condition for a meeting; that they were expecting an evangelist in a few weeks with whom they had an engagement, and they could not support two meetings so close together. He protested that he preached the gospel "without money and without price," although he had a wife and nine children at home. At the close of his sermon that evening he proposed to the congregation that he remain and hold them a meeting, and under the influence of a few friends of the old preacher who had introduced him, the majority of those present decided to have him stay. He accordingly made his announcements for the next evening, and during the eight days of his stay took complete charge of the services, condescending to permit the preacher to announce the hymns and occasionally make the opening prayer. It is needless to add that the meeting die not result in adding any to the Lord. A sensitive regard for his relation to a brother minister does not require an evangelist, or any other minister, for that matter, to compromise the truth, or to refrain from rebuking sin. He is instructed to speak the truth in love. The temptation is to leave the impression that the latter clause is forgotten. A writer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, a few years ago, commenting upon the number of times the reports from the field assured the people that the preacher had "shunned not to declare the whole counsel of God," remarked that that usually meant a very pugnacious sort of preaching.

One more case remains to be considered under this head. It is the relation of the financial agent or missionary secretary to the minister. There is room here for an exchange of courtesies. Our great missionary causes, our colleges, orphan homes and other benevolent institutions are public enterprises, belonging to the great brotherhood, and as such are entitled to their united support. The men upon whom rests the responsibility of bringing their claims before the people must necessarily be hampered in their work unless they can have the hearty co-operation of their preaching brethren. The fact that about two-thirds of our churches are not enlisted in these great movements is evidence that such co-operation is not at present very hearty. Looking at it from the minister's point of view he naturally feels that he should be consulted by any secretary desiring to visit the congregation, both as to time and expediency of presenting the claims. And this would seem to be right. There may be circumstances known to him which would make a visit at a certain time both inexpedient for the church and unfortunate for the cause represented. On the other hand there are preachers with whom every time would be inopportune and who would never be willing to let the people hear a claim. In such a case recourse must be had to an appeal to the people. The larger interests are entitled to greater consideration.

In general what has been said of a minister's conduct in another's pulpit when his brother minister is present will apply with equal force when he is not present. The latter case, however, presents some temptations which the former does not. It is not necessary to assume that a preacher has no higher aim than to further his own interests when it is said that the absence of the regular minister furnishes a greater temptation to discourteous treatment than his presence does. A man may be confronted with temptations for which he is not responsible. A preacher ministering to a small congregation on a small salary may have an opportunity to fill the pulpit of a brother whose circumstances are so far superior to his own as to create a longing for a similar place for himself. He may even go further and be led so far as to forget his moral obligation and to let his conduct betray the confidence of his friend, without having purposed to do so. Even a literal interpretation of the Golden Rule would suggest that one minister ought to avoid unfavorable criticism of another's work, especially when he is not there to defend himself. It requires very little ability to find fault; it takes much wisdom to produce a remedy. But open criticism is not the only, nor in fact the most effective means of injuring another. Oftentimes more weight is attached to what is left unsaid than to what is said. Condemnation with faint praise is sometimes very effective. The preacher ought to do better than that. He ought to not only refrain from criticising,but he ought as he conscientiously can to give the work his whole-hearted support. He can do this and not compromise the truth in any way.

The ministers in exchanging Sunday appointments with one another is a representative case. For the time being the responsibilities of each rest upon the other. Each is the other's guest, and as neither would be guilty of alienating the affections of the wife or child of the other, no more should he be guilty of stealing the hearts of the people. It would be proper for each to ascertain beforehand the hopes and fears of the other that he might avoid things calculated to create discord, and at the same time reinforce his brother's work. If it be objected that these limitations are too great and that his conduct is too circumscribed, the answer is that he still has the gospel story with all of its sweetness and pathos to present, and that it affords a choice of subjects that will win for him the esteem of his brethren and result in the saving of souls. The conduct of the evangelist, the traveled parson, the missionary secretary, would not differ materially from the case already treated. Thus far we have only been dealing with cases in the family, if you please, or among our own brethren.

One other case demands attention. It is the exchange of pulpits by ministers of different religious bodies. To a people whose rallying cry is "a union of all Christians" every chance to get over into our neighbor's pasture and mingle with the sheep ought to be utilized and made to further the cause we plead. The most important question for the preacher to decide would naturally be, What should be the subject to be presented? Upon the character of his preaching will depend the friendly feeling of the two churches. One theme is always acceptable, namely, Christ. All can agree upon Christ as the world's Redeemer, and none need be offended in him. To choose a controverted subject for discussion would be not only unwise, but unchristian. For a Christian minister, under invitation to speak to a Methodist congregation, to choose "Conversion" or "Baptism" for his theme, unless invited to do so, or vice versa, would be as great an offense against good taste as it would be for a guest to insist on making a recognized question of dispute the subject of discussion in his host's parlor. If great nations can exercise diplomacy for the sake of peace, the children of light ought to profit by their wisdom. This does not imply a "wishy-washy" doctrine nor any compromise of the truth. Alexander Campbell was the prince of reformers, who never swerved an iota from the truth, and yet in his time he occupied the pulpits of Congregationalists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists and others, and with but few exceptions he was free to return when he would. During our national convention at Nashville in 1892, one of our able ministers occupied the pulpit of the McEndree M. E. church, and at the close of the sermon the minister said to his congregation, "I shall never again call these people 'Campbellites.'" The truth must conquer, if the spirit in which it is presented is right.

The Savior, on the night in which he was betrayed, rising from the supper and laying aside his garments, took a basin of water, and girding himself with a towel, washed his disciples' feet and wiped them with the towel wherewith he was girded. A little later he said to them, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you that ye also love one another." The twelve needed this beautiful example and this teaching. A short time previous they had been discussing who should be greatest in the kingdom of heaven. Their conceptions then were earthly. But after they were endowed with power from on high, and the Holy Spirit had quickened their understanding, the question no longer was, "What shall we have?" but rather, "What can we sacrifice?" They recognized the world's need and their own limitations, and they stood together for the faith of the gospel. There were no longer jealous rivalries. Peter and James, recognizing the abilities of Paul and Barnabas, were willing that they should go to the Gentiles, while they themselves went to the Jews. In letter and in spirit they fulfilled the new commandment. May God give grace to his ministers to-day to manifest a like spirit!

INTERPRETATION VS. REPUDIATION.

H. W. B. MYRICK.

"I speak as unto wise men; judge ye what I say." In this way Paul invited criticism, investigation. Here are two factors in the process of revelation presented. They are (1) speaking; (2) hearing, or judging. The first is God's gracious revelation to man by the Spirit-chosen words of holy men whom he selected to deliver his messages to fallen men. The second is the rapt, honest attention of men seeking to know, in the first place, the actual content of the message; and in the second place, the righteous reception and application of the message to human needs. These are the co-ordinate steps in the revelation of God's will and its "effectual working" in the salvation of sinful men and women.

1. "I speak." How did Paul speak? "Not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God;" "not with . . . words of man's wisdom." It was the testimony of God, and it was not spoken in words of man's wisdom. How did Paul know this testimony? "None of the princes of this world knew . . . But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit." Also, as in Gal. 1:11: "The gospel which was preached of me is not after man. I neither received it of man, but was taught it by the revelation of Jesus Christ." So the gospel is a revelation. It is not an ethical growth, slowly evolving from the self-illuminated consciences of earnest seekers, groping after the truth through weary centuries. No; it is the communication of divine knowledge suitable to our needs; in words of divine selection, expressed by inspiration of the Spirit of God. It is God's testimony. It was not taught by man, nor deduced from human experience, nor made known by the syllogism of the logician or the winged fancy of the poet or the philosopher. Revelation was God's business, and he gave it in God's words, spoken by God's men.

How did Paul speak? "Which things also we speak, in words . . . which the Holy Spirit teacheth." (See, for these quotations, 1 Cor. 2.) Again we read: "Holy men of God spake, moved by the Holy Spirit" (2 Pet. 1:21). We have "preached the gospel unto you with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven." Of Pentecost it is said: "They began to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance." So when Paul says "I speak," we may safely conclude the following things are true: It was God's message, a revelation; not the product of human wisdom or experience. It was couched in language "which the Holy Ghost teacheth;" or, in other words, was the language of inspiration. The Holy Spirit "moved" them—not caprice of man, fear of foe nor flattery of friend. The apostles did not trim their discourses, nor embellish; they neither added to nor diminished from. To contend they did is to discredit inspiration and impeach the Holy Spirit. The gospel message, in the measure of its content, is just what was needed—no more, no less.

2. "Judge ye what I say." Here is our work. Revelation is of God. We must submissively come with this conviction. These are God's words; they are final. Our work is to find out just what was said and accept, not reject. We are to interpret, not to repudiate. We are to learn human duty, not to criticise divine wisdom. We cannot retain belief in inspiration if men are to discover that the gospel message was trimmed, expurgated, softened here and there at the pleasure of the men who preached it. No; the gospel message, fully, as far as needed, at any time, was always spoken by the apostle, else the claim of inspiration is a farce. Christ said: "I have many things to say, but hitherto ye were not able to bear them." Paul may have refrained at times to speak of some things in the scheme of redemption, not trimming, but giving as the hearer was able to bear. I preached a sermon once, and one "loyal" brother criticised me because I omitted baptism. I answered that the people needed other portions of the gospel at that point. Omissions can be accounted for without impeaching either man's honor or the wisdom of the Holy Spirit.

Brethren, if we are to maintain our respect for the gospel we must "receive it as it is in truth, the Word of God." No shadow of suspicion must be allowed to fall upon it. At every place, on every great occasion, at every critical juncture, the Holy Spirit was in charge of the work, "moved" the men, and so just enough was always said—no more and no less. We find here the all-wise God, the illuminating Spirit, honest apostles, and hence the "Scripture cannot be broken." The bearing of this article upon recent communications is obvious. May the Lord guide us by his loving counsel.

IS EVERYTHING FOR THE BEST?

GEO. T. SMITH.

Consoling if true. Would not such security lead to carelessness, and cut the nerve of effort?

One man's life is too short to determine. Some are so fortunate, always lighting on their feet, while others are rolled and tumbled through life.

The nearest the Word comes to saying so is Rom. 8:28,29: "All things work together for good." But not for everybody; for one class. It is described from above and below. From the human side it is those who love God; from the divine standpoint it is those who are the called according to his purpose. In his purpose these are called, justified and glorified. Not in reality, but in God's plan. He foreknew this class, and predestinated them to be conformed to the image of Christ; conformed to Christ in mind and heart here, then in body at the resurrection. For this class all things work together for good.

What is good? That is the crucial word. Our definition or God's; which shall say what is good? Not riches, but righteousness; not ease, but excellence; not comfort, but consecration; not many things, but manhood; not luxury, but life; not bodily pleasure, but spiritual profit; not earthly treasures, but the Holy Spirit, are good, by God's measure. Since it is God's purpose to people heaven with those who are fully conformed to the image of Christ, since he made the Captain of their salvation perfect through suffering, it follows that he may lead us through a sharp and stony way. Chastening (Heb. 12), pruning (John 15), trial as in a furnace (1 Pet. 1), may be essential to secure the highest good. Note the comparisons in these Scriptures: Children, vines, debased gold. So we are. We need discipline.

All things work, not are. The result is good. No chastening for the present seemeth good, but rather grievous. Afterward it yields richly. All things. But "all" is a limited word in Holy Writ. Man was created for joy. Not nerve was made for pain. No natural desire was made for pain. No natural desire was given to be a torment, or sinful if satisfied. Therefore, all good things work for good, are good at once. All evil things? Evil is of two kinds. Moral evil is not for good. It may be overruled, as Longfellow sings:

> "St. Augustine! well hast thou said
> That of our vices we can frame
> A ladder, if we will but tread
> Beneath our feet each deed of shame."

Sin does not work for good. It may be forgiven, but says Browning:

> "However near I stand in his regard,
> So much the nearer had I stood by steps
> Offered the feet which spurned their help."

The "all things" are defined in the context. All physical evil, persecution, injustice, trials, sufferings, toil unrequited, and sorrow over others' woe—these are the things which the world laments as unmitigated evil, but which work for us a greater, an inexpressible weight of glory.

For the man without a hope in Christ every loss is an eternal regret. The marble face in the white casket is gone forever; no sweet hope and wonder of the future meeting lessen his grief. The house burned down is a permanent substraction from his means of joy; there is no consolation that for him there is a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. All his joy is bounded by time. At the end of life he leaves all worth having, and goes forth a pauper and friendless. For him everything is not for the best. But for you and me, "we know;" not we see. He uses "know" as Peter did on the day of Pentecost when he bade the Jews to "know assuredly;" that is, to believe firmly that Christ was enthroned. So we know, though we see not clearly through the fogs; we know that love leads and all shall be for good.

The American Baptist Yearbook for 1888 reports 43,397 churches in the United States, with 27,355 ministers and a total membership of 4,055,806. It reports 22,529 Sunday-schools with a total membership of 1,801,053. Over 5,000 of its churches have no Sunday-schools, and the membership of the schools is less than one-half that of the churches.

Our Budget.

—The war tax is on.

—The worst tax is sin tax.

—The best tax is self-imposed for Christ's sake.

—We desire to mention the article in this paper on "Ministerial Courtesy" by Bro. Peters as worthy of special attention. It is written carefully, thoughtfully and in good spirit, and deals with a practical question. We are able also to give our readers a half-tone picture of the author of the article.

—Our illustrated letter in our Family circle, this week, from Santa Cruz, Cal., is written by one who was formerly a resident of this city, but is captivated, as you will see, with the climate and country from whence he writes.

—In our next issue we shall publish the excellent paper on "Church Finance," prepared by Albert Schwartz and read before the district convention at Shenandoah, Iowa, last spring.

—Accoding to the report of the secretaries of Home Missions there was a loss of $151.04 for the week ending July 9th, over that of last year for the same week. The total for the week was $622.53, contributed by thirty-three churches, nine individuals and five otherwise. There were, however, seventeen new church contrbutors and of the former contributing for the week twelve gave increased amounts.

—Two weeks ago we stated that the Sweeney-Throgmorton debate, which had been previously announced in our columns to come off at Allen Springs, Pope, county, Ill., commencing on the 27th inst., was indefinitely postponed. This statement was based upon what we considered one of the best of reasons, viz., Bro. Sweeney's ill-health, rendering it impossible for him to perform his part. While Bro. Sweeney has our sympathy, yet we are glad to be able to say that through the persistent efforts of C. J. Kimball, of this office, an able, efficient and acceptable substitute for Bro. Sweeney has been secured in the person J. B. Briney, of Moberly, Mo., who has agreed to meet Mr. Throgmorton at the time and place originally announced, and that he (Throgmorton) has accepted the substitute; so that the discussion is expected to go on without further hitch or interruption. Remember the place and time—Allen Springs, Ill., July 27.

—Hell is filled with Catholic rich men who are damned for the good that they have neglected to do on account of a criminal indifference to the progress of God's kingdom and the welfare of souls.—Church Progress.

Of what use, then, is Mass for the dead?

—Do not forget the fact that the C. W. B. M. watchword is "Ninety thousand in Ninety-nine."

—The Kingdom Publishing Company has discontinued for the present all responsibilities for the publication of "The Kingdom," that responsibility having been personally assumed by Mr. H. W. Gleason, the managing editor. This step was taken in consequence of litigation with the American Book Company.

—The guerrilla fire upon passing ambulances carrying wounded soldiers from the field of battle at Santiago is a sorrowful comment upon Spanish honor, about which Spaniards have had so much to say of late.

—Dr. W. E. Garrison's first letter from England, for our columns, appears in this issue. We are expecting communications from him regularly while on his bicycle tour through England.

—The offerings for Home Missions for the week ending July 2nd was $1,099.45, a gain of $189.35. The total offerings for June were $5,267.07, a gain over June of last year of $213,20.

—We print the program of the Missouri Christian Lectureship, to be held at Carrollton, July 18-21, again in this issue.

—Another new magazine coming to our table recently is The Pulpit and Social Problems, from San Francisco, Cal. The table of contents for the June number indicates that a magazine of high order is contemplated by its founders. Practical themes are treated by prominent men, and we are always ready to welcome magazines of this class to our table. We hope the founders of this enterprise may realize their fondest expectations therein.

—The Christian Literature Co., of Buffalo, N. Y., has launched a new magazine under the name In His Steps. No. 1 Vol. I contains thirty-two pages and is filled with well-selected, short articles of a newsy, practical nature and pleasant to read. The spiritual tone of the magazine is clearly Christian, and we trust it may bear much fruit for the Master.

—It is predicted that America will soon be building warships for everybody. The superiority of American warships at Manila and Santiago is now the talk of the world.

—The receipts for Foreign Missions for June are reported to be $25,814.12, a gain over June of last year of $3,295.07. The receipts since October 1st, 1897, to July 1st, 1898, amount to $83,062.95, or a gain of $9,140.00 over the corresponding nine months last year. Remember, our task is to reach $100,000 by collections only. Only three months until the books close. Ten new missionaries will sail in September. Send collections direct to F. M. Rains, Box 750, Cincinnati, Ohio.

—The new United States one-cent postage stamp shows a picture of a Jesuit priest, Marquette, in gown and with crucifix. Why not the Pope blessing the Spaniards? Now let us have Baptist, Methodist and other denominational stamps.—American Citizen.

—Drake University Bulletin announces the following of its students, or Alumni, now soldiers in our war with Spain: Herman Williams, '96, Chaplain of the third regiment, now the fifty-first Iowa; A. Murray; Mr. Elgin; Mr. Keating; Allen Hickey, Medical Department, and Mark Williams, also a former student. Some have been ordered West to Manila, and some of them to Cuba or Puerto Rico.

—Among the prominent men who preached at Nashville last Sunday was F. D. Power, of Washington, D. C.

—The President's proclamation to make last Sunday a day of thanksgiving to God for victories on land and sea in behalf of freedom's cause was generally observed in St. Louis.

—Sherman Hill, of Butte, Mont., contributes an interesting article to our columns this week on Gladstone. The philosophy of greatness introductory to what he says about Gladstone is particularly interesting. The facts and characteristics of Gladstone and his life indicate good analytical mental qualities. Bro. Hill has contributed a number of very excellent thoughtful articles for our columns.

—Our obituary column this week contains the first tribute to a soldier of the present war, that of Charles B. Caton, of Terre Haute, Ind., who died at camp Alger, Va., June 25, 1898. The beautiful tribute is written by W. W. Witmer, of Terre Haute, Ind.

—The Bible has not been driven out of the public schools of New York wholly at least. In a reception program of Grammar School No. 61, that has come to hand, the first exercise stated is "Reading of the Scriptures."

—We call attention to our advertisement in this paper offering C. W. B. M. auxiliaries an opportunity to strengthen their burdened treasuries by the sale of A. McLean's "Circuit of the Globe."

—In this issue A. C. Hopkins announces over his own signature that he has leased Oskaloosa College and will reorganize it upon a broader practical basis for a larger patronage. See Notes and News page.

—We have a newsy letter from Red Oak, Ia., but no signature to it. Publication must be withheld until the writer is known.

—The interesting account of Butler Commencement is long, but appears in full this week.

—Some good resolutions and great speeches were made at the Temperance Congress at Prohibition Park, Staten Island, New York, during the first week in July, which will tend to strengthen temperance sentiment and emphasize the need for united action against the nation's greatest curse. Steps were taken in the appointment of committees to secure a closer co-operation of all the temperance forces in the United States, a thing which, if accomplished, would dispose of the liquor traffic as quickly and effectively as was the Spanish fleet at Manila and at Santiago.

—The church building at Malden, Mo., was struck by lightning during one of the recent severe thunder storms and totally destroyed. The church is cast down over their loss, but not disheartened. Steps will be taken at once to rebuild. The house destroyed cost $2,000.

—The church at Fredricksburg, Va., is asking for greatly needed help to secure a house of worship. They want churches to whom they are addressing circular letters, and others, to send at least two dollars each for that purpose. Cephas Shelburne is their pastor and is supported there by the Virginia Tidewater Board. We trust that the amount asked may be forwarded and the amount needed soon raised for a house. It will take a large number of two-dollar bills to build much of a church building.

—In keeping with the President's proclamation to observe last Sunday as a day of thanksgiving for American victories on land and sea, Archbishop Ireland, of St. Paul, ordered the "Te Deum" to be chanted in thanksgiving for the victories gained and the Litany of Jesus to be be recited for the speedy granting of peace to the nations now engaged in deadly warfare, and stated that he would preach in the Cathedral on Sunday morning. In view of the accusations of disloyalty sometimes heard against Roman Catholics, and also of the fact that the victories to be thankful for were over Roman Catholic subjects, the above act of the Archbishop becomes a matter of more than passing interest. We can hardly say that it was not issued and observed in good faith and speaks volumes for the loyalty of American Catholicism in this war.

—We are giving our readers substantial evidence that we intend the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST shall be the equal, at least, of any of the religious journals in the land, and we shall expect them to show their appreciation of this fact by assisting us to add many new subscribers to our list. This will encourage us and make it possible for us to carry out our program of improvements. In order to make this an easy matter, we are making a special offer this month, to new subscribers, of seventy-five cents for the remainder of the year 1898, beginning with our first thirty-two page issue of July 7th. If you are ready to help us in the way indicated, write for sample copies at once.

—We call your attention to the letter, published elsewhere, of D. L. Moody in reference to the work of the "Army and Navy Christian Commission." We are glad that Mr. Moody is giving his personal attention to this important work, and it gives us pleasure to co-operate with him and his coworkers in extending whatever help in the way of religious instruction or consolation we can to our soldiers and sailors. It is an opportunity for doing good which should be improved to the utmost extent. We trust that the Christian people of the country generally will appreciate the value of this work, and lend it such aid as they can. Many a young man who is careless about his religious interests at home will, when exposed to danger and death on the battle field, be brought into a state of mind in which he will welcome religious truth. Many, too, who were Christians at home will meet with the temptations of camp life and will need the warnings and instruction of faithful religious teachings and good religious literature. Let those of us who are at home seek to supply this need of our boys who go to the front.

—The criticism in this paper by "Criticus," on Bro. Fergusson's critic on the Baptism of the Holy Spirit article is written in good spirit and merits careful reading.

—Rev. G. A. L. Dykes, who has labored successfully among the ex-slaves of the Cherokee, Creek, Seminole, Choctaw and Chickasaw Indian tribes for fifteen years, after building churches at Muscogee, Eufaula, Tahlequah and Vinita, has accepted the presidency of the Sisson Industrial School at Muscogee, Indian Territory, and is seeking aid among the friends of industrial training to finish up the building there and enable them to carry on the work. He says that $1,650 more will complete the building in Muscogee, and give a farm with one hundred acres of good land. This work is not supported by any religious board, and Dr. Dykes is seeking the personal aid of friends to the work independent of church lines. He says that this particular class of colored people in the Indian Territory is practically without school privileges, and hence his peculiar work and special mission. He called at this office on last Thursday.

—The Union Signal says that the drink bill of the United States from 1890 to 1895 is $8,140,135,523, and for the year 1896, $1,196,878,422. These figures are simply appalling. If this vast sum of money had only gone for some good purpose how different the condition of our people and land might have been to-day! And yet we talk of doing things according to science, civilization and Christianity! The above figures are overwhelmingly against our high claims to these high things.

—A most appalling disaster occurred at sea on the fourth of the present month. The British steamer Cromartyshire and the French line steamship La Bourgogne, collided in a dense fog sixty miles south of Sable Islands. The French liner sailed from New York July second with seven hundred and sixteen persons on board, including the crew, bound for Havre, France. The Cromartyshire struck the La Bourgogne amidship, rending a great hole in her side, which caused her to sink after a few minutes. The scenes witnessed aboard the steamer before she sank were heart-rending in the extreme. One of the ship's company furnished this recapitulation: First-class passengers, 75; second-class passengers, 123; third-class passengers, 285; ship's crew, 233; total on board, 716; passengers saved, 53; ship's crew saved, 110; total saved, 163; drowned, 553. Much cruelty seems to have been shown by some persons, first thought to be the crew, but this has been denied. Men fought for positions and women were crowded back and even out of the boats that were being launched and other heartless acts. This incident is one of the worst of its kind in history, but it seems to have been unavoidable. Both vessels were steaming at good speed, too fast, perhaps, for a fog, and could not change their course after seeing each other in time to prevent the collision.

—The failure of the Pope to bring peace to Spain and America has made him painfully conscious of his impotency as a political factor among the nations of the earth.

—We are glad to learn that Henry R. Pritchard, of Indianapolis, Ind., is to leave to his brethren the heritage of a book as well as a long and useful life in the ministry of the gospel. The book, we learn, from the Indiana Christian, will contain seventeen of his masterly sermons and a biographical sketch of his life by Dr. B. B. Tyler, of the editorial staff of this paper.

—According to the following statement of the Indiana Christian the Christian Church in that state is about to remove one of the great hindrances and go forward. Read the following:

One thing recommended by the South Bend convention was the evangelization of Southern Indiana. This should be done at all hazzards. That part of our fair state has been too long under the blighting effects of "anti-ism," and it is time that the shackles which bind so many churches in that section of the state, should be broken and they be set free to do the Master's work. But this is not going to be accomplished without great effort. Evil influences have been at work there for years and they will not be overcome in a day, or a month, or a year. Let us put forth continuous and persistent effort to save our cause in Southern Indiana.

—The Presbyterian Banner, June 23rd, contains the following announcement:

ThePresbyterianBanner celebrates its eighty-fourth anniversary and begins its eighty-fifth volume by appearing with important changes. The paper of this issue has been formed by the union of the Presbyterian Banner, founded 1814, and the Presbyterian Messenger, founded 1893, thus uniting the oldest and youngest Presbyterian papers. It is hoped that this union will be attended with the fusion of all the interests of the two papers and the merging together of their constituencies. The Rev. James Allison, D. D., will remain as editor, and the Rev. James H. Snowden will serve as joint editor. The Rev. Joseph T. Gibson, D. D., will serve as associate editor. Important mechanical and literary improvements have also been made. The paper has been reduced in size and number of pages increased, making it more convenient in form, admitting of better paper and press work, and producing a more handy volume when bound.

We shall miss the familiar face of the Presbyterian Messenger from our exchange list, but hope to find an equally companionable friend in the Presbyterian Banner.

PERSONAL MENTION.

J. S. Hughes will deliver a series of his matchless lectures on the Book of Revelation, at Central Christian College, Albany, Mo., beginning July 25, 1898. Mr. Hughes will deliver two lectures each day. Other prominent ministers will speak during the institute.

W. L. Powell has resigned his work at Bucyrus, Ohio, and can be secured elsewhere. He is highly commended by those who know him for his work's sake and any church in need of an energetic, successful preacher should address him at once. He would take a work in any part of the United States.

W. W. Sniff, pastor of the church at Gibson City, Ill., has been elected president of the fourth missionary district of that state.

Samuel Gregg closed his work at Highmore, South Dakota, July 10th, and is now at Cleveland, Minn. He reports forty added to the Highmore church under his ministry and all departments of the church actively at work.

W. E. Reeves, preacher at Denison and Round Prairie, Kansas, has his fifth Sundays at his disposal, and desires to hold some meetings during these periods. He would like to arrange, at once, for a meeting to begin on July 25th continue over the fifth Sunday to August 6th.

Bro. David Walk began work with the East Eighth St. Church in Los Angeles, Cal., in January '97, with 19 members. There are now 132.

J. P. Lucas is expected to begin work in Colorado City, Col., July 17. There are from 60 to 75 members in Colorado City, and a neat chapel has been recently erected.

J. Z. Tyler, of Cleveland, Ohio, has been visiting friends and relatives in and around Lexington since the Kentucky state convention.

In a neat tract, envelope size, under the title, "The Lost Christ and the Lost Unity," Evangelist James Small, of Wheatland, Cal., tells why he is a member of the Christian Church.

A. W. Kokendoffer, of Kansas City, Mo., is spending this month at his father's house, at Bramblet, Nicholas county, Ky.

Christian University, Canton, Mo., has elected Pres. F. O. Norton, of La Belle College, professor of philosophy, and he has accepted. Prof. Norton is said to be one of our best scholars and an experienced teacher.

A large picture of Dr. W. T. Moore appeared in the Columbia Missouri Herald, last week, as one of Missouri's distinguished educators.

A Minister's Son

Face was a Mass of Sores—Advice of an Old Physician Followed with Perfect Success.

"Our eldest child had scrofula trouble ever since he was two years old and the doctors pronounced it very serious. His face became a mass of sores. I was finally advised by an old physician to try Hood's Sarsaparilla and we did so. The child is now strong and healthy and his skin is clear and smooth." REV. R. A. GAMP, Valley, Iowa. Remember

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Is the best—in fact the One True Blood Purifier. Insist upon HOOD'S; take no substitute.

Hood's Pills act harmoniously with Hood's Sarsaparilla. 25c

We learn that the presidency of Bethany College was tendered to B. A. Jenkins, of Indianapolis, Ind., author of Christian Endeavor lesson notes of this paper, and that its acceptance was declined by him.

Edward Davis, of Oakland, California, has accepted an invitation from the church at Lygon St., Melbourne, Australia, and expects to reach his new field of labor sometime in July.

J. B. Haston now preaches for the church at Galveston, Texas.

Peter Ainslie, editor of The Christian Tribune, Baltimore, Md., is back again from his European tour. He makes no mention of having visited Spain.

A. Martin, of Muncie, Ind., will enter the evangelistic field again, August 1st. Any church wanting a protracted meeting should write to him for particulars.

E. F. Mahan, now at Salem, Ind., reports work starting off there encouragingly. He preached the annual sermon for the G. A. Rs there.

The church at Gibson City, Ill., recently extended W. W. Sniff and wife a reception. This and the preceding introductory services were tokens of the pleasure of the church at his acceptance of their call.

Sherman Hill will close his work at Butte, Mont., Sept. 1st, and desires a work more central in the United States. The high altitude of Montana and the effect of smoke from the copper mines at Butte on his wife's health make the change necessary. Bro. Hill is an educated man and an efficient pastor, and the church that secures him will secure a good helper. Since at Butte, Mont., nine months, there have been forty additions to the church. His acdress is 6 S. Idaho St., Butte, Mont.

W. A. Foster is now assisting Bro. Noblitt in a tent meeting at Ellendale, N. D.

F. N. Calvin, of Waco, Texas, will spend July and August in Chicago. His address will be 2628 Wabash Avenue. He says, "if any church within one hundred miles of Chicago would like supply a preacher, or a protracted meeting for that time, he would be glad to hear from them.

H. A. Northcutt reported 13 confessions at Sturgeon, Mo., Sunday evening, July 3rd. We are glad to see patriotism for the heavenly kingdom at the front at such a time.

James Small, of California will arrive in Des Moines, Iowa, August 1st.

L. J. Marshall goes from Huntsville, Mo., to 5473 Ellis Ave., Chicago, Ill., until August 1st. He will begin work with the church at Palmyra, Mo., September 1st.

F. O. Fannon, pastor of the First Church, St. Louis, Mo., has gone on a vacation.

T. W. Grafton and family, of Rock Island, Ill., will spend a two months vacation in Oskaloosa Iowa.

J. H. Stark, of Du Quoin, Ill., will be in Iowa two weeks in July. Pleasantville will be his address.

J. W. Elliott, of Nebraska preached in Cherokee, Iowa on June 26th. Cherokee has given him a call.

Milo G. Cummings will be compelled by the great fire in Pulaski, Iowa to change his field of lakor. Ten business houses burned.

Wm. M. Hollett, of Arlington, Iowa, is called for a fifth year.

A. M. Haggard the Iowa Secretary preached two Sundays at Marshalltown.

J. A. Seaton, of Marion, Iowa, begins a meeting in Estelline, S. D., on July 12th.

B. S. Denny, of Hampton, Iowa, is assisting Wm. Hollett in a meeting at Arlington.

E. C. Wigmore, of Charles City, Iowa, has returned from a three months' vacation on the Pacific Coast.

W. B. Clemmer, of Sloan, Iowa, held a Sunday-school rally in Sioux City with the aid of Pastor Vande Walker.

E. Edwards' gift papers the church house at Webster City.

Pres. Hardin, Eureka, Ill., desires to correspond with some young man who understands directing work in a gymnasium, who desires to recieve his tuition in Eureka College and the fees paid by students, for his services.

From the Indiana Christian we learn that C. S. Medbury, chaplain of the 157th Indiana regiment, baptized three persons at Chickamauga and four at Port Tampa, Florida. He is Angola's missionary among the soldiers.

What Our Friends Think of Our New Form.

Already we are beginning to receive echoes from the first issue in our new form. We give a few as the "first fruits:"

I like your new face and new dress. May this begin a new era in your prosperity and power for doing good. G. A. HOFFMANN.
Columbia, Mo.

The poet says, "A thing of beauty is a joy forever." The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in its new form and dress is certainly "a thing of beauty," and I hope it will be "a joy forever" to all who peruse its well-filled pages.

All preachers with whom I have met admire the new dress and form of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST very mvch. JOHN A. JAYNE.
Allegheny, Pa.

The new CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is clear, clean, crisp and cultured. It is neat and newsy. It is sprightly, sparkling and spiritual. Its frontispiece is a good picture of a man known for grace, grit and gumption.

About Bicycle Touring.

To the able-bodied man or woman who is considering whether or not to go on a bicycle tour for a summer vacation, my advice is, "Go." The pleasure of travel, freed from the necessity of consulting and conforming to time-tables and schedules prepared without regard to your individual convenience, not to mention the expense of railroad fare, the outdoor life of a camp, freed from the possible monotony of remaining in one spot, however lovely; a means of locomotion at once swift, easy and independent; exercise and rest mingled in whatever proportions may suit your fancy; an increasing series of exhilerating incidents and wild adventures; an unrivaled opportunity for seeing the picturesque in nature and observing the life of the people—these are some of the charms of a well-conducted bicycle tour. Over and above all these, and more satisfying, perhaps, than all of them to the mind of the man who delights in activity and finds his keenest pleasure in doing things, is the sense of mastery and accomplishment which comes with the consciousness that you are doing it all yourself. When you have wheeled from the Atlantic to Lake Michigan or from the Upper Mississippi to the Gulf (and after all it is not much of a feat), you will feel that the territory covered is your own. Have you not conquered it? Have you not, in the power of your own might, overcome all the obstacles which it had to offer to your progress? There is in the process that which satisfies the desire of the heart to be doing something, in recreation as well as in business. If one cared to enter at length into the philosophy of bicycling, it might easily be possible on this basis to construct an apology for the much-abused scorcher and show that, however objectionable he may be as a member of society, he is not altogether so irrational a creature as is sometimes supposed. Of course he is a selfish creature, imperiling others for his own pleasure. Of course he sees nothing but his front wheel and hears nothing but the hum of his tires and the click of his chain. Of course he is a public nuisance. But on one truth he has a firm grip and he appreciates it, though he overworks it and thereby brings it into disrepute, as many another good truth has been brought into disrepute by being overworked. The truth is that the keenest pleasure and the best recreation are to be found, not in seeing or hearing, but in doing.

But enough of the odious scorcher. I have no desire to lose your favor and shut your ears to what I have to say, by challenging his unpopular cause. The best proof, after all, of the superiority of active over passive pleasures will be found not in a wild, muscle-wearing and heart-straining ride of a hundred and fifty miles in a day, but in a decent and moderate bicycle tour at a reasonable pace through an interesting country.

But perhaps my initial recommendation to "go" was too general. People can not all take the same sort of vacation any more than they can eat the same sort of food or wear clothes cut from the same pattern. A man's vacation must be made to fit him, just like his coat. Some, by reason of physical peculiarities, cannot find ready-made clothes to fit them. For others no ready-made vacation will do. A little round of sight-seeing among other sight-seers, a few weeks at a resort, a trip around the well-worn circle of European travel—these are well enough in their way, but they are like ready-made clothes which may or may not fit you. Look through the lot, and if none of them will do, then mount your trusty wheel and ride away as free as the summer breeze to make for yourself, according to your own fancy, a vacation which will fit you like a glove and will be a free expression of your individuality in the matter of vacations. Plan it all out beforehand, or plan it as you go, or don't plan it at all. It makes little difference which you do. The beauty of it is that you can do as you please. But don't forget that you are out to enjoy everything, sunshine and shower, down hill and up, smooth road and rough. You will find them all in the course of your trip, if it be a week long or more, and if you are going to allow a sudden shower, a punctured tire or a few miles of sandy road to make you unhappy, then by all means stay at home and spend your vacation weeks swinging in a hammock or playing croquet. If you can be happy only when physically comfortable, then do not risk a bicycle trip, for there will be many hours when there would be more actual comfort in the aforesaid hammock than in pushing a wheel through the sand of a country road or ploughing through the mud in the premature dusk of a rainy day to reach a gloomy inn before it is absolutely dark. If you don't habitually and constitutionally enjoy everything, then stay at home. At any rate don't, please don't, go on a bicycle tour and blame me if you fail to have a good time.

If, on the basis of these representations, you are persuaded that it is worth your while, you are hereby invited to join (in spirit if not in body) a select party of two for a nine weeks' bicycle tour in England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland. Certainly no country possesses in a larger degree than Great Britain the characteristics of good roads, picturesque and varied scenery and abundance of points of interest within comparatively short distance. The home of our ancestors is therefore exceptionally well adapted for such a trip as that which we propose to make, at least so it seems now. We will know more of it by the end of the summer than we do now, when we have not yet set foot upon the land, but are straining our eyes to catch the first glimpse of the green coast of Ireland.

The start has been propitiously made. From Chicago to Toronto by rail is a journey of an afternoon and a night. Thence by boat down the length of Lake Ontario into the St. Lawrence River, down among the Thousand Islands all one glorious morning, and through the rapids at intervals all the afternoon, landing at Montreal before sunset, is a trip sure to leave in the mind of the eastward bound traveler delightful memories and a fresh respect for the natural beauties on his own side of the Atlantic. Three good lines of steamships run from Montreal to Liverpool. It is a thousand miles from Montreal down the great river, past the wonderful Cliff City of Quebec, the only place more French than Montreal, through the gulf of St. Lawrence, past New Brunswick, along the northern edge of the Newfoundland Banks, until we pass Cape Race, our farthest point of land, and stand out to open sea. For all of this first thousand miles we are insured against rough weather, though we have more fog than we like, but for the remaining seventeen hundred (for the Atlantic is narrow so far north) we must take our chances, as passengers from New York must do for their whole three thousand miles.

What is the equipment for a trip of this sort? Not much of anything, except a bicycle suit and sweater, such a change of clothing as may be carried in a small case on the wheel and a mackintosh. We have no trunk and no valise to be sent ahead by rail; not even an extra suit of clothes, which might be convenient at times, but would be too bulky to carry. The most important item is a good bicycle—mind, a good bicycle—one that you can trust. Mine is a Sterling, but in this matter let every man be persuaded in his mind. Now, if you care to follow us, all you have to do is to read from week to week the narrative of such of our experiences as may be worth chronicling under the title WHEELING THROUGH ENGLAND.

New York Letter.

A few weeks since the New York Letter mentioned the fact that three of our brethren graduated recently from Union Theological Seminary in this city. Since that time one of them, Bro. Levi G. Batman, has accepted a call to the church at Mansfield, Ohio, and in order the more fully to equip himself for his life-work, was married on July sixth to Miss Cora Louise Dodds, at the Walnut Street Presbyterian Church, Bloomington, Indiana. This certainly is the proper thing for the young minister to do; and we sincerely wish our young brother and his good wife a long and truly blessed married life. The minister who preaches that "it is not good for man to be alone" ought himself to be an example to the flock. Bro. E. M. Flinn, another of these graduates, is at present looking over the field at Haverhill, Mass., which Bro. F. W. Henry was compelled to vacate recently on account of throat trouble. The church in that city has been forced to retrench somewhat on account of business depression, especially in the shoe trade, as Haverhill is dependent largely on the shoe factories. Notwithstanding, the work is in good condition in the several departments and the outlook promising. We hope Bro. Flinn will decide to locate with them and push the work forward without a break in the pulpit and pastoral ministrations. Bro. Henry en route to California stopped and preached acceptably at the 169th St. church last Lord's day morning. At the close of his discourse a young lady made the good confession and was baptized in the evening. We shall be glad to hear Bro. Henry's throat troubles are improving in Colorado.

The church at Troy, N. Y., continues to enjoy a remarkable degree of prosperity. During the past 10 months 64 persons have been added to this church at the regular services, except 17 who came in at Dr. Tyler's meeting last January. Bro. C. M. Kriedler is one of the most successful pastors among us, as the great growth of his church indicates. He constantly labors to keep up all lines of work together. Children's Day services netted $84 for missions; the C. W. B. M. has a membership of 96; the church enrollment has almost reached the 600 mark. They are now planning to open the Lansingburg Branch or outpost for work, which is a wise step to take. Local mission work is absolutely necessary to the life and continued prosperity of the church in any city. This church has begun now to pay off its debt of $4,000 at the rate of $1,000 per year, and toward the first payment the Ladies' Aid Society has just turned over $500 as the result of their labors for the year. A happy arrangement has been made for the summer services. Beginning with July and continuing till the end of August, union services will be held between the congregation and the Christian Endeavor Society from 7:30 to 8:30 P. M. on Lord's days. Bro. Kreidler is a strong Endeavor man, and in order to keep the Y. P. S. C. E. in vital touch with the church he has just concluded a series of discourses on the pledge, as follows: "Trusting," "I Promise Him," "The Rule of My Life," "A Christian Life," "An Active Member," and "Why Support Christian Endeavor?" We are glad to say many will be pleased and profited by hearing him at our Chattanooga Convention in October on "The Work of the Disciples in New York and New England."

A few days since a beautiful memorial window was unveiled by Joseph Jefferson, in the Church of the Transfiguration, in memory of Edwin Booth, the late celebrated actor. A distinguished company was present includinng representatives of the drama, of literature, of law and of the ministry. The memorial was the gift of the Players' Club, and represents a mediæval histrionic student sitting with a mask in his hands, having just removed it from his face. The almost life-size figure, with gaze fixed upon the mask seems to be absorbed in contemplation of his work. Below the figure is the inscription:

> As one, in suffering all, that suffers nothing;
> A man that fortune's buffets and rewards
> Has ta'en with equal thanks.

Which Booth once told a friend he would choose as his epitaph if ever he should have one. In addition to these lines and just below them is the inscription, "To the Glory of God and in loving memory of Edwin Booth." This is the church known so favorably to actors in New York and from which so many have been buried. It is familiarly known among them as "the little church around the corner," and its former rector was a true friend and counselor of actors and actresses in the city.

The decision of several Foreign Mission boards is to follow the flag into foreign territory with the missionaries shows commendable enterprise. And in order to carry out the work in the most effective manner possible it is proposed to have a conference of the great mission boards to decide who shall enter the several fields (and perhaps who shall stay out) as a measure of economy and interdenominational courtesy. This scheme has many advantageous features especially toward those churches which have what they call the essentials of Christianity in common. But we do not see, for instance, how the Disciples of Christ could consent not to enter the Philippines, Cuba or Porto Rico because forsooth the Methodists and Presbyterians should decide to send missionaries to those islands. If these religious bodies have everything to offer that the Disciples teach certainly such difference should be shown and even more. Why should not the Disciples even support other such missionaries instead of sending their own men into these fields? Doubtless a certain degree of courtesy and co-operation may be enjoyed and should be maintained, but after all it seems each board should be free to enter any of these fields at any place and time according to its own discretion.

The New York Christian Missionary Society and Ministerial Association will meet this year with the 169th St. Church, New York City, August 29th to September 2nd. The program committee promise us an excellent bill of fare in each of the different features of the convention. The opening service with a sermon will be held on Monday evening, Aug. 29th, and all day Tuesday will be devoted to questions and issues peculiarly ministerial in character. The convention proper will open on Wednesday morning and close on Friday evening. The church is planning to care for all who come on what is known as "the convention plan"—provide lodging and breakfast to the delegates free of charge; delegates will pay for dinner and supper, which will be served at reasonable rates. The church extends a hearty welcome to all who may wish to attend, and urgently request all who expect to come kindly to drop us a card at once informing us of the fact, so that a place may be assigned them. Come and help in making the New York convention of 1898 the best in the history of our state work.

Butler Commencement.

The commencement at Butler Collge, Irvington, Ind., was an exceptionally joyous one this year. A spirit of hopefulness prevailed in the exercises, such as had not been felt in recent years, even in the many prosperous commencements that the college has seen. Confidence in the future development of the institution and confidence in its present high position among the colleges of the West was the prevailing feeling that made every heart strong. Professors Brown and Miller, who have been more or less disabled through illness during the past session, were seen about the buildings joining in the commencement functions.

On Sunday afternoon of June 19th a very large audience greeted President Scot Butler, who delivered his sixth annual baccalaureate address to the graduating class. These addresses have become famous in Indianapolis for careful preparation, elegant diction, and classic beauty. This year the President fell not a whit below the high standard he has set for himself. On the contrary, his treatment of the subject of "Patriotism" came at so opportune a moment and was of such large, open-minded, and yet delicately beautful a character that his audience was charmed. Indeed some competent jndges who did not hear it, but read it when published, pronounced it to be what few addresses nowadays attain to be, viz., literature.

On Monday evening, the small but triumphant class of '98 gave its entertainment. On account of a change by which the standard of the academic department was raised one year there would, in the natural course of things, be no class of '98; but several exceptional competent students managed, by extra efforts, to complete the required work in order to be graduated at this commencement. There were, therefore, but five young men—a small but excellent class. It will be followed next year by a very large one. The senior entertainment was largely attended, and the chapel was filled to its utmost capacity. After a varied program, the evening was closed with Mr. Earl Wilfley's ever-popular stereopticon lecture on "Ben Hur." His excellent views, true to history, supported by his elocutionary powers, left the audience in the best of humor at the close of a lengthy program.

On Tuesday the final examinations were continued, and in the evening the President's Girls who have to stand on their feet most of the time work as hard as any day-laborer yet they do not get what is rightly called exercise. Close, confining, indoor occupation gives no exhiliration to the nervous system nor active circulation to the blood. It wears, tears and drags a woman's life away. The whole physical system grows sluggish and torpid under it.

No wonder so many sales girls and factory girls and housewives suffer from indigestion and constipation and bilious troubles. No wonder they are subject to the diseases of the delicate special organism of their sex. The wonder is rather that they can stand it as well as they do.

But "a poor weak woman," as she is termed, will endure bravely and patiently agonies which a strong man would give way under. The fact is women are more patient than they ought to be under such troubles.

Every woman ought to know that she may obtain the most eminent medical advice free of charge and in absolute confidence and privacy by writing to Dr. R. V. Pierce, chief consulting physician of the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, of Buffalo, N. Y. Occupying this position for thirty years he has had a wider practical experience in the treatment of women's diseases than any other physician in this country. His medicines are world-famous for their astonishing efficacy.

The most perfect remedy ever devised for weak and delicate women is Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. His "Golden Medical Discovery" is the only permanent digestive and nutrient tonic. The two medicines taken alternately, form the most perfect and successful course of treatment ever prescribed for female troubles complicated with a sluggish, overwrought, nervous, diseased constitution. In severe constipation Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets should be occasionally taken with the others. They never gripe.

annual reception was tendered to students and friends of the college. His large, roomy, cool and beautiful home was the scene of a happy gathering. The great, high ceilings, the wide verandah, the open grounds, everything on a large scale—these things make one wish for the olden days when "space was ample east and west," and where homes might spread over larger territory rather than be built straight up into the air like soldiers in ranks. But Irvington is still a suburb; there is much ground, much shade, room to breathe and time to think. Many a man or woman at the reception doubtless paused a moment at sometime during the evening upon the wide lawn to glance at a star or follow with his eye the windings of the curved street, or rather lane, and ponder the possibilities of this charming, classic place.

The Bible College held its jubilation meeting on Wednesday afternoon, after the meeting of the college board of trustees. It was a great joy to all present to see the veteran, A. M. Atkinson, restored to a large measure of health and vigor, sitting upon the platform. It was a time of joy for many reasons. The first year of the Bible College had drawn to a close under the most favorable conditions. The outlook for the year to come was of the brightest character.

The fiscal secretary, J. E. Pounds, reports that students are coming in large numbers, and he predicts an attendance for the second year about five times as great as for the first. It is not surprising, then, that a tone of the highest hopefulness pervaded all that was said at this afternoon meeting. Bro. A. B. Philputt, the new pastor of the Central Church, Indianapolis, made the address of the day. He fell most heartily and happily into the spirit of the time and of the college. All present felt that no mistake had been made when Bro. Philputt had been elected a member of the board of trustees of the Bible College; nay, that no mistake had been made in electing him president of that board. His address was followed by short impromptue speeches by A. M. Atkinson, J. E. Pounds, Prof. Benton, A. F. Armstrong and others. Dean Jabez Hall, who presided over the meeting, side by side with Prof. Benton, his colleague in the first year's teaching, gave to all confidence in the solidity of the undertaking. Some of the new members of next year's faculty were also present; but others, either at their homes or traveling in Europe, had not yet arrived upon the ground.

In the evening the Alumni reception and banquet were held in Gymnasium Hall. About a hundred guests were at the tables, presided over by Prof. Wilson, the president of the Alumni Association. Toasts were responded to by several members of the association. C. E. Thornton, of the Third, Church of Indianapolis, a member of the Butler board of trustees, was chosen president of the Alumni, for the coming year. He has expressed the hope, and with the co-operation of the Alumni his executive ability will realize that hope, that next year's gathering shall be the largest and best of recent years. The decorations in the Gymnasium Hall were greatly to be commended, the dinner did credit to the ladies of the Downey Avenue Church, Irvington, who served it, and all in all, the efforts of Prof. Wilson were highly praiseworthy.

The guests departed after midnight with their hearts filled with the general joyousness and hopefulness that pervaded the commencement season.

The graduation exercises took place on Thursday morning at 10 o'clock. The address was delivered by Hon. John L. Griffiths on the topic, "Literature and Life." Mr. Griffiths, who has made for himself in recent years a reputation in this and other states as a political speaker, is also a polished gentleman of literary attainments. His address met with most hearty approbation, and his peroration, of a patriotic character, was greeted with long applause. Rev. J. A. Milburn, of the Second Presbyterian Church, at the presentation of diplomas, made a very graceful speech to the graduating, class upon the "Essence of Gentlemanliness" which he considers the aim of all true culture. President Butler then conferred the degree of A. B. upon the members of the class, and the honorary degree of A. M. upon Dean Hall, of the Bible College.

A very interesting and impressive service took place on Thursday night at the Third Church, in the city, when David Rioch, of the graduating class, was ordained to the Christian ministry. Bro. Rioch is under appointment by the Foreign Board to go to India, and the service was especially interesting because of this fact, and also the fact that his young wife, who is a physician, was at that moment ill in a New York hospital, after undergoing a serious opera- e services were under the direction of Dean Hall, and were shared by Prof. Benton, E. P. Wise, of Irvington; A. B. Philputt, of the Central and Dr. P. MacNab and the pastor of the Third Church.

Irvington has settled down into the quiet, beautiful repose that only college towns know, in the long vacation. But that repose is one filled with pleasant dreams. Her debts are all paid; her endowment, which is not great, but is better than many other colleges can boast, is secure; her faculty are all engaged for next year and are not to be excelled in this state or in the West; her Bible College has almost secured the sum it started out to raise and its future is assured; it is not wonderful, then, that her rest is peaceful and her dreams rosy. If the brotherhood rally around her everywhere as they are doing in this state, there is not the shadow of a doubt that she will be an Amherst or Williams in the West. It is of this she dreams, and there is much in dreams.

BURRIS A. JENKINS.

Letter from Mr. Moody.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

Dear Friend—There are about forty Christian Commission tents at work in the army camps, and I suppose it is safe to say that the workers are touching 20,000 men every day with a positive influence for Christ. We have no means of knowing how many soldiers have been converted thus far. Unquestionably not all the seed has fallen on good ground, but thank God, much of it has. It has been cause for special rejoicing that so many of those who had accepted Christ have been prompt in confessing him and faithful in laboring for their comrades. One of the workers writing from Chickamauga says: "When I first arrived here I saw two men talking earnestly with Mr. Schiverea, and found out afterwards that they were men who had attended some of his meetings in New York last winter, and who had run away from their convictions at that time. They were greatly surprised to find Mr. Schiverea here. Both have now come out definitely for Christ, and are going about telling others about it, and thanking God that they were ever sent to Chickamauga."

We have just sent two more preachers to Camp Thomas, the Rev. D. T. Toy, ofStaten Island, and Mr. Ferd. Schiverea, the evangelist. Dr. Wharton has just left Tampa after a season of great blessing.

We have at last been able to do something for the many. The hundred good books were sent to Rev. Wesley C. Holway, chaplain U. S. S. Vermont, now in New York navy yard. In acknowledging them he says: "We have no ship going immediately to Cuba, so I retain them until opportunity comes to send them where they will do special good. Meantime I have put some in the sick bags of the U. S. S., Topeka, of the Columbia, of this ship, also in the reading-room of the Cob Dock. Will also send some to the Naval Hospital. These books appear to me to be calculated to do great good, and I am anxious that not one of them shall fail of its mission. Thanking you warmly in the name of our sailor men, I am, etc."

Major Whittle writes from Chickamauga: "The interest among the soldiers has deepened since my last letter. In over fourteen meetings Sunday at least 500 men asked for prayer, and there were many decisions. Last night Maxwell and I were at 1st South Carolina, and had perhaps the most fruitful meeting I have ever held. Probably 600 men of the regiment were present. I think over 100 of them said they wanted to be Christians, and over 50 of them came into the circle around our box and knelt on the ground to be prayed for and pointed to Christ. You have no idea of the tenderness among those to whom we preach, and their sympathy with the message we bring them. We are all having the most delightful experience of our lives in preaching Christ."

All over the country the Christian people are becoming more and more aroused to the importance of this opportunity. Mass meetings are being held; the various young people's societies are taking hold of it earnestly, and also the women's societies of the different churches. I wish I could give you some extracts from letters we have been receiving with contributions. May God help us to find our places in this great movement of his Spirit.

Yours sincerely,

D. L. MOODY.

The Doctrine of The Holy Spirit.

The article in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, of the 24th, by a correspondent, challenges the scripturalness of Bro. Fergusson's views in regard to the baptism of the Holy Spirit. I am not concerned to defend the writer of that noble series of articles on the Holy Spirit. So powerfully were his statements fortified with Scripture that defense is not needed. I do, however, wish to point out a few mistakes which his critic falls into in his thoughtful yet (I respectfully suggest) unscriptural response. The writer seems to have a terribly one-sided view of our relation to the Holy Spirit when he propounds the impossibility of baptism into a person, and intimates that the Spirit indwells us, and consequently it cannot be said that we can be baptized in him. Two errors are contained in those propositions. First, the Scriptures aver that we were baptized into Christ. Is not Christ a person? It is because the believer is baptized into Christ that the inspired writer adds, "Therefore we are buried with him" (Rom. 6:3, 4).

Secondly, while it is true that the Spirit is in us, it is none the less true that we are "in the Spirit" (Rom. 8:9), and that we "live in the Spirit" Gal. 6:25), and "pray in the Spirit" (Eph. 6:18). Hence the argument that "the Spirit indwelling the believer is not baptism," loses any force it might have, standing alone, by the counter truth that the Spirit of God is also indwelt by the Christian.

The writer, after emphasizing the "one baptism," in sad forgetfulness of this emphasis afterwards admits that there is a baptism into Christ's sufferings, whereby a place in his kingdom is gained; thereby nullifying any weight that might be attached to his first utterance.

The major matter in the article that I ask permission to dwell upon, however, is a statement so harsh and unscriptural that I wonder greatly that it should ever come from the pen of a Disciple. Does the writer readily believe that a person baptized into the Holy Spirit would be none the better for it? That water baptism would be of greater efficacy, and would be necessary to the remission of sins? I may be forgiven, for I write in love, for saying that the statement to this effect by our brother with a reference to Acts 10:48 is a glaring instance of suppressio veri, suggestio falsi. Not only does Acts 10:48 not endorse the statement, so rashly made, but verse 43 says that "whosoever believeth shall receive remission of sins." Why substitute the word baptize for believe?

ECZEMA ON BABY

My little six-months old girl had Eczema. We used all kinds of remedies, but she kept getting worse. I used to wrap her hands up, and to dress her, had to put her on the table. I could not hold her, she would kick and scream, and, when she could, she would tear her face and arms almost to pieces. Four boxes of CUTICURA (ointment), two cakes of CUTICURA SOAP, and CUTICURA RESOLVENT cured her, and no traces are left.

Do "all the prophets give witness" that whosoever is baptized shall receive remission? I fail to recall a single instance of such testimony. Peter asks, "Can any man forbid water that these should not be baptized which have received the Holy Ghost?" It is news to me that Disciples hold that unbelievers can receive the Holy Ghost. It is certainly not so taught in John 7:38-39: "This spake he of the Spirit which they that believe on him should receive." (See also 14:17.) Hence, Cornelius who did receive the Holy Spirit must have believed on the Christ; if he believed he did experience remission of sins (Acts 13:38-39), which he afterward showed forth in a figure (baptism). It cannot be too strongly emphasized that it is the blood that cleanseth from all sin (1 Jno. 1:7); that it is by the blood we have redemption (Eph. 1:7); by the blood we are justified (Rom. 5:9) and not by water, though it be baptismal water.

We do well to remember that "baptism doth now save us" in a figure (1 Pet. 3:21). It is a sign or seal of that which has actually been accomplished by the precious blood of Christ in the case of the believer.

As Alex. Campbell has it, "The blood of Christ really washes away our sins; baptism formally; Paul's sins were really pardoned when he believed."

In the Millennial Harbinger, page 300, volume 3, in correspondence with Dr. Fishback, the great reformer emphasizes the same trust when he tells Dr. Fishback that he (Mr. Campbell) is in agreement with him in his contention that the free favor of God by which he justifies the believer, or remits his sins, is not suspended till he is baptized in water.

Again, in another place, "Should I find a Pedobaptist more spiritually minded and more devoted to the Lord than one immersed on the profession of his faith, I could not hesitate in giving the preference of my heart to him that loveth most. Did I act otherwise, I would be a mere sectarian, a Pharisee among Christians."

This appeal to the Fathers is in marked contrast to the regrettable utterance of your correspondent to the effect that one baptized in the Holy Spirit can yet be an unforgiven sinner. "Ye are not in the flesh if the Spirit of God dwell in you" (Rom. 8:9). Such an one may be justly said to be born of the Spirit (not living in the flesh), and in regard to his case, in the matter of remission of sins Campbell say, "Those who are thus begotten of God are children of God. To be born of God and born in sin is irreconcilable. Remission of sins is as certainly granted to the born of God as life eternal will be granted to the children of the resurrection."

I hope that this criticism of a "brother beloved" may be a small contribution towards helping to elucidate truth.

I have no doubt that he is as sincere in this matter as myself. CRITICUS.

To the Preachers of Indiana.

The time has fully come when the Church of Christ in Indiana should inaugurate a movement all along the line for the planting of primitive Christianity in every city, town and hamlet in all of our great state.

Every department of church work, pastoral, evangelistic, Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor, missionary, etc., should receive such an impetus, as will carry them on to grander triumphs and greater success than ever before. The people are tired of men-made religions and human theories and are crying out for the pure, sweet, simple gospel of Christ and perishing for the want of it. Everywhere the fields are over-ripe; the harvest is here; the golden grain is ready for the sickle. Is the church of the living God ready to do the work that its great Head asks it to do?

At this opportune time we have a few requests to make of the noble band of preachers in Indiana, who have heretofore made great sacrifices, and who are willing in the future to make still greater, that the old gospel may be preached. Saints strengthened and sinners converted and the church made to rejoice in the trimuphs of Messiah's kingdom.

1. Our Bethany Assembly Encampment meeting will begin on Friday, July 22, and close on Monday, August 15.

The week beginning on Lord's day, July 24, is "Preachers' Week." During that week the State Missionary Society, and State Ministerial Association will hold their convention.

The Home and Foreign Missionary Societies will have interesting exercises connected with their work.

Ministerial Relief, Church Extension, Negro Evangelization, etc., will have all their claims presented by able advocates. Indianapolis University and Butler Bible College will also have a day that week. Bro. Jabez Hall—than whom we have no riper Bible scholar among us—will deliver six lectures to preachers on living themes that will deeply interest all preachers, both old and young. Some important Assembly lectures will be delivered that week—one of the finest "Vitascope" entertainments—something entirely new will be given.

Now, what we desire to urge on our preachers is for them to make their arrangements and attend the Assembly that week. Let all the preachers come up to our great Assembly that week, and let us arrange a campaign of work such as we have never had before in Indiana. Already we have word from a goodly number of preachers from quite a number of other states, saying that they expect to attend Bethany on Preachers' Week. Preachers of Indiana, let us give them a royal welcome, and let us show them our preaching forces, and let us plan great things for God and Christ and the church.

2. We are anxious to enlist, not only the preachers—the watchmen on the walls of Zion—but the business men and women of the church as well. The preachers have their work to do, and we believe that they can be trusted to do it well. So also have the lay members of the church an important work that they alone can do. Too frequently our religious conventions are made up almost wholly by preachers. We would not have a less number of preachers in our conventions, but we would have a much larger number of lay members, especially of the business men of the church. So, among the new features of the Assembly this year is "Business Men's Day." This is Saturday, August 6.

On that day all of the interests of the church, and especially the interests of Bethany Assembly, will be considered by the business men and women of the state.

What we ask of the preachers is that each one of them shall make special mention of this day to their congregations and urge the business men—as many as possible—to attend the Assembly that day. Would it not be well for each preacher, in bringing the matter before his congregation, to urge them to select a few of the business men of the church to attend on that day.

We will depend upon the preachers to work up a large attendance at the Assembly on August 6. And now, brethren, under the leadership of the great Captain, let us at our Assembly this year inaugurate a movement that means "Indiana for Christ."

The splendid record of the fathers of the reformation, their sacrifices and their triumphs; the fact that God has called us to be colaborers to labor for the conversion of the world; the many doors that are wide open inviting us to go in and possess the land—all these and many other reasons should induce us to make our Assembly this year fruitful of results as never before.

Let us make it the subject of especial prayer, and let us go up to it to do brave work for God and Christ and humanity. L. L. CARPENTER, President Bethany Assembly.

Notes and News.

I have resigned as pastor of the church at this place to take effect July 17, for the purpose entering Drake, next fall, after spending a month's vacation in Tennessee and Virginia.

I would like to correspond with a preacher who would like a small but growing work.

DEAR BRETHREN:—We have leased the buildings and grounds of Oskaloosa College and will open them in September as "Oskoloosa Normal College." It has been thought wise to thus reorganizethis college, and throw open its doors to all persons desiring a Literary, Practical, Normal, Scientific and Musical education. Prof. A. J. Youngblood and Mrs. Belle H. Updegraff will be my coworker in this enterprise. I shall be glad to have words of encouragement from my friends.

ALEX. C. HOPKINS,
Principal of Oskaloosa Normal College.

The sixth annual convention of the eighth Christian mission district, of Illinois, will be held with the Christian Church at Du Quoin, Ill., beginning Thursday night, Sept. 8th, and continue till Monday morning, Sept. 12th, 1898. The programe which is replete with interest, will appear in due time.

J. F. MCCARTNEY, Chairman Committee.

After an absence from Illinois of twelve years in the churches of the Eastern states, I desire to return to the state of my nativity to live. Any good church now or prospectively pastorless that would like to have me and my family, not only to preach and work for the church, but also to find and purchase a permanent home in your city or town, will please write me at East Smithfield, Bradford Co., Penn. S. C. HUMPHREY.

About one year ago a small band of Christians, 35 to 40 in number, four miles northwest of Mt. Vernon, Mo., "began to build a the house of the Lord," at Salem, at a cost of $800, and last Lord's day the writer had the pleasure of meeting with them in the dedicatory exercises, and after preaching to a large audience on "Our Distinctive Plea," we raised about $125, which enabled us to dedicate free from debt, with a small balance in the treasury. Because of the great sacrifices these brethren have been compelled to make in building this house, and that they may be able to purchase and pay for some furnishings, I have promised to supply them with volunteer preaching one Lord's day in each month for the next six months, and that I may be able to keep my promise with them, as evangelist of this district, I issue my first call for volunteer preachers of this and adjoining counties, who are able and willing to help these brethren. I have already one volunteer to start with—Bro. Abe Lemaster, of Aurora, who will preach for them the 4th Lord's day in July. I hope soon through the liberality of our preachers, to be able to announce preaching for the 4th Lord's day in each of the succeeding months of this year, after which time they will be able to employ some good man for one-fourth to one-half his time.

I take this opportunity of announcing that I have tendered my resignation as evangelist of the Springfield district, to take effect as soon as the board can find some suitable man to take up the work, after which I will be ready to give my time to pastoral work, and to this end solicit correspondence with churches in need of a preacher. S. J. VANCE.

Aurora, Mo., June 30, 1898.

Bro. T. A. Meredith, who recently took the pastoral charge of the Church of Christ in this village, has just closed a very interesting series of special evangelistic meetings in this place of three weeks' continuance, resulting in ten accessions to the congregation—eight baptisms and two by commendation.

Bro. Meredith is a young man, a good speaker, fearless in the presentation of the gospel truth as understood and advocated by the Church of Christ. While some take offense at his plainness of speech, all concede that he has the courage of his convictions, and preaches what he believes. He is also an efficient leader of song; his solos, prefacing each service, are especially appropriate as well as attractive. Bro. Meredith has reserved two months of the present year for the purpose of holding a few revival meetings in the state. Any church wishing such a meeting would do well to correspond with him as above. State Mission Notes.

It was a pleasure to spend Lord's day at Sedalia in the great church and Sunday-school there. It was my first visit to that church in its working hours and it was a wonderful sight. That Sunday-school at work is worth going across the state to see; there was 550 present the day I was there and they said it was an off day. Of course I went into that primary room and saw that wonderful class of Bro. Dalby's. It is the largest primary class among our people in the state and the only reason it is not larger is because they won't give him any more room.

I had the pleasure of preaching at the New East Side church in the morning, where Bro. F. L. Cook is pastor. They have a beautiful edifice indeed; it is splendidly located, has a good pastor and the outlook for the future is very bright indeed.

In the evening I was at the Central Church and we had a good audience though Bro. Meyers, who notices everything, said there were more empty seats than common. They listened eagerly to what I had to say and I will tell you of the collection some other time. It is a great church and has a great future.

At California it rained. Well, I should say it did. It was wonderful how it did rain, but we had a good audience anyhow and one of the best giving audiences I have faced in a long time. But then when you have a preacher like B. F. Hill, who puts down $5 as a starter the congregation can't help it. He has done a wonderful work there in the years of his pastorate. He has proven truly that he was the man for the place. May God bless him in his work.

At night I was at Lexington where I was to deliver an address for the C. W. B. M. and I think it is the first time I saw it rain hard enough to keep the sisters from a meeting like that. But then it was one of the hardest rains I ever saw. The congregation was all torn up over the resignation of G. M. Goode and well they may be for he is a man amongst men, a preacher and a pastor to love. I was sorry to miss him. Some good church in Missouri call him quick.

The past week has been a hard clerical week. The cards for the last quarter have been sent out. Did you get yours? Please don't cast it aside. The board has need of funds. It must have funds or go out of the business. Never did we have greater calls nor more urgent. They are heart-breaking some of them. Send in the money that we may answer them.

I have also sent out a circular letter to the ministry throughout the state asking their closer and heartier co-operation. I believe it will come. We have as great a band of ministers as the sun shines on—some of them. I have also a letter in course of preparation to the county superintendents. We are looking for great things from them. We want to reach, if possible, every congregation in the state and interest them in the work. We are having some good reports from the field now. Will tell you about them in my next. Shall the good work go on? Send in your help.

Yours in his name,

T. A. ABBOTT.

Kalamazoo.—On the evening of July 18, I commenced a tent meeting in Crooksville, Ohio, a place of about one thousand inhabitants. We have never had a church there, but a few faithful Disciples who live there have been meeting in the schoolhouse for Bible study and worship. The meeting continued just two weeks, and resulted in 13 baptisms, one from the Baptists, several reclaimed, and with those who had been active in Christian work, we were enabled to organize a church with 34 members. Ten of those baptized were heads of failies—five couples—and are among the best families in Crooksville. They own their own homes and will be a great help in establishing the cause of the Master in that place. During my stay there I made my home with Brother and Sister M. B. Cooper, who were formerly members of the Central Church of Christ, Columbus, Ohio, and are ever to be counted among the faithful ones of earth.—W. J. RUSSELL, Pastor of the Church of Christ.

FLORIDA.

Bristol, July 2.—Am here in a meeting with 10 added; nine by baptism. I go from here to Altoona, Penn., in a tent meeting with J. D. Houston. Am open for engagement either in meetings or in regular work. Address me at Altoona, Penn.—J. J. IRVINE.

ARKANSAS.

Newport, July 7.—One baptism last night.—J. H. FULLER.

OHIO.

Ashtabula, July 7.—Additions here at our regular services, not reported, 16. Will build a 40, foot addition to our church house, also a handsome parsonage on our church lot, at once.—ROBT. SELLERS.

Skidmore, July 1.—One addition by letter and one by confession here last Sunday.—N ROLLO DAVIS.

H. A. Northcutt reported 13 confessions at Sturgeon on Sunday night, July 4th.

Sturgeon, July 1.—We are in the second week of our meeting here; 11 confessions to date.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

KANSAS.

Abilene, July 6.—One baptized the same hour of the night here recently. The work moves on well considering everything.—N. B. McGHEE.

Independence, July 4.—I closed one year's work here first of this month with Bible-school increased; Junior C. E. of over 40 members organized, C. W. B. M. of 15 members, 36 added to church and debt of about $550 raised. We hope for great advancementin future.—Elmer T. DAVIS, Pastor.

Topeka, July 4.—Our two weeks' meeting in River View, Kansas City, was a very enthusiastic and fruitful one. There were 50 from all sources. They are well organized with all the auxiliaries and will succeed. V. E. Ridenour was leader of song. My next meeting will be with the Third Church of Topeka, Kan., F. E. Mallory pastor, F. F. Dawdy singing evangelist. These are two of the brightest and most promising young men in the state.—D. D. BOYLE.

MISS LUCILLE TINNIN, of Tyler, Texas, writes—I inherited lung trouble which has always kept me in a weakened state. Five years ago Catarrhal and Bronchial trouble developed and together with Nervous Prostration nearly killed me. About a year ago I took a 3 months treatment from Dr. Beaty and the result is almost incredable. To make sure that the cure was permanent and complete, I have delayed writing this letter.

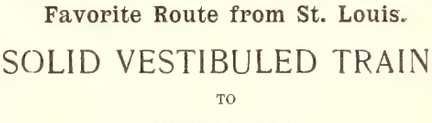
DO YOU USE THEM?

We mean marriage certificates. If you do, we have just what you need. Our special catalogue of recent issue contains a large assortment of marriage certificates ranging in prices from $1.00 per dozen to $4.00 per dozen. This catalogue will be found quite convenient to have when the minister wants the marriage certificates. It gives cuts and sizes and prices of many kinds, thus enabling the preacher to select for himself. We will be glad to mail it to any minister requesting it. Write for our marriage certificate catalogue.



A POSTAL CARD

Addressed to the Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis, Mo., is all that it will cost a member of the Endeavor Society to examine our late catalogue containing a full list of Christian Endeavor supplies. It also contains a number of books giving instructions in Endeavor work, and a well-selected list of books specially adapted for Sunday-school and Endeavor libraries. Write us for this catalogue and you are certain to find something in it that will aid you in your Endeavor work.

AN HOUR

Or two spent each day can be made quite profitable in canvassing for some one or more of our books. We offer liberal terms to our agents, and will take pleasure in corresponding with those who may wish to devote a little time making a few dollars by placing good literature in the home. Young men and young ladies who are just from college for the summer vacation might engage in the canvass for the sale of good literature with much profit. Write for our catalogue, select some good book to sell, and get our terms. Address Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo.

"Wonders of the Sky, or God's Glory Exhibited in the Heavens," by W. J. Russell, is now in the press and will be ready for delivery in a few days. It calls the attention of the reader to the grandeur, sublimity, beauty and immensity of the heavens, and ultimately aims to create in the mind of the reader a greater reverence for the Creator. The book will be bound in handsome cloth, printed on good paper, and the price 50 cents.

The Secret of Happiness.

Are you almost disgusted
With life, little man?
I will tell you a wonderful trick,
That will bring you contentment
If anything can—
Do something for somebody, quick;
Do something for somebody, quick!

Are you "awfully tired"
With play little girl?
Weary, discouraged and sick?
I'll tell you the loveliest
Game in the world—
Do something for somebody, quick;
Do something for somebody, quick!

Though it rains like the rain
Of the flood, little man,
And the clouds are forbidding and thick,
You can make the sun shine
In your soul, little man—
Do something for somebody, quick;
Do something for somebody, quick!

Though the skies are like brass
Overhead, little girl,
And the walk like a well-heated brick,
And all earthly affairs
In a terrible whirl—
Do something for somebody, quick;
Do something for somebody, quick!

Santa Cruz.

[This article consists of extracts from a personal letter received in St. Louis from a former resident, who now lives at Santa Cruz, Cal. It was not written for publication, but through the kindness of the recipient, we are permitted to present it to our readers, believing that they will enjoy it.—EDITOR.]

If the Lord had handed me a blank sheet before I left St. Louis, and told me to write out just what I wanted in the future, I couldn't have asked for a pleasanter place in which to live, nor work more congenial than I have here. We have the bay, the ocean, the mountains, the never-failing mountain streams, the perennial blooming of flowers, and skies that outdo Italy's best in clearness and beauty, all of which are ever-enduring attractions.

The winter thus far has been colder and drier than usual. Up to this week we have had very little rain, and the crops were beginning to show the need of rain; but it commenced to rain last Tuesday, and it has been raining ever since then, and the prospects are that we will have fine crops next summer. You understand winter is the growing season in California. During the summer months we have very little rain, and yet here on the coast things never dry out as they do in the East. We have heavy dews and fogs at night, which take the place of rain elsewhere. The climate as a whole is very comfortable. The thermometer seldom goes above 75 degrees in the summer, and I believe has never been known to go below 25 degrees in the winter.

During the summer and fall months we took many trips into the mountains and along the sea coast, and spent a week's vacation at Ben Lomond, a mountain camp six miles northeast of Santa Cruz. I climbed the mountain there, and could see a landscape more extended than Moses saw from Pisgah's heights. I could see the great Pacific reaching out into infinity, and to the south was the Monterey Bay, which some say rivals the Bay of Naples, while across the bay were the beautiful Monterey Mountains. The drives here are grand and the scenery caps anything I have ever seen in the East. The mountains have a dense growth of trees of all kinds, but the stately sequoia (redwood) predominates. At Big Trees on the Narrow Gauge Railroad, six miles northeast of Santa Cruz, is a grove of those trees fenced in; you have to pay to get in and see them, but to excursions and picnics it is only ten cents apiece. Many of the trees in that grove are over three hundred feet in height, and a few giants over three hundred and fifty feet. There are large forests of such trees in the state, some of them still taller than those in Santa Cruz, but the one six miles from this city is only a short drive by conveyance over a good road. The sequoia growing on the mountains are not so tall, still there are thousands of them over two hundred and fifty feet in height. I suppose one reason trees grow so large here is because they can grow during almost the entire year, it being seldom that a tree is blown down by tide wind, or even wind-shaken. There has never been a wind in this section hard enough to blow over a light board frame house. Cyclones are unknown. The mountains are literally studded with trees, and hence are more beautiful than the bare Rockies, or the Sierras of Southern California.

Last fall, on one of our trips up into the mountains, we visited a vineyard that is located on a foothill six miles from Santa Cruz, and eight hundred feet above tide-water. It was a paradise of fruits, flowers and scenery. The owner has expended a great deal of money on it, and if his place was within six miles of St. Louis he would have big returns from it; but as it is he is not making anything out of it over and above the expenses of keeping it in order. He has the finest of grapes, and fruits of all kinds. He has over one hundred acres, all in perfect cultivation, and keeps a colony of Chinese laborers to work it. He can see Santa Cruz, the bay, and the ocean from his south and west porches, and in the opposite direction he can see "Lomo Prieta," the highest peak of the Santa Cruz Mountains (three thousand eight hundred feet above sea level), about twenty miles to the east. I left my daughter and Mrs. W. there to rusticate for a week, as it is a kind of hotel for summer boarders. Many Santa Cruzans go there to spend vacations because of the pure air and fine scenery, and the fact that one can sit out of doors at night without putting wraps on, which you cannot do down on the coast, where the cold waters of the ocean keep the temperature about 50 or 60 degrees at night all summer through. We never know any hot nights here. Wear the same kind of underclothing all the year round, and the same kind of bedclothing winter and summer. Now understand me: this cold condition only obtains in the neighborhood of the ocean; that is, between the mountains and the ocean; and as soon as you enter the valleys running into the mountains, or cross over the mountains (the top of which are only fifteen miles from the coast-line), you get into a climate as hot as St. Louis in the summer-time, but not near so cold in the wintertime.

The counties in the Sacramento and San Joaquin (San Waukeen) Valleys have many prosperous farmers and ranchers, who during the summer months come to the coast and enjoy the cool breezes from the Pacific, and the fine bathing at Santa Cruz and Seabright. The latter place in the "season" has a population of five or six hundred. Most of the people own their little cottages, bring their bedding and provisions along, and so can spend a month or so very pleasantly, at little expense.

But to return to the vineyard on the foothill. When we got ready to leave there, the proprietor brought out a box that would hold considerably over a bushel, and ordered some of the Jap grape-pickers to go out and pick the finest table-grapes he had. They did so and soon came back with the finest lot of grapes I ever saw, loaded them into the surrey and my wife and I drove home with them, stopping at the foot of the hill to take dinner with some picnickers that were having a good time alongside of a rapid Rocky Mountain stream. Table-grapes had no value last fall; you could have all you wanted for the trouble of picking them. Wine-grapes had a marketable value at the wineries. It does not take long to pick a bushel of grapes in a vineyard like the one I have been speaking of. The bunches are such as would have made the eyes of Joshua and Caleb stick out. The trouble is, there is no market for the product. There used to be before everybody went into it, but now the market is overstocked and there is practically no sale for the over production. Of course Santa Cruz is too small a place to use much of the over production. Its business is as a seaside resort. In the summer season the denizens of the "Valleys" (Sacramento and San Joaquin) come here to get away from their semi-torrid climate. Sea bathing is a big card. We live within eighty rods of the Sea-bright Beach (which is one and a half miles southeast of the Santa Cruz Court House), and is more of a private bathing place than the Santa Cruz Beach. There are bathing houses, mostly owned by private parties. We have access to one of those in return for the horse and buggy privileges on our part, and go in bathing quite often. My wife likes it now, but did not like the buffeting of the big rollers at first. One has to learn how to take them or they will knock you off your feet and roll you in the sand. There is an element of danger, too, if the undertow (the rushing back of the water after they have swept out on the beach quite a ways) is too strong. I will send you a photograph of the Santa Cruz Beach, which will give you some idea of how it looks, only in the summer it will be lined with bathers. The picture represents the bay as very calm and at low tide. When the tide runs high, and the waves are emphasized by the trade winds, they will dash almost against the houses seen to the left of the picture. The cliff on the background of the picture is the east bank of the San Lorenzo River, which here discharges into the bay. That is Seabright on the cliff in the grove. The view was taken looking east. The Santa Cruz Mountains are off in the distance, the top of the mountains being fifteen or twenty miles distant. The bay is on the right side of the picture, and the ocean a mile and a half to the southwest. The main part of the city is north of the beach (that is to the left) about half a mile.

SANTA CRUZ BEACH.

What do you think of it? Don't you think it is a picturesque little place?

I came in this morning on the bicycle, the roads having dried sufficiently to permit that kind of locomotion, but I see the rain has commenced again, and I expect my folks will have to come in after me with the rig. I would like to have the wheel at home for to-morrow afternoon if it clears off; there is no prettier ride anywhere than along the "Cliff Drive." The grade is almost as level as the ocean, except where one crosses some gully coming down from the foothills, where the grades become a little too steep for safe riding. I then dismount, and lead my machine. The city of Santa Cruz owns ten miles of road along the bay and ocean, and the road is a favorite drive. It never gets muddy, and never dusty.

The tides never let the ocean settle down to a dead calm, as the lakes sometimes do. We have been planning to cross the bay sometime on the boat. Seasickness is one of the concomitants of a trip across the bay. My wife has never been seasick, and she wants to experience that excruciating pleasure. Miss B. and I had a foretaste of it in a fearful storm on Lake Michigan once and I am not so anxious for a repetition.

Santa Cruz is certainly one of the loveliest places in California, because of the variety of scenery, and yet it is scarcely known outside of the state. It has been content to be a watering-place. It has many beautiful homes, and if it were within two hours' ride of San Francisco it would be a popular suburban place to live in. The time now is four hours. It is proposed to build a road along the ocean which would avoid the heavy grades of the roads that come over the mountains, and permit of the trip being made in two hours (75 miles). We get the San Francisco papers by nine o'clock in the morning.

Living here is much cheaper than in St. Louis. You can buy a bushel of assorted vegetables, just pulled out of the ground for about a quarter. We have two strawberry crops a year, one in May—the main crop—and the other in November, and they come down to five cents a quart. Peas picked only an hour before you get them are fine and about as cheap, comparatively, as strawberries. The Chinese and Japanese do all the market gardening here, and have driven the white folks out of the business.

Now I have told you some of the good things about California. There are drawbacks. Living so close to the great ocean develops rheumatism in some folks. I think it has been beneficial to me. I am not troubled with malaria nor insomnia. The objection I find to the climate is the everlasting monotony of it. There is not difference enough between the seasons to make the weather enjoyable. I have not heard a peal of thunder since I have been in Santa Cruz, now eighteen months, save the thunderous poundings of the waves on the beach. One kind o' loses the sense of the passage of time, when there is no marked distinctions of the seasons. H.

Hobson's Choice.

BY AMOS. R. WELLS.

[At 1 A. M. of June 3, Lieutenant Hobson and seven men ran the collier Merrimac into the ships' channel at Santiago de Cuba in the face of the fierce fire from the forts, exploded an internal torpedo and sunk the vessel, thus penning the Spanish fleet in the harbor. Almost by a miracle, all eight escaped, and are now honored prisoners of war. When call was made for volunteers to perform this daring and hazardous feat, these men were selected from the many that offered themselves.]

Darkness and midnight sea,
Blackest heart of jeopardy;
Forts that flame an angry death,
And the surer doom beneath;
Risk of life's long happiness
And the safe world's sure success;
Bellow from the mouth of hell,
Heaven—or a Spanish cell;
This, and more—he knew it well—
This was Hobson's choice.

Yes, and more, unstinted, more:
Honor waiting on the shore,
Honor even from the foe,
And where'er the word shall go,
And a wreath within the hand
Of his grateful fatherland;
Lauding lips and shining eyes,
Men's hurrahs that rend the skies,
Yes, the fame that never dies—
This was Hobson's choice.

Now no more that ancient phrase
Chattering down from Charles's days—
"Hobson's choice" of "that or none;"
He had two, an' chose the one:
Safety, danger; deck or wave;
Life or death; the sun, the grave.
Let the phrase new meaning wear
Now, henceforth, and everywhere;
Gallant choice to do and dare
Shall be "Hobson's choice."

A Poem in honor of its Fiftieth Anniversary.

BY AARON PRINCE ATEN.

Of old in the Beautiful City,
That sat as the joy of the earth,
Arose a bright temple of glory—
Conception of heavenly birth.

We have read of the deep foundation
As firm as the ancient hills;
The granite and polished marble
Whose beauty our spirit thrills.

The cedar from Lebanon's mountains,
The pearl from the ocean strand,
The gildings of gold from Ophir,
And treasures of Ethiop's land.

In the book of the record is written
How rose up the beautiful wall
With no sound of tool or of hammer,
By the force of some magical call.

A glorious work of creation
By the skill of some master mind,
It stood like a finished glory
On Moriah's mount outlined.

For the honor of Jahveh builded,
Shekinah's dread presence dwelt
In the midst of its splendid beauty
Where the wisest of monarchs knelt.

And shall we find other motive
Than love as the forceful thought
That kindled the kingly spirit
That the untold treasures brought?

'Twas a concept born of the gladness
Welling up from a human soul,
Touched deep by the Infinite Goodness
When its waves of refreshing roll.

'Twas a grateful acclaim of spirit
For the mercies of all the years,
And a monument through the ages,
That the royal bounty rears.

But love in the hearts of mortals
Finds grander expression now
Than in marble and gold and jewels
And a temple where men may bow.

The temple on Zion's mountain
Has crumbled to dust and death,
And its golden dome fell under
The destroying angel's breath.

The beautiful Delphic columns
Have passed from the earth away;
And Diana's splendid glories
Have faded in sure decay.

But the temples for God erected—
Not made by material hand,
But by consecrate effort of mortals,
Through the numberless years shall stand.

When the tottering earth's foundation
Gives way to the flood of years,
No power shall work out the ruin
Of a temple baptized in tears.

The faith that lays hold of the future
Looked out on the fields of earth,
Computing the wondrous mercy
In relation to mortal worth.

Some glorious spirits and faithful
A temple began to build,
Surrounded by leafy bowers
In a land with beauty filled.

A temple of knowledge and learning
For the culture of mind and soul;
For the leading of spirits earthly
Where the waters of healing roll.

The hope that inspired their courage
Was born of the heart's desire
That a host of the world's immortals
Might feel a diviner fire.

And so without sound of hammer,
Through the passing of fifty years,
By faith and by prayer and courage
And the falling of countless tears,

GOLD DUST
THE BEST
WASHING POWDER

Arose the beautiful structure,
As the master workmen planned
On the trestle board of their duty,
In behalf of a world's demand.

The love of the Christ constraining,
Foundation and dome were wrought,
As the hearts and the spirits dauntless
His honor and glory sought.

Not marble and brick and mortar—
They were only the outward shell
Of this beautiful temple of learning
That the fathers reared so well—

But a building so high and so holy
That it touches the vaulted skies;
In whose halls our children walking,
To honor and fame arise.

In the semi-centennial closing
This Jubilee year, we bring
A gift from our hearts' rich treasure,
And peans of gladness sing.

May the glimpse of a coming glory
Touch hopeful our inner sight,
For Eureka's gladsome future,
As we bathe in its radiant light!

Text Stories—VII.

SPINSTERHOOD.

BY ALICE CURTICE MOYER.

And his sister stood afar off to witness what would be done to him.—Exodus 2:4.

"Look, Ethel, there she is now, just passing. Isn't she sweet-looking? And she is the dearest and best of teachers. There is not a girl in her class that does not feel her influence. She has such a pleasant way of showing us just what our duty is, that we can't help listening. All her girls have become Christians, and I know her influence has helped to bring it about."

"Yes, she is sweet-looking, I admit," replied Ethel, looking from the window after her friend's Sunday-school teacher, "but"—

"But what?"

"Well—of course—you see, May, she's an old maid; and you know old maids are almost always cross, and"—

"Miss Wilson isn't," interrupted May; "mother has known her for years and she has always been just as sweet-tempered as she is now."

"Well, of course, there may be exceptions, but I confess, May, I would rather die than be an old maid. How can an old maid be happy? Your Miss Wilson may seem to be what you believe her to be, but don't you suppose that deep down in her heart there is an unfilled corner—a feeling that there is something lacking? I am sure there must be, and for my part I don't want to experience it."

"What is it, my dears, that brings happiness?" spoke up May's mother, whom the girls had forgotten was present. "What is it that brings such peace as to satisfy that unseen corner of the heart and to fill our lives with joy and gladness? It is nothing more nor less than the faithful performance of duty in whatever condition of life one's lot may be cast. No matter how hard that duty may at first seem, no matter what heartaches the constant following of it may cost us, it will finally bring a peace that passeth all understanding, for in our hearts there will be a knowledge of God's approval and a consciousness of the fact that the greater the sacrifice the more precious is the service in his sight.

"Let me tell you the story of Miss Wilson. As May says, I have known her for years. She is several years my senior and was, therefore, a young lady while I was still a little girl, but I always admired her. She was born of wealthy parents—with a silver spoon in her mouth, so to speak—but it didn't stay there, as is often the case, for you know the silver spoon is a slippery thing, and when Miss Wilson reached the age of eighteen years she suddenly discovered that it was gone. She did not sit down to bemoan her fate and consider herself abused, she didn't have time, for her father was seriously ill and she must needs help her mother care for him—a care which was not long required, for his sudden reverses helped to hurry him to that last sleep, leaving his dear ones but scantily provided for.

"Then it was that Ruth Wilson showed her courage. How true it is that we never know what we can do until there is a call for our energies. 'Sweet are the uses of adversity,' says Shakespeare. She assumed the management of affairs, carefully fostering the small remnant of their fortune, relieving and shielding her widowed mother, cheering and comforting her as best she could while her own heart was breaking; for she could not but see that all she could do was powerless against the call of that silent voice across the dark river; and when, a few months after the death of her father, Ruth also saw her mother fall asleep, she could not repress a wish that she might go with her.

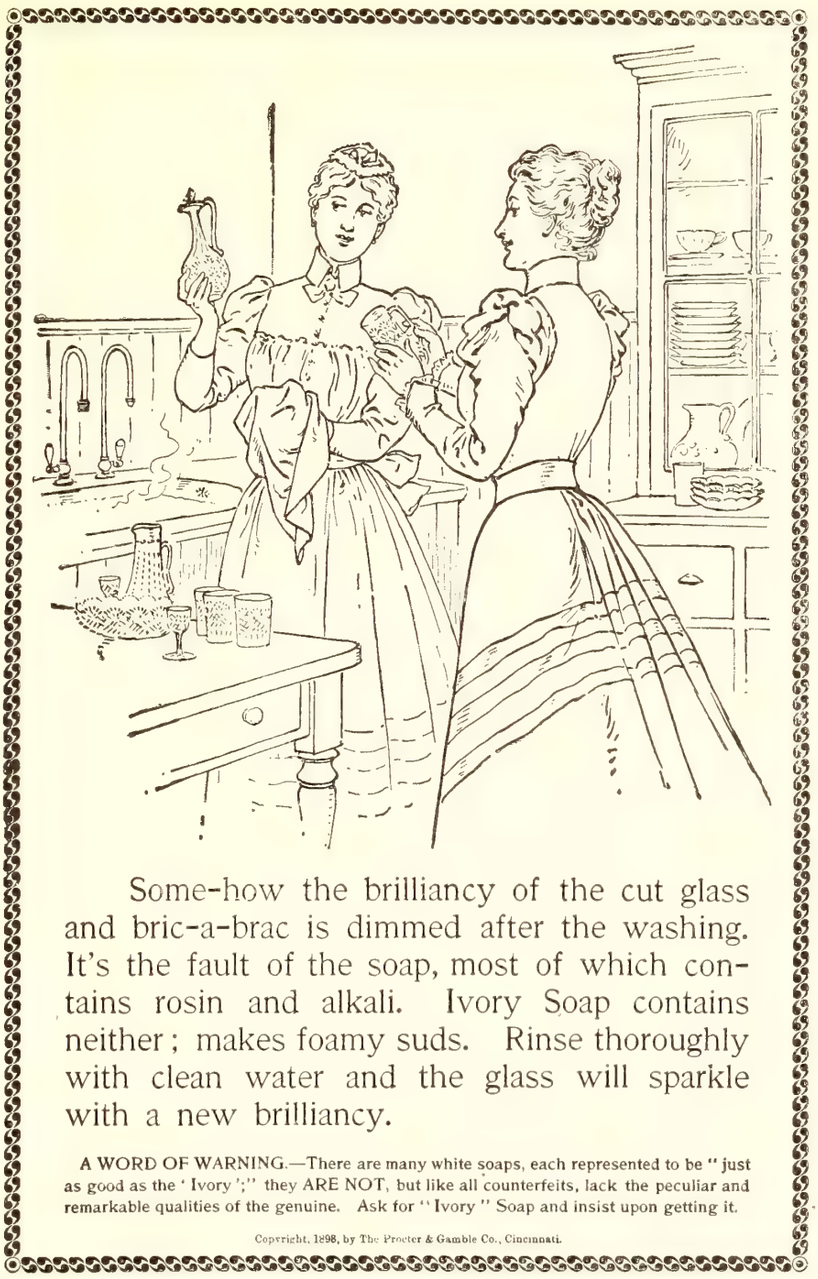
"From room to room Ruth went that first night in the now doubly lonely house and looked into the loved faces of the five young brothers and sisters so suddenly left to her care. Then taking to her own room the fair baby-sister, she asked her Heavenly Parent for help, and was comforted to remember that he had said, 'As thy days, so shall thy strength be.'

"My dear girls, it is not only unjust, but very unchristian to think or to speak—as many do—of old maids simply as a class of sallow, sharp-featured, ill-tempered, thin-voiced, complaining, envious creatures, whom nobody would select as a friend, who cannot be trusted, esteemed or loved. That is only the imaginary old maid. Such a creature—such a fearful compound of defects without one single redeeming trait—could not, of course, have existence, save in the imagination. The old maid as she really is—or rather spinster, which is a better term—is often a superior and attractive woman, sympathetic, interesting and helpful. She has warm friends among both men and women, and most often the reason she has not married is because the right sort of man has not asked her. She is too sensible a bird to be caught with chaff. I rejoice to know that the time has come when thinking people consider it no reproach to be a spinster. Times have changed and women have changed with them. They have grown more sensible. They no longer marry for support, for they have proven that they have the ability to support themselves; they no longer marry simply to escape spinsterhood, for they have come to know that all well-balanced people respect women for what they are, whether married or unmarried. Royal womanhood, my girls, can be reached through spinsterhood as surely as through motherhood. The latter, of course, is made beautiful by nature, but the former is made equally beautiful by self-abnegation; and it was through this highway that it was reached by Ruth Wilson. These helpless brothers and sisters left to her care were fed and clothed and also educated—as nearly up to the old high standard of better days as possible—out of an income so small that Ruth was compelled to plan and strive both early and late to make both ends meet. She was an attractive girl and was several times asked to share the lot of some earnest admirer, but each time refused because 'these children needed her.' All that the combined care of father and mother can be to a child, this sister strove to be to her brothers and sisters. Her hands were ever busy in their service, and her daily walk pointed them to all that was pure and praiseworthy—teaching them by example what she desired their lives to be, and how it might be reached by a close acquaintance, such as hers, with the Savior.



"'These children' at last grew up to manhood and womanhood. One by one they left the home-nest. And at last this sister-mother prepared even the baby's trousseau.

"'Alone now,' you say? No. How can she feel that she is alone when she has so many homes to choose from? All the love and devotion that these orphaned brothers and sisters would have given to parents they gave to her; and how can she feel that she is childless when 'these children' and these children's children are all hers? How can she be otherwise than happy when she feels that she has steadfastly followed duty; and when, in the upright lives of her brothers and sisters she can see her reward; that is, her earthly reward? Her's is, indeed, a rich harvest—the most bountiful that can be reaped this side of eternity.

"My dears, I do not mean that it should be said to girls, 'Don't marry;' but I do think it ought to be said, 'Girls, look well before you leap.' Don't let the fear of spinsterhood urge you into hasty connubial relations where the remainder of your life may be spent in repentance. Take time for sober reflection, for prayerful consideration. Take time for investigation. It is well to look into the character of the lover before he becomes the husband. What sort of son is he to an aged father or to a lonely or ailing mother? What sort of brother to his sister? What of his habits and associates? And what of his religious life, or has he any? This last is not the least important consideration. A young lady who was contemplating marriage with a man of doubtful character, went to her pastor for advice. 'Bro. D.,' said she, 'in all probability I shall soon wed Mr. J. As you know, he is not a Christian. He never attends church and has little faith in religion, but I love him.'

"'My dear young lady,' said the pastor, 'I would not assume the authority to lay down any set rule in reference to such cases, but I have lived a good while in this world and I will give you my opinion as one who has been an interested observer. Far be it from me to say that there are no honorable, upright men—men of good character—who are not Christians. But ask your own heart this question: Is it perfectly safe for one who daily prays, 'Lead us not into temptation,' to deliberately enter into a relation, the peculiar environments of which would render it a daily temptation? My dear young friend, believing as all Christians do in the oneness of the marriage relation, and believing as all Christians do in an unswerving allegiance to Christ, does it not seem a little unsafe, to say the least, to choose for a husband one who serves another master?'

"The young lady looked sad and finally said: 'But I have not told you the worst, Bro. D. It is no secret that Mr. J. is not a good man. On the contrary, I know, and his friends know, that he has many grievous faults, and that his habits are such as no woman would want her husband to practice, but he has promised to reform if I will marry him.'

Some-how the brilliancy of the cut glass and bric-a-brac is dimmed after the washing. It's the fault of the soap, most of which contains rosin and alkali. Ivory Soap contains neither; makes foamy suds. Rinse thoroughly with clean water and the glass will sparkle with a new brilliancy.

A WORD OF WARNING.—There are many white soaps, each represented to be "just as good as the 'Ivory';" they ARE NOT, but like all counterfeits, lack the peculiar and remarkable qualities of the genuine. Ask for "Ivory" Soap and insist upon getting it.

"'O, my young friend!' exclaimed the good pastor. 'Make no such vain sacrifice, I beseech you! Do we not see every day the sad result of this mistaken idea of heroism that has wrought such misery in the world? Time after time it has been proven that the man who will not reform before marriage, will not do so after marriage. Pardon me, but if Mr. J. will not reform now for your sake and for his own sake, he certainly will not do so after you are his wife, for the man who makes such terms will not, after having secured his prize, change his way for the sake of it. Rare indeed is it that the young woman who marries a man to reform him accomplishes her aim; indeed, a life of misery is most often her unhappy reward. To the young woman of this country, as well as to you, my friend, I would say in all sincerity of soul, Beware of such a man. Shun him as you would a plague. Daily contact with such a nature cannot but endanger purity and freshness of heart, even of the most cautious woman. Between those who are constantly together, bound by ties, there can be no compromise of relation. There is, of a necessity, either contempt or sympathy. Save yourself, my dear young lady, from the misery that such a union must surely bring. And above all, save yourself from that sorrow that none but a mother understands who cannot say to her little ones, Your father's life is worthy of your imitation; follow in his footsteps.'

"Better a thousand times, my girls, to live and die a spinster than to be held in such bonds. But I thank God that, while all this is only too true, it is but the dark side of the picture—as the happy homes all over our land will testify—but it is well that we sometimes stop to look upon the dark side. It makes us pause; it makes us thoughtful. And this is what I ask of you, my girls, be thoughtful. And I would not have you forget that there are two ways by which perfection of womanhood can be reached.

Upon the highest peak of the mountain range of noble womanhood stands forth Miriam, the patriotic old maid of the Old Testament.

At the time of our text, Miriam was a precocious little maiden of twelve years. In imagination one can see her stationed amid the palms a short way off watching the tiny cradle of bulrushes with its precious burden—her baby-brother—as it lay upon the bosom of the sacred Nile. Even at that tender age Miriam showed a brave spirit. Neither the loneliness nor the darkness of the night could frighten her from her post of duty. The story is familiar. We all know that we are indebted to this faithful little sister for the preservation of the life of the great lawgiver.

Miriam next claims our attention and calls forth our admiration as a gifted poetess—the sweet singer of Israel, where the great good done by her probably can not be estimated.

Then in the fifteenth chapter of Exodus, we hear of her as a great prophetess, to whom wonderful power was given for the foretelling of events necessary for God's people to know in that primitive time. It might be well to state here that Miriam was the first prophetess.

We next hear of her as a sinner, and as being punished for her sin when her name, Miriam, meaning bitterness, was in harmony with her dreadful fate, which was, indeed, most bitter.

However, through sincere repentance, she was enabled to gain all she had lost through sin. What a lesson of consolation there is in this for poor, faulty human beings—that through repentance we may be restored to our former position in life, and, perhaps, be better and more helpful because of the adversity. No doubt, Miriam, scourged and purified by her great sorrow, came forth from her banishment to sing and to prophesy as she had never done before. She never married; but as she journeyed through this world, she did much to aid her fellowmen in their great battle and struggle with sin. And when her summons came to join—

> "The innumerable caravan which moves
> To that mysterious realm,"

we cannot doubt but that she approached the tomb, "the house appointed for all the living," and crossed the Jordan of death to enter into everlasting peace.

The records of the church, the state, and of all benevolent societies testify to the fact that some of the grandest women of which history tells us have been spinsters. Florence Nightingale, for instance, and good Queen Bess, and a host of others.

The taunts that have been cast by unthinking people at this interesting class of society—spinsters—are as unkind as they are unwarranted. It is not necessary that a woman should marry in order to be a blessing to mankind.

Royal womanhood may be reached by a double highway.

THE PROPHET'S LESSON.*

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

Two dangers menance every enterprise at the moment of its first success. Ours is the tendency to consider the first victory decisive and to regard all as gained: the other is the liability to despair upon the discovery that only a partial success has been achieved, and in the reaction which is likely to follow a strong and enthusiastic effort. Very few causes are won in a single battle. Sometime an easy victory is but the prelude to a severe defeat. One must have reserve power for a second battle. Nor must defeat be permitted to discourage. It may be the best preparation and discipline for future success.

Elijah's triumph had been so signal at Mt. Carmel that he fancied all was won for the cause of Jehovah. Fire and water had obeyed him. The flame had descended upon the altar and the rain upon the land, and both in response to his prayer. He had slaughtered the priests of Baal, and been before the king's chariot on the swift return to the palace of Jezreel. Idolatry was crushed, God was surpreme in the hearts of the nation and the future was bright. Ahab was content to abide by the issue. Religion was subordinate to state policy in his mind, and the people might choose their object of worship as they would. The drought was broken and Jehovah should have the credit. But Jezebel was of a different nature. Of policy she had little, but her loyalty to the cult of her race was intense and she was not to be overcome by a desert-reared rabi like Elijah. At the very moment of success the prophet was thrown into a panic by the message of the queen. He knew he could not depend on Ahab's favor. There seemed to be nothing left but flight. Elijah's mistake was in the thought that one swift stroke would kill idolatry. Violent reactions are rarely permanent. The test on Carmel had been conclusive, but it needed to be followed by a long course of preaching, not by an act of vengeance like the killing of the priests of Baal, which only roused the queen, the leader of the Baal party, to a pitch of fury, and yet such violent methods were not infrequent in the lives of even men of God in the Old Testament days, and Jesus found among his disciples evidences of the same spirit which he took occasion to rebuke. Some of the darkest crimes of the centuries have been condoned by those who appealed to the Old Testament to find in the mistakes of men, who for the most part spoke the will of God, the justification for their own cruelties and errors.

Elijah was in terror when he received the message of the queen. The reaction from his intense and passionate enthusiasm came in a lapse into blank despair. He fled to the south, beyond the regions of Ahab; but even at Beersheba he was still in a panic of fear and left his servant, thinking that even that companionship might lead to his arrest. Into the very desert he went, and in utter discouragement sat down under a tree and prayed for death. But after sleep and food, providentially provided, had done their work, he went on to the place where he was yet to learn his greatest lesson.

Far away to the south stood Horeb, where Moses had received his call and where he spent forty days with God. To this sacred spot Elijah went. Here at last he would be safe, and here there was provided for him a message. Forty days of silence and of fasting. Forty days alone with God. Out of such a silence Moses came with those institutes which formed the basis of Israel's life. Out of this silence Elijah came with a truth which he could not learn at Cherith or Zeraphath.

Why was he here? Was there nothing to be done? Had he not been called to the prophet's work, and was this solitude the place in which to perform it? His reply in justification of himself was that he stood alone among a hostile people, and could save his life in no other way. He had tried to rescue the true faith, but it was of no avail. He had called down fire, but it seemed to have fallen on his own head. He had invoked the whirlwind, but it had swept him away. There was nothing left but to give up the unequal struggle. Then came the great lesson which the ages have yet to learn in its true meaning. It is not by whirlwind or earthquake or fire that Jehovah works. Man tries to clothe his arm with thunder that he may strike terror to his enemies. True men, weary with the sight of wrong, wish for the power of God to smite down triumphant evil. But God does not use such means. He uses a voice. This was the message to Elijah, and when in later days men gathered about a prophet by the Jordan and asked him who he was he responded, "A voice." Jesus himself was "the Word," and the apostle declared that it was God's pleasure to save men by so foolish a thing as preaching. This is the divine method. We see evil and demand its instant removal. This is right. But when it does not vanish we first storm and then despair. God sends a voice—a message; at first it is disregarded, and perhaps the prophet dies. But some hear; the message is borne on, and presently the world has changed front. Violence, cruelty, persecution, invective, sarcasm have all been used, and are sometimes still used by those who think to aid thereby the cause of truth, but their power is as nothing beside the effect of a great, persistent voice that speaks a message which the world needs to hear.

Elijah was not to see the changes he desired. But he was given the privilege of inaugurating them. Those changes were both political and religious. New dynasties must come, both in Israel and Syria. A line of kings more friendly to the worship of Jehovah was needed. A body of prophets who should go about as popular preachers of the will of God was required. For these changes Elijah prepared the way, though he did not live to see them. He called Elisha, and under his care the "sons of the prophets," or bands of preachers, became a moral and spiritual power, while the new dynasty of John, raised up by Elisha, overthrew the official worship of Baal and restored the true faith to its rightful place. Great victories are won by great men like Elijah. But they need to be followed up by the great and pervasive ministries of men like Elisha.

SUGGESTIONS FOR TEACHING.

One act of vengeance provokes another. Victory can only be utilized by remaining on the field, not by running away. God will strengthen his servants for every necessary work. "What doest thou here?" is the word that comes to every Christian. (1) Who has abandoned the effort to do God's will, or (2) is in evil company or places. Fear unfits one for any useful work. The greatest forces are the silent, not the noisy ones. Instruction, the voice of prophets and apostles, has always been God's means for saving the world. Elijah did not learn the lesson at once; how often we have to be taught the same truth. Elijah's purposes were consummated by Elisha: "God buries his workmen, but he carries on his work."

TOPIC FOR JULY 24.

HOW TO HAVE A HAPPY HOME.

(Job. 29:1-29; Deut. 6:6-9.)

Entire frankness among the members of a family will add to the general happiness. "The unveiled face" that Paul talks about is most beautifully fulfilled in that absolute openness of countenance and heart that is now and then seen in home life. If the members of the family have few secrets from each other, if they will take it for granted that each is interested in what concerns the rest, and will impart to one another freely their opinions, hopes and interests, there will grow an intenser interest in one another. One should not be discouraged from this frank expression if received with an occasional smile or outright laugh, for these things often hide a feeling that is kindly and deeply interested.

Another source of happiness, or rather another means of avoiding misery is that rare quality which may be called nothing else but willingness to give in. It is often as hard to yield one's point in a family discussion or in a family game as it is to lose a sum in business, and a vast deal of unhappy home life is due to that stubborn disposition that stands its ground, no matter how insignificant the matter in dispute, just because the ground is its own. One can yield without sacrificing one's real opinions. Gladstone, they say, was exceedingly firm, even in boyhood, so that sooner or later all the family came to his view of things on all matters. But he gained his point in the home as in public life, not by heated contention, but by calm and kindly, even of firm, courtesy.

Such a willingness to yield, or at least to maintain a kind attitude of reserve is usually fostered by large families. The highest possible good fortune that can chance to a child is to be born into a large family; the Jews counted it the highest blessing that their families should be large. But we, in America to-day, especially in cities, are reversing this true philosophy of home life, and are counting our happiness by the smallness of our households. This is one of the dangers confronting our modern life.

Clubs are multiplied to-day, and while we are organizing clubs, a most effective one might be organized in every household. It might have for its purpose the increasing of the joy and amusement, the culture and refinement, the spiritual welfare of all its members. Its meetings might be held of evenings just as often as possible, and its engagements might take precedence over those of all other clubs—this would be a strange thing, would it not, to-day? It should engage in all legitimate amusements, celebrate all national holidays, and the birthdays of its members. It should make presents at Christmas, and be economically indulgent in fireworks on the Fourth. In short, it should be jovial and childlike in its nature, for of such is the kingdom of home. The great Froebel insisted that parents should be children with their children, and live with their children. But there is some danger that parents nowadays may become like that New York woman who recognized her baby in the park, because she knew the nurse. It is needless to say that the home club should have its musical and literary and artistic pursuits, and its religious tone and spirit.

Indeed, a deep interest in every phase and fact of life will add immeasurably to the happiness of the individual and the family. A life that is interested in but few things withdraws into itself and becomes morose. A family made up of such persons becomes silent, melancholy, dreary. But when a family has been taught from childhood to take a deep interest in everything of local, national and world-wide character, when it has been encouraged to discuss events, people, churches, birds, horses, politics, flowers, inventions, travels—in fact, all the myriad interests of humanity—that family can never grow dull or uninteresting to its members or to others.

And finally, if each member in the household will make it his resolve to seek not his own happiness, but the happiness of another and of the family in general, he shall find therein his own and the general happiness. It is love that seeketh not her own. And here we emerge upon the high ground that our Savior always occupied, and find in love the true solution for all happiness and all salvation. It is love that is to save the individual. It is love that is to save the family, which is made up of individuals. It is love which is to redeem society, of which the family is the unit. And wherever you find one who is constantly seeking the happiness of other people, doing some little deed of courtesy or kindness, you will find a savior of the home, a savior of society, a savior of himself, for such as this was the Savior of the world.

The C. E. Reading Courses.

PURPOSE, PROGRESS, PROSPECT.

BY J. Z. TYLER.

General Editor and Manager.

The first regular year of the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses closed July 1, and their last article appeared in this column last week. It seems a fitting time, therefore, to say a brief word concerning their purpose, their progrees and their prospect.

The primary purpose of these Reading Courses is the instruction and indoctrination of the young people among the Disciples of Christ. But experience has shown that the purpose and plan ar admirably adapted to other classes. Many auxiliary societies of the C. W. B. M., for instance, have found these courses exactly suited to their needs and have increased the interest in their meetings by their use. Groups of persons, not connected with any society, have come together for the sole purpose of mutual help in taking these readings and many individuals, old as well as young, have found both pleasure and profit in pursuing these courses privately. It is being discovered that the field to be cultivated by these Reading Courses is not limited to the Christian Endeavor Societies, but that it includes all persons who need elementary instruction in its three chosen lines of study.

The progress made during this first year has been most gratifying. Between 3,500 and 4,000 readers have been enrolled. A little more than 9,000 copies of our handbooks have been put into circulation. Seven of our best papers have published articles, week by week, along the three lines of study, thus reaching a much larger number of readers than have formally enrolled at headquarters. These articles have been recognized as of superior merit, and the request has been made that they be made permanent by placing them in book-form. This, however, will not be done, since we have so much entirely new material in store awaiting publication. I wish, however, in the name of all concerned to most heartily thank the directors who have furnished these articles and the papers who have so generously given them this extensive circulation.

Perhaps no enterprise ever inaugurated among the Disciples has met such recognition as this. To use a well-worn phrase, "It meets a long-felt want." The July number of the Bethany C. E. Bulletin, published quarterly in the interest of the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses, contains most hearty and enthusiastic endorsements from a very large number of leading brethren. They characterize these courses by such expressions as "of incalculable value," "well adapted to meet our needs," "lines of study well chosen," "one of the wisest movements among us," "one of the 'hits' of the closing century," "our rapid growth calls for it," "all pastors and evangelists should advocate it," "will stop a leakage from our churches," "it is vital to our cause," "every Christian should take it," "the need is painfully urgent," "nothing more economical can be imagined." These phrases indicate the unanimous verdict of these brethren concerning the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses.

The prospects are bright. The field to be cultivated is large. All that is needed is that some one in each church shall undertake the task of giving full and accurate information concerning the movement. Wherever the people are well informed concerning it, circles seem to form spontaneously. The people know a good thing when they see it, and they are not slow to avail themselves of the advantages of such an opportunity as this. Those who wish to circulate information will be supplied, gratuitously, with the July number of the Bethany C. E. Bulletin, which contains all that needs to be known. Drop a postal card addressed to the Bethany C. E. Company, 798 Republic Street, Cleveland, Ohio, stating how many copies you can use to advantage. They will be sent to you promptly.

It is yet too early to make definite and detailed announcements concerning the second year's reading. Those who have not taken the course should begin with the handbooks prepared for the first year. Those who have taken the first year will be supplied with handbooks now in course of preparation for the second year's reading. Professor H. L. Willett is preparing a handbook on "The Life and Teachings of Jesus;" F. D. Power is preparing a handbook on "Sketches of our Pioneers;" W. J. Lhamon is preparing a handbook on "Missionary Fields and Forces of the Disciples." We hope to have these ready for delivery in September. A little later there will be issued a handbook entitled "Bible Doctrine for Young Disciples," dealing directly with the doctrinal position of the Disciples. Readers will be expected to begin the study of this about the middle of the second year. This second series of handbooks will be along the same lines as the first and will be of similar size and appearance. We shall make every effort to keep them down to the same price. More definite announcement will appear in our church papers before the opening of the second year.

Work vs. Methods.

During the recent Bible-school and Christian Endeavnr convention at Mexico, the question was raised as to what should be done in case the elders of a congregation would not allow the preacher or young people to organize a Christian Endeavor Society. Various answers were given, but none satisfactory to the questioner, and none sufficient, in my judgment, to meet the difficulties of the case.

A close study of the conditions surrounding such cases will reveal the fact that the opposition does not arise from stubbornness so much as from a desire to stand true to the faith and the simplicity of the apostolic church; and further, that the opposition is not to the work, but to the method.

I have yet to hear of an elder who is opposed to the development of our young people in Christian work, or to using the energy and enthusiasm of the young for the furtherance of the cause. But we find many who believe the method known as a Christian Endeavor Society is opposed to Bible teaching, and a step back to Rome. In such cases would it not be wise in the preacher to be content to do the work, using such means and methods as will not give offense? And is not the preacher as much a cause of discord if he insists on the non-essential name or form of organization, knowing it will offend, as the elder who objects to these, but is in sympathy with the work? I have known the young people's prayer-meeting to be cordially received and supported, when the Y. P. S. C. E. would be opposed. Let us be more particular about accomplishing the work, and less about the method of work. And let us take special care not to allow ourselves to become so engrossed in defending or opposing some method of work that we allow the work itself to be neglected. The command is, "Go," and nothing is said about how to go. It says, "Teach," but we are free to use such means as will accomplish that end. If there should be brethren who cannot for any reason adopt our method, let us adop theirs, and do the work.

J. H. BRYAN.

Shelbyville, Mo.

[We would revise the last sentence of the foregoing article as follows: "If there should be brethren who cannot, for any reason, adopt our method, let them adopt their own method, and permit us to do the same, and we will not permit the matter of method to interfere with Christian love and fellowship." It is hardly consistent to ask brethren who believe that they have learned a more successful method of doing Christian work to lay it aside for an inferior one because other good brethren are not able to adopt it. This idea has done much to injure our missionary work in the past, and it is one against which we have steadily protested. Where the Word of the Lord leaves us free to act, we are not only at liberty, but we are under obligations to act according to our best judgment; that is, to adopt the best method known to us for doing His work. The brethren who object to a Christian Endeavor Society almost universally do so because some editor whose policy it is to oppose everything that is new, has denounced it, and they take up the note of opposition without even understanding what it is they are opposing. If a mere name, these brethren need to be enlightened, and yielding to their demands would, perhaps, be the poorest way of accomplishing that end. The better way is to allow them full liberty to practice their own method, while others practice theirs, and let the results show which is the wiser.—EDITOR.]

Literature.

"The Modern Reader's Bible."

Richard G. Moulton is the editor of "The Modern Reader's Bible." He is Professor of Literature in English, in the University of Chicago. This work bears the imprint of The Macmillan Company, New York and London.

"The Modern Reader's Bible" is a series of works from the sacred Scriptures, presented in modern literary form. The work includes also selections from some of the Old Testament apocryphal books. The volume entitled "Biblical Idyls" contains the apocryphal book of Tobit. The "Wisdom Series" contains four volumes, in which is the "Book of Ecclesiasticus," and the "Wisdom of Solomon." There is a volume entitled, "Biblical Masterpieces," in which are selections from the apocryphal writings. This feature of the work is a blemish.

Each volume is about four and a half by six inches, and contains from a hundred and sixty to two hundred and seventy-five pages. They are gems of workmanship and marvels of convenience. The type is all that can be desired. A book easier to handle or more pleasant to read cannot easily be imagined. To read one of these unique volumes is a rare luxury. The common English Bible is about the worst printed book of any value in our language. There is nothing attractive about the book to a person of literary taste, in the style of printing in which it is usually presented. This defect is effectually remedied in "The Modern Reader's Bible." Its form in every way, shape, size, type, binding, etc., is unusually attractive.

The editor, Prof. Moulton, proposes to treat the Bible as literature. He is not a theologian. He is not a biblical critic, except as he finds the sacred writings in English. He is Professor—not of English literature, but—of literature in English, in the University of Chicago. The Bible belongs to Hebrew and Greek literature, but he finds it in English, and in this form it belongs to the department in which Prof. Moulton is a specialist. He aims to make this specimen of literature in English attractive and profitable reading to persons of culture. In this task he has become wonderfully successful. The text of "The Modern Reader's Bible" is that of the Revised Version. Prof. Moulton recognizes and accepts the work of the critics. He places "The Epistle to the Hebrews," for instance, with "The General Epistles," and not with "The Pauline Epistles."

Prof. Moulton has prepared for each volume a brief introduction in which some account is given of the writer, his time, his probable purpose, some of the peculiarities of his book, etc., etc. He does not, however, enter into a consideration of questions such as vex the souls of theologians and expositors. Prof. Moulton never loses sight of the fact that he is dealing with the literature of the Hebrew people in English. Helpful notes are found at the conclusion of each volume.

The printing is in modern, up-to-date style. Poetry, for instance, is presented to the eye as poetry. Notes of explanation, which in the common English Bible are found in the body of the text, are in this edition of our sacred Scriptures placed at the bottom of the page. The Book of Job is treated as a dramatic poem. Following the introduction are the names of the "Dramatic Personæ." The text of the work follows, printed in appropriate form.

Two volumes are devoted to the Psalms—Dr. Van Dyke calls them "the Hebrew Hymnbook." A well-arranged topical index adds much to the interest of these ancient poetical compositions. There are selections, in this connection, from "the Book of Lamentations," which Prof. Moulton calls "An Acrostic Dirge."

Volumes, especially interesting at the present time, are "The Kings" and "The Chronicles." "The Kings," as the name indicates, contains the history of the monarchs of the Hebrew people, beginning with David and concluding with Jehoiachin. The The story of Saul and his reign belongs in this series, to the volume entitled, "The Judges." The Old Testament is now complete in eighteen volumes. The price is fifty cents a volume. "The Kings" and "The Chronicles" include the lessons to be used in our Bible-schools for six months, beginning July first. The volumes can be bought separately.

The New Testament will be published in four volumes. One only has appeared. This contains Matthew, Mark and "The General Epistles." The Book of Acts will contain Paul's epistles, introduced at the several points of the history to which they are usually referred, after the style of "The Records and Letters of the Apostolic Age," by Prof. Burton, Professor of New Testa- Interpretation in the University of Chicago. An opportunity will thus be afforded of studying, without the interruption of comment or discussion, the continuous history of the New Testament church as presented by itself. A slight difference in the type, in the gospels, indicates the words of the Christ as distinguished from those of the historian.

It is a pleasure to call attention to and commend "The Modern Reader's Bible." Its publication is calculated to increase the interest in Bible reading and study.

MAGAZINES.

To the July number of the North American Review, Rufus Fairchild Zogbaum contributes an interesting article on "The Regulars in the Civil War," describing vividly the services of these brave men, their sacrifices, prowess, discipline and fortitude; their steadiness under conditions of dismay and panic, their enthusiasm and bravery in attack, and their stubborn and courageous resistance in retreat.

The American Antiquarian, a bi-monthly magazine published at Chicago, for July and August contains an interesting article, well illustrated, on "Caves and Cliff Dwellings Compared," by Stephen D. Peet, Ph. D. There are other equally interesting articles.

Rev. Francis E. Clark has a valuable article in the Missionary Review of the World for June, "Do Foreign Missions Pay?" The advantages set forth by Dr. Dlark as gains in the fields of geography, geology, meteorology, archæology, materia medica, philology and education makes a strong affirmative answer to the question.

WHEN ALL ELSE HAS FAILED, try Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer, but why wait till then? This celebrated remedy has an unbroken record of success as a blood cleanser and general health giving medicine. Sold by special agents or to the people direct by the proprietor, Dr. Peter Fahrney, 112-114 So. Hoyne Ave., Chicago, Ill.

CATON.

Perhaps one of the largest funerals ever seen in Terre Haute, Ind., took place at the Central Christian Church, Tuesday, June 28. Charles B. Caton was born at Patricksburg, Owen county, Ind., Oct. 19, 1874. In 1883 he came with his parents to Terre Haute with his parents, and April 23, 1898 he enlisted in Company B, 159th Regiment, Indiana Volunteers, and died at Camp Algers, Va., June 25. His body was brought home and was buried here. On the day of the funeral the civil and military organizations turned out, and the whole city seemed to do honor to the first victim from Terre Haute in the struggle to free Cuba from her thraldom. Charley died in the hospital from the fever, and as truly died for the cause of freedom as the soldier shot down in Cuba. Charley was a member of the Christian Church here, and was superintendent of the South Mission Sunday-school. A Christian young man beloved by all who knew him. He was buried in his uniform of blue. His parents, sister and brothers have the sympathy of the whole community.

ERRETT.

Died, at her daughter's, Mrs. Russie Gay's, June 25th, 1898, Mrs. Rachel Errett, in her 85th year. Sister Errett was the widow of our beloved Brother Joseph J. Errett, one of Missouri's most devoted pioneer preachers. She was also the mother of Bro. Davis Errett, now the efficient minister of the Church of Christ in Canton, Mo. Sister Errett, formerly Miss Rachel Davis, was born in England. Her father immigrated to the United States when she was six years old, and settled in Pennsylvania. In 1837 she was married to Joseph J. Errett, and they moved to Missouri, settling in Palmyra, Marion county. To them were born 10 children, six of whom passed into the unseen before her. When only 12 years old she became a Christian, hence living in sweet fellowship with the Christ for over 72 years. Shortly after coming to Missouri Bro. Errett devoted his life to the preaching of the gospel. Only those who lived in Missouri in those days can fully appreciate the real hardships and heart-trials that came to the wife of him who sought to call the people back to the simple faith and practice of the apostolic church. In this great work to which her husband had given his heart and life, she was a companion in the truest sense of the word. She was a Disciple of Christ, ever growing into a larger knowledge of his truth. She was a Christian, for she manifested that she was one of the Lord's anointed. A saint, daily living a holy life; a child of light, for she reflected the light of God as she walked life's pathway. Never has it been my privilege to know a "mother in Israel" in whom the Word of God dwelt more richly than it did in Sister Errett. She was a living, walking Bible, not only knowing its words, but comprehending in a large degree its meaning and understanding how to apply its prophecies, facts, commands and promises. She was eminently qualified to teach the Word of God to others, which she did in her daily life. Her home was in a large sense a "Bible-school" where each child received instruction in the Word of God as regularly as they received the food for the physical body. In her husband's absence the family "altar" was kept warm with her earnest prayers for his success in preaching the truth, to which they had unitedly given their lives. Her love for the Bible and memory of its precious contents were a constant source of comfort to her until the hour of her departure for her heavenly home. Many have toiled to leave their children earthly wealth from which the children must soon part. But Sister Errett left her children an inheritance they can take with them into the eternal world, for the inheritance of faith, hope and love endures forever. The word mother to her four living children will ever be a sweet reminder of that rich reward that God will give those who love him. Such a life was not only a blessing to her family, but many in and out of her church will remember the touch of her hand as the touch of motherly and Christian sympathy. On the 27th of June, at the church in Paynesville, Pike county, in the presence of a large audience of those who had known and loved her for her work's sake, the writer, assisted by Bro. Rumsey, the minister of the church, conducted the funeral services; after which her "tent," that had fallen down after so many years of usefulness was laid to rest beside the body of her departed husband in the Clarksville cemetery. Sympathetic friends turned away from that grave feeling that it contained the body of one whose life comprehended what is meant by wife, mother, neighbor, friend and Christian.

LUCAS.

One of the pioneers of the restoration movement inaugurated by the Campbells passed peacefully into the spirit-world last Saturday, June 25th, at his Abingdon home, having lived nearly a century. Marshom Lucas was born Sept. 5th, 1801, in Kentucky. Married Cynthia Whitman. Seven children resulted from this union. He moved to Illinois in 1829 and to Warren county in 1831. His wife died in 1837. He afterwards married Elizabeth Davidson, who bore seven children. Of the fourteen children seven survive him. He lived to see his fourth generation. For nearly 70 years he was a faithful member of the Church of Christ. His remains were brought to Monmouth, Ill., for interment, where his daughter, Mrs. W. H. Frantz, lives.

SNELL.

Mrs. Eliza Arnold Snell was born Dec., 5, 1824, in Garrett county, but was reared in Madison county, Ky. They removed to Missouri in 1850. She was married to John R. Snell, June 18, 1851. She died of old age at Miami, Mo., June 25, 1898, aged 73 years 6 months and 20 days. She was a charter member of this congregation and always faithful. Her death leaves but one surviving charter member here, her sister, Mrs M. D. Pate. The latter is the last survivor of a family of 12 children. Sister Snell leaves an only daughter. We shall meet on a fairer shore.

A Matter of Health

Extreme care is necessary in purchasing baking powders to avoid those made from burnt alum, phosphatic or other harsh acids, of which there are innumerable brands in the market.

Great efforts are made to foist these inferior powders upon consumers by the inducement of a lower price and by grossly false representations as to their ingredients and comparative value.

Alum baking powders have been declared by the most competent authorities injurious to health. Therefore every precaution must be taken to keep them out of the food. They are sold under many names, and new brands are continually appearing.

It is safe to avoid the use of any new or doubtful brand until you have had it analyzed. The purity of any powder sold at a lower price than Royal may be suspected.

Royal is a pure cream of tartar baking powder and its exclusive use is the practical and positive safeguard against alum and the various adulterations found in other brands. It has been analyzed and recommended by the U. S. Government chemists, by the health officers of New York, Chicago, San Francisco, London, etc., and by eminent physicians and scientists generally, who give it the greatest praise for its marvelous purity and leavening strength.

The Royal powder costs only a fair price per pound, and is cheaper and better at its price than any similar article in the world.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

The Missouri Pacific's Camp Life souvenir booklet, complimentary to the third regiment Missouri volunteers, contains numerous excellent pictures of camp life, and the touching poem, "Just Before the Battle, Mother." Interesting references are also made to some of the noted pleasure and health resorts along this popular route South and West.

IMPROVED SCHEDULES TO FLORIDA.

Beginning July 6th, via Southern Railway and Queen & Crescent Route.

On account of increased travel to Florida and other Southern points, the SOUTHERN RAILWAY, in connection with the QUEEN & CRESCENT ROUTE, have inaugurated, beginning July 6th, through, vestibuled, train-service, on accelerated schedules, from Cincinnati and Louisville, to Atlanta, Fernandina, Jacksonville, Tampa, Miami, etc.

On this new schedule, the train leaving Louisville 7:40 A. M., and Cincinnati 8:30 A. M., arrives at Atlanta 12:00 midnight, Fernandina, 8:30 next morning, Jacksonville, 9:40 A. M., Tampa, 5:50 P. M.,—train being a solid, vestibuled, through train, with first-class day coaches, and Pullman Sleepers from Cincinnati to Jacksonville, Chair Cars from Louisville to Lexington, connecting therewith.

The night train, leaving Louisville 7:45 P. M., and Cincinnati 8:00 P. M., will continue as at present, arriving at Atlanta 11:40 A. M., making connection for all points South.

By these new Schedules of the Southern Railway, in connection with the Queen & Crescent Route, the time via these lines to Florida and other Southern points, is many hours quicker than via any other road.

For information, apply to any Agent Southern Railway, or connecting lines.

What We Plead For.

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

For the right against the wrong;
For the weak against the strong;
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.
For the truth, 'gainst superstition,
For the faith, against tradition,
For the hope, whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

Some Recent Publications

PLAIN TALKS TO YOUNG MEN ON VITAL ISSUES. By PETER AINSLIE. 16mo, cloth, 60c.

Should be in every Sunday-school and Endeavor library. A good book for parents to give their sons. Treats in a masterly way gambling, cursing and swearing, lying, the theater, dancing, Christian service, etc.

THE LIFE OF JESUS. Edited by DR. FERDINAND PIPER, Professor of Theology in Berlin. Translated from the German by Wm. E. Clarke. 12mo, cloth, 310 pages, $1.00.

This book does not attempt a consecutive story of the Saviour's life, but is a compilation of sermons, by the leading minds of Germany, upon the overshadowing events, thereby comprehending his nature and mission. It is not, therefore, the product of one mind, but of many minds.

ACROSS THE GULF. By MRS. N. M. VANDERVOORT. 12mo, cloth, $1.00.

A wonderfully interesting and instructive story of the time of Christ.

The reading of "Across the Gulf" will awaken thought, strengthen faith, and stimulate the life of the reader to nobler service.—N. S. HAYNES.

The author is careful in her quotations of Scripture, and the harmony of Gospel narrative is happily preserved. The story centers about the ideal Christ, the author's aim being to lead the reader to reject all teaching that is morality only, and instead be drawn to the simple, yet pure and abiding faith and service in and for the Master.—Christian Leader, Cincinnati, O.

STUDIES IN ACTS; or, The New Testament Book of Beginnings. By W. J. LHAMON, M. A. Introduction by A. McLean, Corresponding Secretary of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Large 12mo, cloth, 416 pages, $1.25.

This book is not a commentary; it is not a collection of sermons; but it is a volume of essays, in which the author seizes upon the most critical and interesting portions of the Book of Acts, the strategic forces, and mountain peaks of its history. These he treats with a charm of style, a vigor of thought and mastery of material that have called forth the hearty praise of many readers, though the book is but recently from the press. 116 pages at the end of the volume are devoted to Notes and Comments. A few are by the author, but for the most part they are selections from first-class authorities, and are exceedingly helpful upon many difficult and important passages.

JESUS AS A TEACHER, AND THE MAKING OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By B. A. HINSDALE. 330 pages, 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

Contents: Jesus as a Teacher. An Introductory View. The Education of Jesus. His Insight into Mind and Character. His Relation to Tradition and Legalism. How Jesus Used the Scriptures. His Historical Antecedents. His Institutions. His Authority. His Use of Accommodation. His Methods of Teaching. His Recognition of Apperception. His Use of the Developing Method. His Recognition of Moral Perspective. How He Handled Cases. His Severity. Jesus and the Child. His Theory of Teaching. The Making of the New Testament.—Object and Point of View Stated. The Ministry of Jesus. The Preaching of the Apostles. The Epistles. The Gospels. The Evangelical Tradition. Some Characteristics of the Documents. The Canon in its First Stage. The Canon in its Second Stage. Further History of the Canon.

Professor B. A. Hinsdale, of the University of Michigan, is recognized throughout the country as one of the ablest teachers of teachers. His writings command the respect of every educator. He has recently published a volume entitled "Jesus as a Teacher, and the Making of the New Testament." Although the association of Prof. Hinsdale is with a denomination other than the Congregational, yet he is a man broad in religious and educational ideas. Therefore, everyone, whatever may be his ecclesiastical relations will find suggestions and helpfulness in this volume.—The Advance, Chicago, Ills.

ORGANIC EVOLUTION CONSIDERED. By ALFRED FAIRHURST, A. M., Professor of Natural Science in Kentucky University. 12mo, cloth, 386 pages, $1.50.

This is a very thorough and scholarly discussion of Organic Evolution by one who has had many years experience as a teacher of science.

Prof. Fairhurst has occupied the chair of Natural Science in the University of Kentucky for many years. He has not, like many college professors, contented himself with the daily routine of his work, but has been a diligent student of the several branches which he teaches, constantly extending his knowledge of them, and steadily increasing his skill in the laboratory. This book is the first result in printed form of these faithful scientific studies. It proves the author to be familiar with the writings of all the masters of the theory of organic evolution, and to so have studied them that he understands them well, and knows their weak points. At these points he has attacked their positions and arguments, and has successfully refuted them. His arguments are brief, crisp and satisfying. He understands the art of direct attack, which puts his opponent to flight without keeping his reader in suspense. It seems to me that any candid person who reads the book must close it with the conviction that the hypothesis of the origin of organic species by the process of evolution is not only an unproved hypothesis, as its ablest advocates admit, but one that is essentially false. In addition to what the author says on the subject of evolution, he furnishes the unscientific reader with a large amount of information about matter in its various forms and about organized beings that is both interesting and valuable. For this reason, as well as for its value as a refutation of the hypothesis which it chiefly combats, the book should have a wide circulation among intelligent people everywhere.—J. W. MCGARVEY, Lexington, Ky.

MAP SHOWING POSITION OF AMERICAN ARMY ABOUT SANTIAGO AT THE TIME OF THE SURRENDER OF THE CITY.

CURRENT EVENTS.

After repeated hitches and delays in the negotiations looking to the surrender of the city of Santigo, the gratifying news has arrived that Gen. Toral has finally accepted the terms offered by Gen. Shafter with the approval of the authorities at Washington. The surrender involves not only the city of Santiago, but all the eastern end of the island. All the Spanish troops of the Fourth Corps, the military division of Santiago Province, from a line drawn north from Asserraderos, 18 miles west of Santigo, through Los Palmas, Palmas Sorrian, Alcantaza, to Sagua de Tananamo, on the north coast, and eastward to Cape Maysi, are surrounded, and the territory is abandoned. This territory includes between 18,000 and 20,000 Spanish soldiers, about 10,000 of whom are in Santiago and the remainder at Guantanamo and other towns in eastern Cuba. It is a condition of the surrender that the Spanish troops are to be paroled and conveyed to Spain. Commissioners have been appointed representing the two armies to arrange the details of the surrender. It is cause for profound gratitude that this victory of the United States has been consummated without further destruction of life or property. The city was defended with the greatest heroism on the part of the Spanish, and the surrender was not agreed to until Gen. Shafter's army had completely invested the city, and his seige guns were on the heights commanding the city and fortifications. On Sunday morning, July 17th, 1898 the Spanish troops laid down their arms and amid impressive ceremonies the Stars and Stripes were raised over the Governor's Palace at high noon of that day, and Santiago passed forever from Spanish rule.

The newspapers and members of Congress who were disposed to criticise Admiral Sampson for not giving due credit to Commodore Schley for the destruction of Cervera's squadron at Santiago, before his official report was received, were entirely too previous in their criticism, as we believed at the time. The official report of Sampson makes proper acknowledgment of the part of Commodore Schley, in the historic action referred to, and says that the flagship, having been called away for consultation with Gen. Shafter, was "little more than a spectator" of the conflict. Commodore Schley, himself, says the credit is due to every officer and seaman engaged in the battle. It is altogether improbable that these two great naval commanders would quarrel like boys as to who was entitled to the greater honor for this great victory. It is safe to attribute most of such newspaper talk to the desire for sensationalism on the part of war correspondents. It is pleasant, too, in this connection, to notice the fine courtesy displayed by Gen. Miles who, on arriving at Santago, did not allow his presence there to eclipse Gen. Shafter, to whom the credit was due for the vigorous military operations in the reduction of that city. He has kept Gen. Shafter to the front in the negotiations pending for the surrender of the city.

It is not surprising that the talk of peace negotiations has arrived after this notable victory of our arms. The Madrid correspondent of the London Daily Telegraph cables that the Madrid government has definitely decided to open peace negotiations without delay, proposing as a basis the renunciation of all rights over Cuba, and the immediate discussion of any "reasonable proposals the United States may make." From certain statements coming from the Spanish minister of war—Gen. Correa—it may be doubted whether Spain has yet reached a condition of mind in which to treat for peace. Our own conviction is that while negotiations may be opened on the part of Spain, the Spanish government is not yet willing to make such concessions as would justify the United States in ending the war. It is idle for Spain to talk of the autonomy of Cuba under Spainish suzerainity, and the retention of Porto Rico and the Philippines. This would have done before the war was begun, but such terms are out of date at present. War is a costly thing and somebody must pay for it. The defeated nation is generally the one that has to do it.

While the air is thus full of the talk of peace there is not the slightest cessation on the part of this government in its plans or preparations for continuing hostilities. The dispatch of a squadron under Commodore Watson to the coasts of Spain, and an expedition both military and naval to Porto Rico to take possession of that island, are among the plans for immediate execution. Meanwhile the fourth expedition to Manila has just left San Francisco, which indicates that the United States has no intention of vacating those islands and turning them over to the possession of Spain. There can be no doubt that the speediest way to the realization of peace with a government like Spain is the most vigorous prosecution of the war. That government ought to understand, however, that every day's delay in suing for peace but adds to the concessions she is bound to make in the end in order to terminate the war. But Spain is judicially blind, it would seem, until Divine Providence has accomplished, through means of this war, the purposes for which it was inaugurated.

It is reported that there are a number of cases of yellow fever in the army at Santiago. Of course these cases have been separated from the army and every precaution is being exercised to prevent the spread of the disease. And yet there is no concealing the fact that there is a great deal of anxiety through the country lest many of our brave boys at the front, who have escaped Spanish bullets, may fall victims to this yellow pest. One of the causes of rejoicing in the surrender of Santiago is the fact that it will make possible the removal of our troops to a more healthy locality and where there is less danger of contact with this disease. It is not proposed, we understand, that our army shall enter the city of Santiago, but that a few regiments of immunes with perhaps some of the Cuban forces, will hold the city while the main body of our troops are taken elsewhere. Additional surgeons and medical supplies have been sent to Santiago, and no pains will be spared by the government to save our soldiers from this dreadful plague. It will give a great sense of relief, however, when it is known that the disease is under control and that our army has been removed to where it will be free from the contagion.

THE NASHVILLE CONVENTION IN RETROSPECT.

It is not in the high tide of enthusiasm, generated by a convention, that its real value is to be judged, but in the calm convictions that abide when feeling and sentiment have had time to subside to the normal level. Looking back to the Christian Endeavor convention at Nashville, we find there are certain convictions which have been deepened and strengthened by what we saw and heard while in attendance on its proceedings. We mention these in the hope that they may prove helpful to others in forming an estimate of this modern movement in the church.

1. It seems to us to be a providential movement. This means that there was a real need for it in the church. It means, too, that the Spirit of God gave the impulse that led to its inauguration. The wisdom by which it has been guided, on the whole, indicates that the men who are at the helm seek and receive divine guidance. Its remarkable growth, too, shows that it was not born too soon, but that the world—the religious world at least—was waiting for it. The exigencies of the church demanded this new agency, and it came in response to that demand and in obedience to the impulse of the Spirit, which abides forever in the church. If it be a providential movement having a great mission to accomplish, our duty in reference to it is clear. It is gratifying to know that our churches generally view it in this light and are using it greatly to their advantage.

2. We believe the Christian Endeavor movement is designed to promote the unity for which Jesus prayed. This has been doubted by some because it inculcates denominational loyalty. Waiving the point now that an interdenominational movement is impossible on any other principle, the objection to the Christian Endeavor movement on this ground is based on a false view, as we believe, as to God's method of bringing about the unity He desires. The objection assumes that it will be by the destruction of denominational walls by a force from without, and the subsequent gathering together in one ecclesiastical body of those released. But this does not seem to be God's method of promoting union. As a matter of fact we know that all attempts of that kind have resulted in strengthening denominational walls and in building them higher. God's method, if we are to judge from what we see going on before our eyes, is to deepen and widen the spiritual life within the various bodies of evangelical believers, and to so conform them to His own will and way, that they may be able to fraternize with each other and co-operate with each other in doing His work in the world. If all our mutual misunderstandings and prejudices were removed, we would find ourselves much closer together than we imagine. But this can be accomplished in no other way so well as through some interdenominational organization, offering a common basis of fellowship and of work. No other movement in the church, so far, has succeeded in gathering so large a number of Christians of various bodies together in a common work and with common aims, as has the Christian Endeavor movement. It is, therefore, the most potent agent known for promoting interdenominational acquaintanceship and fellowship, which must precede the unity for which Jesus prayed.

3. It is a powerful agency for promoting a deeper spiritual life. It is one of the keynotes of the Endeavor conventions. The "Quiet Hour" has become a feature of great prominence in the Endeavor movement. We have reason to believe that the services in connection with this morning hour at Nashville were the means of awakening in the hearts of hundreds of Christians the desire for a better and richer Christian life than they have been living, and of putting them in the way of realizing this desire. The interest of the great audiences was intense as the speaker pointed out the possibilities of the Christian life and the means of attaining these possibilities. It was no hobby of perfectionism that was presented, but the importance of surrendering our lives more fully to Jesus Christ that he may work in us his gracious purposes. Our readers will bear us witness that this has been a matter of capital importance with us for many years, and that we have sought steadily to minister to this spiritual need. Our membership is largely ready to be led into the deeper things of spiritual life. Most of our churches welcome such teaching. If this want is not supplied by those who feed the flock of God among us, our members will seek for it elsewhere, and will often find it in connection with errors of a hurtful character. The duty is upon us and cannot be evaded. We may use the Endeavor Society to good effect in supplying this need.

We need not take space here to speak of the value of the Christian Endeavor Society as a training school to prepare young people for Christian work, and to supply work for them to do. This is generally recognized. It is in the church and for the church, and is not something separate from the church. It has come to perform a mighty mission. If we be wise we will avail ourselves of it to the fullest extent. It finds a genial soil among us, and if properly cultivated it will here bring forth its choicest fruit.

OUR SPECIAL OFFER.

With the view of introducing the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to a large number of new readers, we are offering the paper from the time the subscription is received until the end of the present year for seventy-five cents. We earnestly solicit the active assistance of our old readers in making this offer known, and in extending our circulation. It is hoped that the new form will be acceptable to all our friends, and may be made the occasion by them of a special effort in its behalf.

THE PRESENT CRISIS: GOD'S VOICE.

God is speaking to us now. He often reveals his and mind purposes in current events. His voice can easily be heard to-day if men will but give attention. In an important sense divine revelation is perpetual. New truth is seen day after day by earnest and reverent students of the Bible. New light shines forth from its pages as the years go by. Men see more in the Scriptures, much more, than they saw a few years ago. The depths of meaning contained in our sacred literature have not yet been sounded. It is more than probable that the human intellect will never reach the profoundest depths of the heaven-inspired writings. They are from God. God is infinite. His thoughts are like himself. He is infinite; his thoughts are infinite. "My thoughts are not your thoughts; neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord." Man is finite. His mind can only compass finite things. Hence his study of the literature which, in a peculiar sense is from God, man will ever find something new. But the record of verbal and other revelations which we call the Bible, is not the only revelation that has been given to man by the Author of his being. "The heavens declare the glory of God." His love as well as his glory are declared in the volume called the Living Oracles of the Holy Spirit. It is from the Christian Scriptures alone that the way of salvation from sin can be learned. God reveals himself in history—in secular as well as in sacred. Every student of history recognizes this fact. The Word of the Lord in the Bible says that Jehovah builds and destroys governments. Who can doubt the superintending providence of God in the discovery and settlement of the New World? The birth of this republic was of God. His hand sustained it in its infancy. The same kind hand has guided it to this present hour. It is easy to see his presence in the great crisis of our history. God founded and established the North American Republic for a great and gracious purpose, and he will care for it until this is accomplished. God was as certainly present with the Pilgrims when they came to America as he was present with the people of Israel when they entered Canaan. He cared for them, and cares for their descendants no less certainly than he cared for the Hebrew people in the olden time. God is with us now. Recent events make this evident. He is directing our cause at the present time. God the Lord is our Sovereign. To hearken to his voice is wisdom; to refuse to hear him is folly. We are making history rapidly. Events of great significance crowd upon each other with tremendous rapidity. What do these events signify? What would God have us learn from them? What, specifically, are some of the lessons to be learned from the Spanish-American war?

Sin brings ruin. This thought is fundamental. Ruin is an inevitable consequence of persistent wrong-doing. This statement is as true of nations as of individuals. "Though hand joined in hand the wicked shall not be unpunished." This sentence is written in the Bible. Evidence of its truth is before our eyes. Whatsoever a nation soweth that shall it reap, is as true as "whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." This judgment of nations is here and now. We, as a nation, have suffered for our sins. Spain is now reaping a harvest resulting from her sowing through past centuries. God is not slack as some count slackness. Four hundred years is not a long time with God. The history of Spain during this time is a record of unrighteousness, injustice, cruelty, oppression, wrong. Her career has been characterized by an insatiable greed. This indictment is severe, but it is mild when read in the light of the unquestionable record of history. One by one she has lost her possessions. The last are now passing from her control. And this present fact is the more remarkable when we remember that this is not because the nation with which she is at war desires her territory, and that also the loss is not a result of the victories of her rebellious colonies. Can any one doubt that this is a judgment from God? He is now speaking in thunder-tones and declaring that the wicked shall not be unpunished, that sin is a reproach to any people, that as a nation sows it will certainly reap. God is just. He is not willing that any should perish; but his judgments are abroad.

But there is a warning, solemn and impressive, in these things for us. The warning is from the Ruler of nations. As Spain was we are; as Spain is we may be. The time was when Spain was rich and powerful. This nation, the United States, is wealthy and potent. This abundant wealth can be retained, and this power, on certain clearly defined conditions. Righteousness, however, is the one word that includes all. The United States must do right. There is such a thing as national righteousness. This is an essential condition of national prosperity. It must be confessed, in the interest of absolute truth, that we have not always dealt righteously with those who were dependent on us. Our treatment of the Indian is not a course of conduct to be proud of. And how patiently did God bear with us in our treatment of the negro before he exhibited wrath in the terrible baptism of blood through which he caused us to pass in 1361-65.

The great republic stands at the beginning of a new era. This new dispensation in our national history began with the roar of Dewey's guns in Manila Bay, May 1st, 1898. Every American ought now to pause and think as he has never thought before. There has never been a time in our history when there was greater need for real statesmanship than now. This war—the present Spanish-American—so far as our people are concerned, began in a Christian spirit. It has thus far been carried on in a manner worthy of the highest Christian civilization. It was not undertaken in self-defense. It was not inaugurated for territorial aggrandizement. Nor was it entered upon to avenge the Maine. The poor, the weak, the liberty-loving were under oppression at our door. We remonstrated once and again, but in vain. The cruelties and oppressions not only continued, but increased. At last forbearance ceased to be a virtue. Not until hundreds of thousands of noncombatants—men, women and children—perished by starvation and the sword did the American people speak sternly. This is a war in behalf of the oppressed. Will we bear ourselves as a Christian people in this new era upon which we are entering? or will we be puffed up by our enormous wealth and unparalleled success and become unjust in dealing with our wards?

Thank God! we are now away from questions of mere policy. There are great moral issues at this moment appearing above the horizon. The loving voice of our God warns us. He indicates to us the way in which we should walk. We are not left in doubt as to the things that are offensive to him. We are not ignorant of the things that are well pleasing to him. This is to us a day of crisis.

A great and effectual door is being opened before American Christians for aggressive evangelistic work. The schoolmaster and the preacher will be in demand. The peoples over whom the American flag begins to float are in dense ignorance and deep moral degradation. God calls us to preach the gospel of his grace to them. Will we be disobedient to his voice?

Hour of Prayer.

THE CALLED OF GOD.

(Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, July 27.)

But ye are an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession, that ye may show forth the excellencies of Him who called you out of darkness into His marvelous light.—1 Peter 2:9.

The Greek term for the English word church means called, or called out. The gospel is God's call to men to repent and to come out from the world into a kingdom that is not of this world. Those who respond to that call constitute the church or the called.

The apostle, in the above passage, tells what Christians are called to be. They are called out of the world to be "an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession." It will be seen from this what election means in the New Testament. Those who accept God's call, and come out from the world, are an elect race. This election, then, is not arbitrary, and without regard to man's acceptance or non-acceptance of the gospel, but men, as free moral agents, have to do an important part in the matter of their election. They must accept and obey God's call. God has elected the kind of character that will meet his approval, and those who seek, by His aid, to realize that character are the elect of God. This is New Testament election.

It will be further seen from this important passage that all Christians are priests in the only sense in which any Christian can be a priest. They constitute "a royal priesthood;" that is, they are both kings and priests unto God. They are priests, because they are to "offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." They are royal priests because each one is to be crowned, and each one is to exercise royal prerogatives in connection with Jesus Christ. The pretense of another priesthood, different from that of the common Christian, that has exclusive rights of approach to God, is without support in the New Testament.

Christians are called to be "a holy nation, a people for God's own possession." Just as fast as the people of a nation become Christians, the nation should become "holy" in all its laws, institutions and customs. They constitute a sort of nation within themselves, a kingdom, in other words, that is not of this world. They belong to God in a peculiar sense as His own possession, and should hold themselves ready at all times to do His will and serve His purpose.

Let it be observed that the object for which God has called us out of darkness iato his marvelous light is that we may show forth the "excellencies" of God. It is evident that we are to do this for the benefit of the world around us. Unbelievers should see in the lives of Christians those excellencies which characterize God. But this is not all of the truth. We are also to "make known to the principalities and the powers in the heavenly places the manifold wisdom of God" (Ephesians 3:10). It would seem, then, that the church is charged with the responsibility of making known the character and wisdom of God, not only to human beings, but to all celestial intelligences. God's wisdom, especially in the dispensation of the gospel, is to be vindicated before the intelligences of the universe, by the church which He has called out of darkness into light.

Who is equal to this responsibility? Only those who surrender their lives to God that He may fill them with His own life and light. Not in our own strength, but only in the strength that God supplies, can we form such characters and live such lives as will show forth the excellencies and the wisdom of God to all created intelligences.

Beloved, if we have been "called out of darkness into His marvelous light," we ought to walk in the light, and not in the darkness of the world. If we walk in the light as He is in the light, the blood of Jesus Christ His Son will cleanse us from all unrighteousness.

PRAYER.

O Thou infinite and eternal God, who hast revealed Thyself to us as Father, through Jesus Christ Thy Son, we thank Thee that Thou hast called us out of darkness into Thy marvelous light, to be a royal priesthood, a holy nation, Thine own possession, and to show forth the excellencies of Him who hath called us. Help us, we pray Thee, to appreciate our high calling and to walk worthy of it. May we who have heard Thy call come out of the world and cease to be sharers in its sin and shame, and walk in the light, which Thou hast shed upon us in Jesus Christ. So shall we reflect Thy glory even here, and much more in the world to come. For Christ's sake. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

OR MACATAWA MUSINGS.

After a jaunt of more than a thousand miles thither and hither and mingling with the hurrying throngs in the International Convontion of Christian Endeavor, it seems good to rest once more beside the peaceful lake. Our Easy Chair to-day is a hammock, and it swings in full view of Lake Michigan, which lies to-day in dreamlike repose. Not even the sound of a ripple is heard. It is the very emblem of peace, as it is at other times of restlessness. What a day for reading and meditation! And yet the cool atmosphere and the cool water of the lake presents too great a temptation to the lovers of the angler's art to be long resisted. Our yonder on the smooth lake are a number of boats and men and women are dropping their lines down into the cool depths for perch. On a day like this, when the blue sky bends caressingly over a smooth lake, and when the stillness of the green forest is unbroken except by the sweet notes of the birds, existence seems to be a luxury. One's soul may drink in enough of the vitalizing breath of heaven in such a day to fortify it for many days of stress and storm.

Speaking of the journey southward and return, how lovely the country is at present! It never seems to us more beautiful than when the fields are full of ripened shocks of grain, and the green, young corn is rustling its blades to the passing breeze. As one rides through such states as Illinois, Kentucky, Indiana, Tennessee, Missouri, Ohio and others like them, he can but thank God for such a country and for such an abundance as it produces. As we look upon the panorama of country homes with their orchards and meadows and gardens, we instinctively feel that, after all, there is no life quite equal to that of the farmer, and that from these country homes must come in the future as in the past a very large portion of the men who are to be leaders in church and state. Somehow there is stored away in brain and brawn of boyhood in the country the vitality and energy to fit one for future success, while there are developed those traits of character such as integrity, self-reliance and reverence, which are essential to a worthy manhood and womanhood. Perhaps these country scenes look more beautiful to our eyes because they recall the scenes and associations of our own boyhood which was spent on the farm.

A concrete case may serve often to illustrate a general principle. It is a well-known fact, often mentioned, that the majority of successful men in our cities to-day were raised in the country. In our young preacherhood we preached for a village church in Illinois, which had in it one man who, more than any other, was its life and inspiration. He lived on a farm near the town and ran a small store in the village. He had several boys whom he trained in the habits of integrity, industry and self-reliance. This good brother, whose kind face is distinct before our mental vision to-day, gave us the first bank bill we ever received for preaching. He has long since gone to his reward. In passing through Chicago last week we dropped in at one of the largest and most successful business houses in the city, conducted by Chas. A. Stevens & Bros. They are the sons of our old friend and brother, Socrates Stevens. They conducted the business in the town of Colchester for a number of years after their father's death and when it outgrew the town they moved to Chicago, about nine years ago, and their success in building up one of the largest silk stores in the country has been phenomenal. They employ about 750 men in the different departments and they do a vast business wholesale and retail. They attribute their success to conducting their business on the principles of strict integrity which were early inculcated in them, and advertising. One of them is assistant superintendent of a large Sunday-school, another is an active member in one of our churches, and all reverence God and believe in truth and righteousness. Three of them own and conduct this magnificent business on State Street, between Madison and Washington, two others are connected with a life insurance company, in responsible positions, and all of them are active, enterprising, successful business men. It illustrates the possibility of the country boy who shuns evil ways and believes there is no contradiction between business success and Christian integrity. As they conducted us through their great establishment from floor to floor, and we looked upon the army of clerks and the throngs of customers, and saw what remarkable success these boys had attained while they are yet young men, we realized anew the possibilities of the country boy, and the responsibility which such success entails. These young men have influence and power. May it be that they shall use this influence and power in the same conscientious way that their good father did.

During our absence from the Park a great many newcomers arrived, and the population of this summer resort is steadily increasing. Among the latest comers are Pastor Geo. H. Combs ann family, of Kansas City, Mo., and Prof. Graham Taylor and family, from Chicago. St. Louis, Chicago and Kansas City have a steadily increasing constituency here from year to year. The Mocatawa Assembly begins here on the 7th of August. In another place in this paper may be found the program which we hope will interest a number of people and induce them to spend at least that week with us. We are constantly receiving letters of inquiry about how to reach this place. It is very easy to reach. The Holland and Chicago Line of Steamers leave Chicago, No. 1 State Street, each evening at 7 P. M., except Friday, when the boat leaves a 4 P. M., and Saturday at 9 A. M. and 4 P. M. Please clip this out. If you come by rail inquire at your railroad office for Ottawa Beach, across the channel from Macatawa and the terminus of the Chicago and West Michigan Railroad. Accommodations for board or cottages can best be ascertained after arriving on the ground.

We are grateful to our appreciative friends for their many kind words of congratulation on the new form and dress of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. They rightly regard it as a distinct step in advance in our religious journalism. While we are doing what we can to keep the paper up to the demands of a growing brotherhood, we trust our friends will feel it to be no less a privilege than a duty to co-operate with us in introducing the paper to thousands of new readers. We appeal for this co-operation on no other ground than the good influence of the journal wherever it is circulated, as a stimulator and helper in all that is best and praiseworthy in religious life and work. As a tree is known by its fruits, so must a religious journal be judged. By that test it stands or falls. We appeal to no other. If the paper in your judgment is fulfilling a useful and necessary mission among us, help us to give it the largest opportunity for doing good, and you share with us in the reward that comes to all who seek to advance the kingdom of God among men.

Rev. John Dixon, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Trenton, has been elected assistant secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions.

Questions and Answers.

Is the Sunday-school a child of the church of Christ, and is it a part of the church?

W. V. Boltz.

The Dalles, Ore.

Yes, the Sunday-school is the creation of the spirit of Christianity, and in that sense is the child of the church. It is also fostered and supported by the church, and is one of its most importont agencies for accomplishing its most important functions, namely, that of teaching. It is not to be regarded as distinct from the church any more than a prayer-meeting, or a sewing society or an Endeavor Society. These are but different aspects of the church, or the church engaged in different kinds of work.

(1) Can the church or minister receive gifts from him who has been "called a brother," or is the church destined to always make cowardly compromises? (1 Cor. 5:11.)

(2) 1 Tim. 5-11, "The younger widows refuse"—from what? If from the daily administrations, were they not to be helped except as they were 60 years old, etc.? (Verses 9 and 10.)

(3) A wife secures adivorce on other than scriptural grounds, when she is married to another. Is her former husband "loosed from the law" of his wife? L.

1. Neither the church nor the minister should, of course, make any "cowardly compromise;" but they must be the judges in each particular case, as to when the acceptance of a gift from any one would be such a compromise. It is not a dignified attitude for the church to occupy, nor one calculated to win the respect of the world, for it to solicit funds to carry on its enterprises from those known to be hostile to its work, and out of harmony with its aims and spirit. The acceptance of the voluntary offerings of those who, though not church members, feel that they owe something to the support of Christian work, is a very different matter and involves no compromise.

2. The passage referred to, as we understand it, means that the "younger widows" were not to be regarded as beneficiaries of the church, to be supported by it, nor were any others who had elatives to whom they could naturally look for support. The church was not to do any unnecessary benevolent work.

3. We should think so, provided the former husband is an innocent party to the transaction.

In the 21st chapter and 27th verse of Luke, does not the word "then," in connection with the many pronouns representing the disciples, indicate that they—the disciples— were to live to see the "Son of Man come in power and great glory?"

Reader.

The passage referred to in connection with that of Matt. 16:28 would seem to refer to an event that took place in the lifetime of at least many of those to whom Jesus was speaking. The only event which meets the demands is the coming of the Holy Spirit on Pentecost and the inauguration of the spiritual reign of Christ. The destruction of Jerusalem, sometimes referred to the fulfillment of this prediction, was only the outward accompaniment of the transcendent event we have mentioned.

Will you kindly explain, through the columns of your paper, what the "unpardonable sin" is? A Reader.

It is the rejection of Christ after all the evidence is in. It is such a sinning against light and knowledge as to render the soul impervious to the truth of the gospel. Every person is on the road to the commission of such sin who deliberately and repeately rejects the claims of the gospel against the protests of his conscience and his better judgment.

1. Were the "signs that were to follow them that believed" (Mark 16: 15-20) figurative or literal?

2. Can you give any Scripture that will prove that these promises were only intended for the Christians of the apostolic age? Leverett G. Higley.

Butler, Ind.

1. We think they were literal, although there is no doubt but that the divine oversight extended also into the spiritual realm.

2. There is no special passage that limits this particular promise to the apostolic age, as far as we know. The general trend of New Testament teaching goes to show that the miraculous events associated with the inauguration of Christianity were confined to the early period of the church. The best proof, however, is to be found in the history of the fulfillment of the promise. We know of no authentic record of the continuance of these sgins since the apostolic age. This naturally confirms the view that the promise was given especially to the apostles, who were charged and spirtually qualified to accomplish a work of transcendent importance in the establishment of Christianity. We believe, however, there are "signs" that follow all those who truly believe that are far more important now than speaking with new tongues, taking up serpents and drinking poison without physical damage. The blessed fruit of the Spirit, as love, joy, peace, long-suffering, meekness, temperance, fidelity, patience, are "signs" that every Christian should covet.

A young lady on coming forward to confess Christ recently, demurred at the phrase, "with all your heart," saying that it was too much to ask of a beginner. Is there a definite, authorized formula of words which we are compelled to use on such occasion? L.

There is no prescribed formula. There are several forms given in the New Testament, any one of which would seem to cover the case. The essential thing in all these forms of confession is the acceptance of Christ as Savior and Lord, without any mental reservations, with perfect sincerity of heart. The young lady in question had perhaps a wrong idea as to the import of the phrase to which she objected. It certainly does not mean that one is to have as full and complete a faith in beginning the Christian life as afterwards. It means simply that there is a full decision of the heart to accept Christ; that there is to be no division of loyalty between Him and some one else, or the world. It is not necessary that these precise words be embraced in the form of question asked, nor is it necessary that any question be asked at all. The important thing is that the candidate for a Christian life shall confess with the mouth the Lord Jesus, and in his heart accept Him as the Lord of his life. Some form of question, however, is usually desirable, and the following seems to us to cover the ground: Do you believe with the heart on the Lord Jesus Christ? Do you accept Him as your Savior and promise to obey Him in all things to the best of your knowledge and ability? The latter of these questions has always seemed to us to be important as giving an opportunity for a personal public commitment of the candidate to the Lordship of Jesus Christ. It should be impressed upon those contemplating making such confession that it is a decisive act of their lives, and that it commits them, before Heaven and earth, to submission to Jesus Christ, who is henceforth to be their Prophet, Priest and King.

Current Religious Thought

We commend the following sensible observations of the Christian Commonwealth on thoughtful preaching to the prayerful consideration of our churches and ministers:

History has taught some sharp and salutary lessons about the mind of the nation. Sanctified twaddle in the pulpit always pleases a crowd for a season. But when the season of sensationalism is over the community is lowered rather than uplifted. The preaching that has lifted populations out of degradation has always been that of students. Calvin was the most learned man of his time. Luther was a splendid Latin and Hebrew scholar. And Switerland was saved to the Reformation by the preaching of Calvin and the almost equally learned Zwingli, while the Germany of to-day is really founded on the popular preaching of Martin Luther. Knox preached before kings. The gospel which has made Scotland the most religious nation on the face of the earth did not consist of pleasant Sunday talks without hammering at the deep things. Christmas Evans was profound, poetical and imaginative, and he and the noble pulpiteers of the principality at the beginning of this century brought the Welsh people out of the horrible pit of indifference and Erastianism. A popular superficial ministry when sanctified has its proper sphere. But ministries of this school when multiplied actually injure the public mind. They minimize the glory of the gospel. C. H. Spurgeon dreaded the very thing which thoughtless people ascribed to him. He believed in scholarly preaching adapted to audiences according to their needs. The splendid success of Dr. McLaren and of Dr. Joseph Parker, lasting for half a century, must be accepted as a monumental proof of the power of men who read and think, and yet are able to touch the emotions of thousands with more than transient sensationalism. The preaching of Melvill in the last generation, and of Liddon in this, saved the Church of England from the reproach of that contemptibly small gospel which inflicted spiritual starvation on multitudes. Let scholars and students not be discouraged by the fact that a learned ministry seems to be at a discount. There is no reason why, as in the case of Wesley, Whitefield, Toplady, Newman, Manning, Wilberforce, Magee, Robertson, Sortain, Irving and the pulpit giants who have too few successors, a deep insight into truth should not acceptably accompany the popular presentation of evangelical truth.

Christian Work touched a vital point when in an editorial on "Rationalism Irrational" it gave utterance to the following language:

Then, again, note this fact, that in the name of morality these irrational scoffers despise and make light of the principle of goodness as set forth in the gospel. But how long will goodness last in any heart in which it has its own original source? How soon will be exhausted all the goodness that is in you in the midst of a world that is full of temptation and society that is depraved more or less in its every aspect? Morality cannot exist long cut off from the vital source of goodness. Morality cannot be upheld without a standard of goodness. Morality cannot be maintained without the stimulus of goodness; and all goodness is in the God of grace, as the fountain-head and source. Thus, when any man deprives himself of these, making light of the God of grace, he has begun his downward tendency. This is a self-evident truth, the proof of which we see all around us in every-day life. While a man who believes in Jesus Christ is improving every day in temper, in motive, in character and in life; on the other hand, the man who denies Christ is going backward and downward every day. He is conscious of it, but excuses it in himself while he observes and condemns it in others. He will bid you go talk to the drunkard or to the criminal of sins to be forgiven and infirmities to be strengthened; to those who are liable to be tempted and fall. As to himself, he does not need any special help from God. Such a spirit of pride casts aside all the influences of divine help and grace, and makes a cover for concealed sin. Our judgment of this world is oftentimes but a reflection of our own self-consciousness. While we criticise some one whom we consider a great sinner, we are often but casting the shadow of our own conscience upon him. Such men, while claiming to be rational, are constantly committing themselves to the most absurd irrationality.

Those who are inclined to look into the deep things of God may find the following analysis of the question of "The Divine Immanence," by Prof. Borden P. Browne, D. D., of Brown University, in The Independent, June 30th, suggestively helpful. The Professor says:

Three points have to be borne in mind in estimating this doctrine, if we are not to fall into speculative insanity. In the first place, we must distinguish the question concerning the form, laws and contents of the world from the question concerning its causality. The doctrine in question applies only to causality. The form, laws and contents of the world of experience can be learned only from experience; and they are the same for all, no matter what our theory of causality. The world of experience is what it is, whatever its origin; and our knowledge of that world is not vacated or made unimportant by any theory of its origin. In studying it all theorists, of whatever speculative school, meet on a common plane and have a common object. The theist and the atheist, the spiritualist and materialist, the dogmatist and agnostic have no differences here. The immanence of God, then, while doing away with nature as a substantive and self-running mechanism, in no way cancels the existence of nature as an order of phenomena, as a system of law to which we are all subject, and which is irresistibly imposed upon us in experience. Unless we bear this in mind, we shall have persons denying the facts of disease or of sense on the ground of divine immanence. Disease may not be a substance, and sense objects may be only phenomena; but as facts in the system of experience they have to be reckoned with by the most pronounced idealist as inevitably as by the most inveterate realist.

The second point to be borne in mind is that this doctrine of immanence in no way affects the contents and values of things. It simply affirms that all finite things, whatever they are, have no self-sufficient being, but depend on God for their existence. The immanence does not mean that things are in God in a spatial sense, or that God is in things in a spatial sense; it means only the constant dependence of things on God. But this dependence does not make all things alike or of equal value. It leaves things just what they are or may reveal themselves to be. Their values, absolute or relative, are not affected by this immanence. Worms and men alike have their being in God, but they are not made of equal value thereby. Even the evil will is not independent of God, but that does not make it divine. The immanence in question is a metaphysical doctrine, and throws no light on the problem of ethical relations and values. Unless we bear this point in mind, we shall proceed to identify clams and saints as alike and equally divine. Indeed, one speculator, whose mental bottle would seem to have been pretty seriously strained by the new wine of this doctrine of immanence, has announced that he has no difficulty with the doctrine of a divine man, as he believes in a divine oyster. And when a divine man eats the divine oyster, we doubtless have a divinity of the second order.

Finally, as the third point to be borne in mind, the doctrine of immanence throws no light on the problem of finite existence. This must always remain a mystery to be recognized and admitted, not a fact to be deduced or comprehended. We cannot help ourselves by any theory of pantheism. In that case we should have to declare our sense of selfhood and responsibility a delusion, and this would leave us without anyting on which to build. We should also have to attribute our folly, error, blundering, wickedness, to God himself; and this would be a very high price to pay for our doctrine of immanence. We should also have an insoluble psychological problem concerning God himself. If we suppose the difficulty overcome which is involved in the inalienability of personal experience, and attribute our thoughts and feelings to God as his own, we are met at once by the question concerning God's relation, as thinking our thoughts, to God as thinking the absolute and perfect thought. If our thoughts are all, then God as God vanishes. If he has our thoughts as his own and another set of perfect thoughts as his own, we have many minds rather than one. In one series God is limited, confused, erring; in the other he has perfect knowledge and insight. In the one series God loses himself and does not know who or what he is; in the other he knows himself as perfect unity and perfect light. There is no answer to these questions so long as the Infinite is supposed to play both sides of the game, and no possibility of saving thought and life from utter and hopeless confusion.

How the finite can be, how it can have otherness to the Infinite and a relative independence, there is no telling. But the finite, nevertheless, is; and, by its existence, it makes possible a moral order and an intelligible, rational system. The doctrine of divine immanence must be interpreted in accordance with this fact; otherwise, we shall have to regard the brothel as a divine institution, and hold to the gospel of the divine oyster.

Yet, rightly understood, the doctrine is important, both speculatively and religiously. It cancels the hard-and-fast mechanism of deistic thought; it makes intelligible the divine omnipresence, and helps us to realize how the Infinitely Far may also be the Infinitely Near.

Marcus Dods, in a recent number of the New York Observer, concludes an interesting article on "Is Sunday a Common Holiday?" with the following excellent suggestions as to how it may and should be observed:

Sunday, then, is a great opportunity that is given to us for cultivating elements in our character which if not so cultivated do practically get stunted in the mechanical routine and thoughtless urgency of business. It is an opportunity of which every wise man will avail himself for enjoying the communion of saints, not only to that limited extent which is possible to us in church, but in that supreme and elevating degree which is possible to all who will read the inspiring thoughts of those who have lived nearest to God in all ages, and in the fellowship of whose strivings after knowledge and holiness we are ourselves purified and strengthened. It is an opportunity given to us for ministering by personal attention to the sorrowful, the wretched, the diseased, the destitute, the ignorant—a day which our Lord reminds us might be well spent in active benevolence and in an attempt to carry some share of our manifold comforts and advantages to some one or two who need them more. One day's leisure in seven—seven weeks in every year—should surely leave behind some very visible traces of our willingness to be helpful in this world, where there is such room for wise and honest helpfulness. To spend such a day in formal attendance at church, in yawning idleness that has not energy enough to think that God can not possibly prefer that to honest hard work; to spend it in gossiping levity, in a vacant weariness that hails dinner as the great event and real relish of the day, is a scandal to our common humanity. Do not let these precious hours slip through your hand without your draining them of their possibilities of imparting renewed freshness and strength to your spirit. Seclude yourself for sometime with God; make a duty of seriously considering your ways, your habits, your disposition. Let your mind rest on the great gospel facts—the life, the love, the death, the resurrection of Christ. Seek your Lord's presence and address him with the words your own thoughts of him suggest, and you will learn how reasonable and fruitful an appointment it is that from all your ordinary works that you should rest every seventh day.

The following remarks of the Religious Telescope clearly indicate some of the difficulties in the way of the enforcement of the law against "Sabbath desecration" by baseball games and other evils. It says:

But, says one, why is not the law enforced and the Sunday baseball game stopped? Yes, why? One reason is, Sunday baseball pays. The street railway lines reap large harvests from it, and the stock, much of which is held by leading members of the prominent city churches, pays much larger dividends than it would pay but for the Sunday baseball. Touch the game adversely and you touch the pockets of prominent citizens and church members; consequently, to enforce the law is unpopular.

Then, many good, law-abiding citizens, whose hearts are pained at seeing God's sacred day trampled on and anarchism encouraged by this open defiance of civil authority, say: We elect officers whose sworn duty it is to enforce the law. We pay our taxes and thereby pay those officers large salaries. Why, then, should we be asked to do anything more to secure the law's enforcement. Must we, after paying our burdensome taxes, go down into our pockets and raise large extra sums to pay lawyers to help us enforce the law, when we have already elected officers who violate their oath by neglecting to do their sworn duty?

Others are discouraged because prominent citizens who pose as being patriotic and law-abiding, either wink at this open defiance of law, or at least refuse to say or do anything to abate it, "lest it might compromise them in their business." At a public meeting called by the ministerial association of this city recently to take action for the enforcement of the law against Sunday baseball, the great majority of the citizens were conspicuous by their absence. Seeing this, ordinary men say to themselves: "If the leading citizens of the city refuse to stand out boldly in favor of the inforcement of the law, it is useless for us to attempt to effect anything in that direction. If they can afford to stand by and see the law trampled upon, and anarchy and revolution fostered in our midst, we can do so too. If the Sabbath is destroyed, the morals of the republic undermind, and our glorious Union repeats the history of the republics of Greece and Rome, the responsibility will be with them and not with us.

CHURCH FINANCE.*

ALBERT SCHWARTZ.

Church finance is a necessary element in church enterprises. It must not be overestimated, slighted, nor abused would we have a healthy church—one that is active, growing, spiritual. It has a rightful place. True principles also are revealed which should underlie all plans. To ascertain this place, to discover these principles, and to work out a true method should be the aim of all. That these things have not been done by a large majority of Christians and churches is sufficient reason for this investigation.

I. The Place of Church Finance.

The Master came to save men, and to do this he taught them and ministered unto them. He requires the same of the church. To accomplish the work every church should have three lines of expense, viz.:

1. Local sundries.
2. Preaching at home and abroad.
3. Caring for the needy.

No congregation can work without incurring sundry expenses. Nor can it maintain efficient preaching and teaching at home and abroad unless it supports such preachers and teachers. Furthermore, no congregation can well claim the Master's spirit that neglects the call of sickness and poverty, and this demands money. To argue these points would be much like attempting to prove the self-evident. Yet we find many professed Christians and churches are very indifferent, and some even dare to reject some of these duties. And quite universally the work of the deacons as indicated in Acts 6, has degenerated into passing the emblems and the contribution basket on Lord's day and into making schemes and plans for raising money that ought to be placed at their disposal without any special effort. The church has largely lost the true work of the deacon, and as a result the lodge has risen to supply a needed work. Let the church supply the money and elevate the deacon's work to its noble place of mercy, and the lodge will fail, not because we fight it, but because we assume our much-neglected work of caring for the needy.

*A paper read before the District Convention, Shenandoah, Iowa.

II. The Principles of Church Finance.

The following are the most important principles:

1. The Master's work as indicated above must be maintained.
2. The Master's work must be FIRST in our aims and efforts.
3. The Master bought us. We and all we have belong to him. We are stewards and must use everything for his glory.
4. Love is the primary law.
5. The giving must be with liberality and according as we are prospered, or proportionately.
6. All must give.
7. Cheerful and willing giving is demanded.
8. Blessings of a spiritual nature at least attend those who do give thus.

None of these principles should be ignored in forming our standards and methods. They ofttimes are, but always with peril to spirituality.

The greatest of these principles is love. Yet, many churches think any business man is capable of managing church finance. A successful business career is often the principal reason for placing a man in church office. Yes, business is business, but not every business man can wisely direct church finance. True, some of the principles of the business world should be adhered to in the management of church finance. They are right and true. But some customs and principles must be dropped when approaching church matters. For an example, the cardinal feature of the business world—viz., competition—must be used very little if any. Some parts of business are entirely too selfish and hostile to the Bible principle or law of love to God and man. Everything Christian rests upon this one word love, nor must we think it includes love of money. Ever to remember this law and to apply it is the great duty of Christians. Its power and spirit are needed in dealing with the church's financial problems. How many are the empty treasuries that love would quickly fill! The free workings of love would remove financial methods that are unjust, unholy, and a dishonor to God. Such a doctrine is indeed very strange to many men who are used to methods of selfish competition.

Nevertheless, the first great thing to attend to in church finance is to try to enlarge the spirit of love in the congregation. That which fault-finding, scolding, worldly wisdom and scheming fail to accomplish, love will quickly do. Then, let no one forget the corner-stone—love—when attempting to frame a financial policy for a congregation.

Growing out of love is the spirit and the application of consecration in spiritual work. How could a person love God and man and not attempt to carry or send God's message of love and mercy to lost humanity? But what has this to do with finance? Very much, indeed. For the promise of Jesus, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you," may be relied upon implicitly, not only by the individual, but also by the congregation. For the individual or congregation to doubt here is disloyalty. But many are, in fact, practically skeptics on this point. A loving or consecraned worker or church has great encouragement in this particular. This point needs frequent and heavy emphasis. Too often money-making schemes and plans are allowed chief emphasis and given much time to the neglect of love and spiritual enterprises. Consequently spirituality, church growth, and even financial interests languish.

III. Methods of Church Finance.

At the present time, methods of church finance are numerous. Some are useful, and some poor, some harmful. The Babel of methods present a strange appearance—an incongruous appearance of good aims dependent upon "the world, the flesh and the devil;" of wise ends furthered by weak, foolish, or even harmful means. Not every Christian nor every church approves and uses these inconsistent systems. Yet, so many do approve and employ methods that are evidently from the Evil One rather than from the Author of good, that it presents a sad thought to contemplate. The methods deserve attention.

Perhaps the most common method for providing for money is the subscription plan. It makes a fair degree of successs. Yet it violates some principles. It pledges on a future probability. The Scriptures ask that the offering be made according as one is prospered and this a person cannot be sure of in advance. This plan leads to many unwise pledges. Again, it sets no standard for giving. Each one according to his caprice decides his standard which very frequently means, "Give as little as you well can and yet appear respectable," instead of "as you are prospered."

While this method has done much service it must fail to reach the best results.

Another favorite method is the apportionment plan. But this also involves pledging on future probabilities. It also fails to be a system of proportionate giving; for no set of men can know the degree of prosperity of the membership, and I think none can deny that in actual practice the committee on appointment rarely attempts to make what they reasonably suppose to be a proportionate apportionment.

The usual idea is to apportion each member about all they think can be obtained. The liberal man is burdened, the close man is eased, oftimes.

A third and almost universal method is the social and entertainment plan. This is not usually resorted to for all expenses, but rather to meet deficiencies caused by other inefficient methods. Of all methods, this is the most worldly and inefficient. It has caused so much harm to spiritual growth and is so laborious and expensive that it seems strange that it is tolerated. It may not be totally depraved, but it is so much depraved that it would be well to abandon it rather than cling to it for its very few apparent benefits. It can rarely be justified as a money-making scheme; for it brings so little profit in return for the amount of time, work and money invested. Besides this it is the occasion of much strife. Any method that shows its worldly origin so clearly, that retards spiritual growth, that costs so much expenditure of labor, time and money for small returns ought to find no favor with a spiritual minded person or with a person of ordinary business sagacity. It ought to be banished.

A fourth method is the freewill offering. This may or may not be a success, according to circumstances. To one who is ignorant or selfish, freewill offering may mean very little or no offering. To the intelligent and loving Christian freewill offering is pre-eminently the correct plan. Such a one understands that he is merely a steward of God's goods and not the absolue owner. Realizing this he cannot be wasteful of his Master's possessions. Nor can he be careless in investing these possessions for the best interest of the Master. As he is one who must account for these possessions he alone must decide how to use them. He understands that covetousness is idolatry and tries to keep entirely free from it. He guards against the awful deceit of personal possessions and contends against the love of money—a root of every kind of evil. He holds these possessions subject to the call of the Master.

To these ideas all agree; but in practice we find the majority of Christians fail to realize the import of all this. They are untaught, are ignorant of their obligations and blessings. Under the law of love they fail to bestow upon the Lord's work as much as did the Jew under the Mosaic law. Comparatively few Christians give a tithe of all income. They spend more than nine tenths upon themselves or hoard it for self or children. Either ignorance or perverseness must account for this; for it is hardly fitting to so use another's—the Master's—possessions.

This paper is not for the defence of tithing from the mere standpoint of law, but rather a system of freewill offering, wherein the tenth is recognized as the very least that is consistent with Bible truth and love.

Any church that adopts any system of finance that looks for less than a tithe of the income of each member is tolerating a system entirely too low and is thereby cultivating a spirit of selfishness and covetousness in the membership.

Such a system is practical. The Jew gave more than a tenth. He was prospered in so doing and punished when he did not do so. Many Christians here and there give a tenth or more, and almost universally they testify that it is a blessing to them in some form. Not only is this plan practical, but it is certainly scriptural—a point before referred to.

No one will doubt that the Scriptures demanded this of the Jew, and we also learn that Abram gave tithes to the great Melchisedec. But strange to say, many preachers, even, seem to think that the Christians may do less and be guiltless. They will never speak of such a system as is here advocated lest they might bind the law on Christians. They apparently forget the majestic argument of the Hebrew epistle—the argument that approves and emphasizes the good of the old law, but then shows how much grander the blessings, privileges and obligations of the new. The whole trend of the argument justifies this position. In Heb. 7 we find a strong argument showing the superiority of the priesthood of Melchisedec to the Aaronic priesthood. One of the prominent reasons for this superiority is the fact that Abram, and consequently Levi, paid tithes to Melchisedec. Surely, then, as Jesus is priest after the order of Melchisedec we would do well to honor and magnify that priesthood by following the example of faithful Abraham; for Jesus is more worthy of every honor than Melchisedec, who was only a type.

Again, in 1 Cor. 9 we find the basis for advocating the same position. There the apostle Paul argues his right and the right of all gospel preachers to live by preaching. He reasons that—

1. The soldier does not go to war upon his own charges.
2. The one who cares for a vineyard eats of it.
3. The shepherd is supplied by the flock.
4. Oxen are not to be muzzled. This was written, not for the sake of oxen so as for man.
5. Those who ministered in the temple were to live from the altar—from the tithes and offerings brought by the Jews.
6. "Even so hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the gospel should live of the Gospel."

This argument in itself may not prove by hard-and-fast logic the proposition we are maintaining. But can any honest heart deny the gospel work is a greater and in some respects a more important one?

It is not national, but world-wide. It is not an easier work, but rather much harder. It does not require a less number to do the work that ought to be done. Hence can any loving Christian say the Lord has ordained that his workers in his most glorious dispensation shall live upon a far less ofiering than was required in the earlier dispensation? Surely, none can say, "Yes."

This plan of giving takes into view every Bible principle of giving. It recognizes stewardship. It gives some standard to judge the idea "to give according as prospered." It involves or encourages real sacrifice and liberality. It cultivates a spirit of willing, cheerful giving. It provides that one is not burdened and another eased. It would help covetous people to understand their own hearts better.

The advantages of the system would be legion to the individual Christian, to the congregation, to our social condition, and to our missionary and educational enterprises.

Let us begin an earnest effort to reach such a standard, and marvelous results will soon appear. The full ideal cannot be reached in one year nor ten; but great hosts of honest-hearted Christians could be quickly rallied to this standard. A radical change would soon be evident. Church and missionary treasuries would be filled. The gospel would be preached at home and abroad, and the poor would be cared for. It would soon put to shame the paltry results of the common methods.

Shall we advocate and support a system that is entirely scriptural, practical and full of blessing? Or, shall we continue to advocate systems that are very faulty and even very worldly?

"The good is the enemy of the best." Then even granting good points in the old ways, can we not see the wisdom of advocating the best ways?

Is God pleased to have us wear ourselves out trying to work unscriptural ways of finance rather than to adopt a self-working scriptural plan that brings a constant supply of money and yet leaves every individual free and fresh for spiritual enterprise?

The financial side of life is the one where a large part of Christians are liable to err, and many to finally stumble, fall and be eternally lost. No greater danger besets Christians. Hence, it is clearly for our best interests to make sure of the truth in this matter and order our lives accordingly.

OUR DUTY TO OUR RELIGIOUS NEIGHBORS.*

MRS. CLINTON LOCKHART.

It is our duty to bless all our neighbors; and we believe that our religious neighbors are as good as the rest of our neighbors if they behave themselves as well. The greatest barrier to inter-denominational friendship and fraternity, both on our side and theirs, is simple prejudice (much of it very simple). There is really no good reason why this feeling should exist, and there is less excuse for it among Endeavorers than among any other class of Christian workers. The Christian Endeavor Societies are not designed to make proselytes, not even to do evangelistic work; and certainly they are not intended to carry on theological controversy. Their special aim is growth in spirituality, to which controversy and prejudice make very poor contributions. Among our own people prejudice ought to be despised as being farthest from our plea and most unsuited to our chosen work among men. Prejudice is a natural product of narrowness and a feeling of weakness. People of broad views and liberal dispositions cannot consistently entertain prejudice against their neighbors. It is our aim as Christians to bless our neighbors, not to curse them in our hearts; to love them, not to hold them in contempt. Imagine a mother prejudiced against her child! Think of one sister prejudiced against another who needs her help! The love that thinks no evil feels no prejudice. What if others do not agree with us; they only deserve our sympathy, not our disrespect.

This is a wicked, fallible world; shall we be prejudiced against a whole world? Prejudice is a narrow conceit that crowds our neighbors out of our affection, and then passes judgment againt them with an assumption of infallibility. It is an air of self-importance that angels would not dare to assert. But more than this, it is due to a feeling of weakness, and is really a compliment to the strength of one's opponent. As Gay has well said:

> "In beauty faults conspicuous grow;
> The smallest speck is seen on snow."

Our very prejudice is an indication that we feel an inability to cope with our antagonist, and causes us to pray in the words of Dr. Fowler's Hunter: "Lord, help me against the bear; but if you can't help me, don't help the bear." This is surely not the attitude that becomes the disciple of Christ. If we are conscious of the greatness of our cause, the righteousness of our plea and the truth of our position, it poorly becomes us to betray a cowardly and sectarian spirit; and much more as we plead for universal love, unity and confidence. We, to whose minds the whole realm of truth has access, have no reason to bar out any soul which has been illuminated with the light of the cross, or to despise any effort that is directed toward a higher spirituality or a broader philanthropy. Why should we disregard others, whose very disposition we ought to imitate? Surely it is not in this way that we shall possess ourselves of their generous impulses.

> "As a wild tartar, when he spies
> A man that's valiant, handsome, wise,
> If he can kill him, thinks t' inherit
> His wit, his beauty and his spirit:
> As if just so much he enjoyed,
> As in another is destroyed."

It is, indeed, the spirit of fraternity on our part toward our religious neighbors that we need to enable us to associate with them in every good work in which we can secure a part. Very often our greatest lack of force in preaching Christian unity has been due to our indisposition to manifest a practical willingness to unite with them in Christian work. It may be granted that in many cases such a practical unity has been impossible or inconvenient; but in Christian Endeavor conventions it is practicable to show the spirit of unity, and so to cultivate it both among ourselves and in others.

Our disposition to unity in action as well as principle is always a measure of our spirituality. The lower the light of Christian love burns in our hearts, the less will it shine into the hearts of others. The less love we have for Christ, the less we will show to our neighbors. When the tide goes out from the beach it leaves many pools with little fishes swimming about in them; and one little shrimp may be separated from another by only a foot of dry sand, and yet have no communication with his neighbor; but this is only because the tide is too low. When the tide returns and the pools overflow with water, shrimp meets with shrimp in undisturbed fellowship. Let it be so with us; let the tide of Christian love and devotion so largely overflow the Endeavor Societies of all churches that Endeavorer shall meet Endeavorer in sweetest communion.

If there were no other advantage in our Christian Endeavor Societies meeting in convention with those of other churches, the privileges of social commingling alone ought to be decisive. The social benefits of Christianity to the world are a wreath of glory to our holy religion. Un-Christian nations know nothing of our social joys; and that type of religion which looks with suspicion upon social privileges is wanting in the true character of Christianity. Moreover, it is one of the cardinal features of the Endeavor Society that it cultivates sociability among its members and thereby displaces the ballroom and other follies with the higher enjoyments of Christian sociables. Sociability in the name of Christ is always pure, ennobling and helpful. Our Canton society has no meeting that is more profitable than our social meetings; hardly excepting the consecration meeting itself. Worship is good and needful, but the very spirit of devotion itself is that which fosters the sweetest social fellowships. Let this fellowship be extended as widely as possible. It should not be limited by towns or counties or states. Let it encircle the earth, and embrace all the ages of time.

Another advantage of our broader reach of fellowship is seen in the improved methods of work and worship that we are ever learning from our neighbors. We learn how to do committee work by the better work that others do; we learn better songs by hearing others sing; we make better prayers as our hearts are led by others into a closer communion with heaven; and we can more persuasively exhort each other to higher lives after we have listened to the inspiring pleas that others make for a closer walk with God. Thus the broader our reach of observation and the more extended are our efforts and sympathies, the richer we shall be in heart and the more useful in life.

I once read an old fable of a wall that had become so weakened by age that a portion of it between two gardens one day fell down, with the result that the sun was able to pour more light into the garden on either side, so that the flowers made better growth and became more beautiful, and the perfume sweeter. "What a pity that piece of old wall had not fallen down before," said the flowers. Next, the shrubs looked over to one another, and beginning a friendly conversation they said, "What a good thing that the piece of old wall fell down; it is a pity it stood so long." Then the flowers and shrubs of each garden discovered members of their own families living on the other side, who had long been really near each other and had never had any communion because of the wall between. And finally so many benefits resulted from the occurrence that instead of a rebuilding of the part that had fallen, the remainder of the wall was pulled down to the ground; so that air and sunshine and fragrance passed from garden to garden, and near neighbors enjoyed a free friendship. So, perish forever the partisan walls that separate Christian people! "For he is our peace, who hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us." "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

*An address read before the recent Bible-school and Endeavor convention at Mexico, Mo.

THOUGHTS ON APPLIED CHRISTIANITY.

COLLATED BY FRANK G. TYRRELL.

GEO. D. HERRON:—"The Americans are not a democratic people. We do not select the representatives we elect. We do not govern ourselves. We do not make our own laws. Our political parties are controlled by private, close corporations that exist as parasites, giving us the most corrupting and humiliating despotisms in political history. Our legislation is determined by a vast system of lobby. The people know, though they cannot prove, that our legislative methods have become the organization of indirect bribery and corruption."

ELTWEED POMEROY, President National Direct Legislation League:—"No people can be self-governed who are denied the right to vote yes or no on every law by which they are to be governed. This is direct legislation by the initiative and referendum. By the referendum, a suitable minority of the people, say five per cent., can call for the reference of any law passed by the law-making body, to the vote of the people. By the initiative, the same suitable minority can propose any law which after discussion both in the legislative body and before the people, goes to a poll of the people. This carries into law-making the principle of brotherhood and equality. Also it carries out Christ's method by allowing the people to choose which they will take after it has been clearly stated."

DE TOCQUEVILLE:—"I know no country in which there is so little true independence of mind and freedom of discussion as in America."

FRANK B. COWGILL:—"The socialistic movement is here to stay. The socialistic element in society is partly Christian, partly infidel. The existing industrial system has its infelicities and injustices, so appalling as to produce increasing dissatisfaction. Socialism will grow if the miserable multitude who are pushed by the competitve system into dependence and penury increases. This multitude will increase unless herculean efforts are made by the church to improve the moral character and material condition of the unsuccessful classes. The church must get down to business in this matter as she never has before."

PROF. EDWIN MARKHAM:—"I prophesy the coming of the Social Man. There is to be a new springtime of the human race and a new blossoming of the large and heroic virtues in man. Some day good government will no longer be an irridescent dream. The Social Man will be the divine flower of the ages. He will be a man born from above, a man worthy of immortality. In all his acts he will consider the universal good, will consider not only those on earth, but also the myriads that are coming in the future."

FREDERIC HARRISON:—"Our present type of society is, in many respects, one of the most horrible that has ever existed in the world's history—boundless luxury and self-indulgence at one end of the scale, and at the other a condition of life as cruel as that of a Roman slave, and more degraded than that of a South Sea Islander."

Some idea of of the growth and power of street railway corporations in the United States may be had from the following statistics furnished by The Street Railway Journal, Supplement. It appears that there are no less than twenty-six properties earning $1,000,000 or more; nineteen earning from $500,000 to $1,000,000; forty-six earning from $100,000 to $500,000. Eighty-four properties earning less than $100,000 are included in the comparison. The largest receipts for the year 1897 were taken by the Union Traction Company, of Philadelphia, namely, $10,480,646. The Manhattan Elevated Railway Company, of New York, comes in second with $9,477,052; the Metropolitian, of the same city, third with $9,436,333. West End Railway Co., of Boston, is fourth with $8,719,032. Of the the 175 roads figured, the Dunkirk (N. Y.) and Fredonia Railway Company is the last on the list, with receipts $26,123. One can readily understand from these figures why there is such a grasping for municipal street railway charters and why they become such a factor in local politics and municipal corruption.

A bill has been passed in Congress, known as the Phillips Bill, authorizing the appointment of a non-partisan commission to collect information and to consider and recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor and immigration, agriculture and capital. This commission is to be known as the "Industrial Commission," and is to be composed as follows: "Five members of the Senate, to be appointed by the presiding officer thereof; five members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, and nine other persons, who shall fairly represent the different industries and employments, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The term of the commission is to be two years. Section 3 of this bill provides that the commission "shall furnish such information and suggest such laws as may be made a basis for uniform legislation by the various states of the Union, in order to harmonize conflicting interests and to be equitable to the laborer, the employer, the producer and the consumer." This seems to us a most sensible method of procedure, and we congratulate Hon. Mr. Phillips, of Pennsylvania, who is understood to be the instigator of the bill, and who is likely to be the chairman of the commission, on the character of the measure. Why not treat the problems presented by the liquor traffic in the same way?

The Religious World.

The German Lutheran Conference, comprising their churches in Southern Indiana, Illinois, Ohio and Kentucky, in session at Terre Haute, Ind., adjourned July 8th. Their next conference will be held at Columbia, Ind.

At the National Council of Congregationalists, in session at Portland, Ore., last week, it was ordered that the committee on union with other denominations and the denominational committee be united and continued.

D. L. Moody's 16th General Bible Conference will be held at Northfield, Mass., July 29th to August 18th.

Cardinal Gibbons prepared a circular to be read in the Roman Catholic Churches last Sunday morning, which is intended to carry out the suggestion made by President McKinley, that the people of the land unite in giving thanks for the victory of the American fleet off Santiago. The Cardinal's letter calls upon the people to return thanks to Almighty God for his blessing upon the arms of this land in the conflict with the Spanish fleet and for the victory achieved and for the escape of the Americans with comparatively no loss.

The Congregationalists have made great advance in their ministerial relief work in recent years. From August 1, 1895, to April 30, 1398, they report a total collection for this fund of $51,314.50.

The centennial celebration of the origin of Ohio Methodism, held in Delaware, O., opened June 21st and closed on the 24th.

The following interesting figures on secret societies are given in the report of the committee thereon to the National Congregational Council at Portland, Ore.: "The growth of secret and social orders during the past ten years has been rapid, both in the multiplication of societies and in members, the total annual increase in membership being rated at 250,000. In 1895 the expenditures in benefit gifts and claims reached the sum of $640,000,000, while in transportation, fees, banquets, testimonials, regalia and convention expenses $250,000,000 more were spent. To these items the approxmate sum of $42,000,000 was added for the rental of buildings and halls for lodge purposes, thus making a total of $941,000,000 expended in a single year by the secret societies of the United States." The position taken by the council on this report was that "the attitude of the Christian Church toward these multitudinous secret orders should be courteous and Christian, for the church cannot afford to occupy a position of prejudice or unreasonable hostility upon any question of public opinion or social habit, for such a temper at once sacrifices both the spirit and the power of the Christian faith."

OPEN-AIR WORKERS IN ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

A largely attended conference of the Open-air Workers' Association of America, was held in Boston, June 27th.

C. N. Hunt, of Minneapolis, represented the Young People's Societies. He said that young people with their winning, bright testimonies, are needed in open-air meetings. They have the best training for such work. Young people's meetings are not an end in themselves, but a means to equip workers for service outside the church.

Rev. J. A. McElwain reported the meetings he held on the steps of the late Dr. A. J. Gordon's church, where audiences of four hundred gathered on pleasant evenings. They began with a fifteen-minute song service, followed by a brief sermon and three-minute testimonies. At the close of each service a large number followed the workers into the church where, in an after-meeting, as many as six or eight would frequently seek the Lord. Similar meetings on church steps are practicable for all localities.

Dr. Alexander Blackburn, of Cambridge, recommended outdoor preaching to pastors as beneficial to their health; as giving them an opportunity to study the people, and as a school of criticism for their "fine" compositions. He said that men on the streets demand sermons on fundamental doctrines, and pastors, whose lifelong training has been in this line, should supply the demand.

Henry Varley, of Australia, advocated preaching in the market places in conformity with the example of Christ and the apostles. It cannot be denied that the working people do not care much for the churches, and the churches should overcome this barrier by going to the people.

EVANGELISTIC ASSOCIATION OF NEW ENGLAND.

7 Tremont Place, Boston.

Cotner University.

To those interested in this institution it will be of interest to know that an advance movement is being made to redeem it from debt. In addition to the successful conduct of the school during the past two years, no debt has been incurred and the redemption fund slowly increased.

Bro. J. W. Hilton has now been employed to devote his entire time to this work. He is a graduate of the institution, has a business experience and is an able preacher. Brethren, receive him and aid him in every way possible. Let this be Cotner's "Jubilee Year."

W. P. AYLSWORTH.

Our Budget.

—"The best Christian service is hand-made."

—"Men need all the love, sympathy and help you can give them."

—"Human nature is not perfect, but it is the noblest thing we have here on this earth."

—"We never need to make pilgrimages to find our religious opportunities."

—"The Jericho road that we travel in our busy city life is just lined with cases that appeal to us for help."

—The above sentences are from Chas. R. Brown's new book on the two parables.

—The gate of heaven will be wide or narrow for us according to our usefulness in this life.

—The model prayer of the Christian says "give us," etc., the model prayer of the world-man says "give me," etc. This was the prayer of the prodigal son.

—The Bible-school, Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa, offering for Foreign Missions this year was $741. The banner class offering was $150. The second largest class offering was $141 and the third $127. Surely, this is splendid giving.

—A happy event in the history of the church at Steubenville, Ohio, was the laying of the corner-stone of their new house of worship, of which an account appeared at length in the Daily News of that city, July 9th. The services were participated in by other pastors of the city and were particularly enjoyable. All rejoiced together in the work. The pastor, J. G. Slaytor, was master of ceremonies.

—"Go" is the title of the bi-monthly paper started by M. L. Hoblit, the C. W. B. M. missionary at Monterey, N. L., Mexico, a copy of the first number of which is just to hand. As it contains much information about that country and people it would not be a bad idea for all who can to subscribe for it and learn about Mexico and also help to sustain the mission thereby. Ten copies to one address for a year may be had for $2.00.

—The Stars and Stripes raised in the Philippine Islands will be like the coming out of the sunlight through rifted clouds. It means the overthrow of priestcraft and the dawn of religious liberty to its benighted souls.

—The offerings for Foreign Missions received at Cincinnati for the first seven days of July amounted to $3,972.20, being a gain of $1,092.28 over same time last year. Also a gain of 64 contributing schools. This year, thus far, 317 schools have sent in an offering.

—The program of the Illinois C. W. B. M. and Illinois Christian Missionary Convention, to be held at Eureka, during the encampment, Aug. 1-7, just to hand as we are getting ready for the press, will appear next week.

—We devote an unusual amount of space to our correspondents this week and still have interesting letters which have to await another issue. Good letters and lots of church news are prominent features of this paper.

—Aside from its budget of news the Iowa Letter, this week, is somewhat critical, but for admonitional purposes. The Iowa Secretary is rather severe with his Mormon friends in Iowa, but we presume that he knows whereof he speaks. He is not alone in his convictions of deception in Mormon teachings and teachers, and there are many evidences that D. H. Bays and his book, "Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism," published by the Christian Publishing Co., are giving them no little trouble.

—The reference to Church Quarrels and their remedy in the Minnesota Letter, by the Minnesota Secretary, will be read and appreciated by other secretaries and our pastors in general as a timely discourse upon a shameful, yet far too frequent an occurrence in the religious world. What Bro. Mellen says upon the subject is worthy of serious attention. First, everything possible should be done to keep quarrels out of the church; and second, when they become "church quarrels" speedy steps to dissipate them should be taken by the entire church.

—If there is anything you want to know about the Bethany C. E. Reading Course, read the catechism on that subject by J. Z. Tyler in this paper. It is time now to prepare for the second reading course, to begin October first.

—You may not like the methods of the commanding officers of our army and navy, but they have accomplished that whereunto they were sent, and that is all that our country asked at their hands. It is results that count; methods are of importance only as they are effective. Even a defective method that wins is better than an ornamental one that accomplishes nothing.

—The pleasant personal remarks with which English Topics opens up this week are in striking contrast with the more stately beginnings of former "Topics," and most agreeable to us, save the excitement of our sympathy for one who longs to share the joys of a retreat from summer heat, but cannot for the want of a "lakeside paradise" within safe rapid traveling distance. The reference to England's new theological difficulty and to the row about ritualism, however, are serious enough, hinting as they do at the great undercurrents of English life and their consequent present and future problems, both of church and of state.

—The article in this paper on "Our Duty to Our Religious Neighbors" was prepared by Mrs. Clinton Lockhart and read by her before the Missouri Bible-school Convention, at Mexico, Mo., in June last. The article treats of an exceedingly practical question, after a most lucid and vigorous fashion. It strikes at the root of one of the great barriers to a better fellowship of professed Christians and should be read with prayerful attention.

—The story in our Family Circle, this week, by Minnie Hadley, entitled, "The Legend of Chocoma," is odd enough and interesting enough to hold the reader's attention to the end with unflagging interest.

—According to reports on the Manila and Santiago naval battles, the most effective factors of a war-fleet are not big guns nor torpedo boats, but the rapid-fire, medium-calibre ordnance. Similar observations have been made of the pulpit and of the church. The most effective church work is usually accomplished by medium mental and financial calibre, quick-acting men and women in the Lord's army.

—One of the most important recommendations brought before the National Congregational Council recently held at Portland, Oregon, was that "a representative council or conference of the Protestant churches in the United States and Canada be called, to meet in the city of Washington in May, 1900, for the purpose of organizing an international union, which shall meet at regular periods, and which shall serve as a visible expression of the unity of the churches, and as a common bond in their fellowship with each other and their service of the Lord Jesus Christ." Such a recommendation appeals at once to the better judgment of all who love the Lord more than they love their religious creeds. We trust that it may be fully realized in some agreeable, effective way.

—The Senate committee appointed to investigate the payment of the claim of the Methodist Book Concern and the payment to Maj. E. B. Stahlman of $100,800 as an agent in getting the claim through, finds that the Senate was deceived by the representations of Mr. Stahlman and Messrs. Barbee and Smith, the book agents, but absolves the Methodist Church South, as such, from blame in the matter. It has also found that no Senator or member of Congress received any money in connection with the claim. The testimony taken was made public. We did not expect that any blame would fall upon the church as such in this matter, and while it cannot be held responsible for the action of each of its members or implicated officials it will be compelled to deal with them according to righteous demands, that it may be exonerated before the world and become a terror to evil-doers.

—One of the underlying incidents of the historic victory of the American navy on the third of July near the harbor of Santiago is the reverent confession of faith in God made by the coptain of the Texas. It is said that when the battle was over and the exultant American crews were cheering themselves hoarse for joy, Capt. John W. Philip, of the Texas, called his men to deck, and with bared head said to them: "I want to make public acknowledgment here that I believe in God the Father Almigty. I want you, officers and men, to lift your hats, and from your hearts offer silent thanks to the Almighty." The comment on this incident by John R. Spear, author of "History of our Navy" is also worthy of being repeated here. He said: "Look on the picture of the drunken Spaniards of the Cristobal Colon and then on that of a typical American naval seaman and his crew. His crew to a man removed their hats, for a moment turned grateful thoughts to the mystery of the God of battles, and then impulsively broke into the heartiest cheers for the one who, like another typical seaman,

'Feared his foes not at all, but his God a great deal.'"

—E. J. Fenstermacher, 319 Monmouth St., Newport, Ky., wishes to inform our readers that in view of the many sick soldiers who are arriving at the Ft. Thomas Hospital, near Newport, Ky., he will be glad to hear from any who may have relatives or friends among them and will render what assistance he can in communicating with their sick, or for the soldiers in words to the homefolk. There are those no doubt who will appreciate this kindness of Bro. Fenstermacher.

—The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST lifts its hat to the Christian Courier for the following pleasing compliment:

The Courier has said that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is nearer than any other paper known to us to our idea of a model Christian paper. One of its chief excellencies is that it is progressive—not afraid of improvement—and its latest step forward is a change to a thirty-two page form, a new dress and heading, a new arrangement of contents and a decidedly more attractive appearance generally. The office editor has wisely given us on the front page of the first number in the new form a good picture of J. H. Garrison, the editor. We are glad to note these additional evidences of enterprise, good taste and prosperity. We trust that some day the Christian Courier may be as good a paper as the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

There is a lot of room at the front or even at either side of us, my brother, and you are getting under good headway. So do not become weary in well-doing, but press on toward the high mark you have set for your attainment in the career of religious journalism. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST bids you Godspeed in your high aims, good work and future outlook, while we ourselves groan within ourselves for still higher attainments.

—It has been announced in our city press that J. C. Creel, editor of the Church Register, Plattsburg, Mo., has sold out his interest therein to his partners, G. A. Hoffmann and R. L. Wilson, and that the plant will be taken to Kansas City, Mo., united with two or three other church papers and renamed The Christian Register. It is said that a new company will be organized to publish this paper, make it a weekly, and will start with a subscription list of about six thousand. We hope the promoters of this enterprise may succeed abundantly in all their efforts to promote the cause of primitive Christianity in Missouri and elsewhere.

—Benj. L. Smith, corresponding secretary Home Missions, Cincinnati, Ohio, reports the offerings for Home Missions for the week ending July 16th at $723.22. Nineteen new churches contributed, but there was a loss for the week of $530.45 over same week last year. We hope the gain this week, however, will compensate this loss or more.

—In a letter from D. L. Moody, East Northfield, Mass., expressing appreciation for our report of work among the soldiers at Chickamauga and other camps, he says: "Without such co-operation on the part of the religious press the work would be very difficult." Our readers will find another letter from Mr. Moody in this paper on this work.

—The debate between Bro. Briney, of Moberly, Mo., and Elder Throgmorton, of Du Quoin, Ill., begins at Allen Springs, Ill., July 27th. Those who can attend will find abundant intellectual entertainment and profit.

—The Christian Orphans' Home Board, of this city, requests us to say that they would like to find good Christian homes for boys from one month to eleven years old. Also for a boy of fourteen years, who is mechanically inclined and would like a home with some engineer or builder. They state that they have a nice lot of boys for whom homes are wanted. Address Christian Orphans' Home, 915 Aubert Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

—In a letter from Jacksonville, Florida, in this paper, T. H. Blenus tells us of the religious work done in behalf of the thousands of soldiers encamped there. The interest taken in religious exercises by the soldiers is particularly gratifying. We are thankful to Bro. Blenus for this information and for the evidences of progress in the church at Jacksonville.

—While we appreciate the compliment paid to us in the Pittsburg Letter, this week, we also more deeply feel the burden of the increased responsibilities now upon us because of our efforts to give our readers what they and the cause for which they stand rightly deserve—a religious journal second to none in the land. But kind words next to a growing subscription list are a most helpful and appreciated tonic. We thank the Pittsburg Letter and a host of others for their kind words to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

—The excellent article in this paper on "Church Finance," by Albert Schwartz, appears in its revised form from that of its reading at Shenandoah, Iowa. This will explain any differences that may appear to those who heard it there. The paper was prepard during the sickness of Sister Schwartz, who died since the convention at Shenandoah, and Bro. Schwartz felt that he had not said just what he wanted to say and as it ought to be said on the subject, and hence its revision. The paper was highly appreciated by the convention and requested that it be published in tract form for general use. It will make a splendid tract on that subject and worthy of wide use in all the churches.

—The excellent paper on "Ministerial Courtesy," by Geo. L. Peters, of Girard, Ill., which appeared in our issue last week, was read before the Illinois Ministerial Association, at Normal, April 14th, 1898. We had not this data at hand when the article went to press.

—We publish this week an appeal from the church at Malden, Mo., to help to replace their house of worship, which was totally destroyed by lightning, July 8th. As it is customary to divide with the unfortunate—even sinners do this—we trust that this appeal will not go unheeded.

—The Kansas City Letter this week deals with the victories, results and lessons of our war with Spain. The presentation of the thought of a right attitude toward God as an explanation of our wonderful victories is worthy of particular consideration.

—The poem in our Family Circle, this week, by Cornelia P. Bozman, of Cairo, Ill., under the title, "Hear Ye Him," is full of uplifting spirituality.

—The racy letter, "Wheeling Through England," from Dr. W. E. Garrison, in this paper, will be enjoyed by our readers. His easy style, pleasantries and observations make this letter one of unusual interest.

—Honolulu pays a high tribute to the moral conduct of the two thousand soldiers from California and Oregon turned loose upon its streets for ten hours. It is said that "not a trace of disorder was observed in them throughout the day."

—Particular attention is desired to the article in this paper on "A Union Meeting," by T. W. McDonald, at Des Moines, Ia. Interested parties are requested to save this paper or the article for further use and future reference.

—There is probably more reading-matter in this paper than was ever given to our readers in any other number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in its history. Aside from the use of smaller type than in our old form there are four more pages to this number which we have used for literature instead of advertisements. And another thing worthy of mention is that the paper is printed on our New Double Cylinder Huber Perfecting Press. This press is of the most improved modern type and weighs seventeen tons. The paper is folded and covered in our new folding machine of which mention has been made. But this is the first paper from our new press, and it comes to you loaded to the guards with intellectual food, news and pleasantries.

—The Illinois Christian Missionary Convention convenes at Eureka, August 3rd, and will occupy two days of Eureka Encampment which is from August 1st to 7th. Among the notable speakers secured to delight and edify the audiences of the convention the name of Booker T. Washington, now of national fame, is announced.

—Now that the first year of the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses has closed, testimonies of the most gratifying character have been pouring in upon the managers from all parts of the country, as to its value as an educational factor. The Bethany C. E. Bulletin for July devotes several pages to these enthusiastic endorsements of the work.

—Bro. J. M. Crocker, who for sometime has been chaplain of the State Penitentiary of Iowa, has become a Missourian, as will be seen from the following note. We hope our Missouri brethren may appreciate his true worth and treat him so well that he may remain a willing captive:

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—I am a stranger in a strange land. And I was attracted here by the high altitude and conditions favorable to physical vigor. For fourteen weeks I have clambered up and down the rock-ribbed hills of the Ozarks, breathed the pure air that whispers to the giant forests, and listened to the song of the mockingbird. Truly this is a land of fruit and flowers, sunshine and the song of birds, a delightful spot to recuperate jaded energies. And six long years' preaching to the spirits in prison with all the strain and tension upon the vital forces, is now a thing of the past, in point of fact and effect. Thank you—I am well. But all my life has been spent in Iowa except two years in Kansas. Of course Iowa seems like home to me, and I plead guilty to some symptoms of homesickness. I hope to get better acquainted with my Missouri brethren. I would like some work in this part of the state, if it could be had. We have bought a little home near Seymour, and would like to stay in Missouri at least for awhile.

Sincerely yours,
J. M. CROCKER.

Seymour, Mo.

It gives us pleasure to introduce Bro. Crocker to the Missouri brethren, as a minister worthy of their confidence and esteem, and one whose ability as a preacher could be utilized to the great benefit of churches in the state in which he resides.

A MISSIONARY'S WIFE

Interesting Letter from India—A Long Summer Season.

The following letter is from the wife of an American Baptist missionary at Nowgong, Assam, India: "After living here for several years I found the climate was weakening me. I began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla every summer. This I found so beneficial that I now take one dose every morning for nine months in the year, that is, through the hot weather. My general health is excellent and my blood is in good condition. My weight does not vary more than one pound throughout the year. I find Hood's Sarsaparilla indispensable in the summer and recommend it for use in a debilitating climate." MRS. P. H. MOORE.

The above letter is similar to thousands received and constantly coming in.

Hood's Pills cure nausea, indigestion, biliousness. Price 25c.

—The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST ackowledges the kindness of a complimentary ticket to the Fountain Park Assembly, at Remington, Ind., Aug. 11-22. The accompanying program is one of the most promising along literary and social lines that we have yet seen for a pleasant and profitable summer retreat.

—The Spaniards were much more concerned about their honor in the surrender of Santiago than they were in the sailing of Camara's fleet through the Suez Canal and back again.

—The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST this week expresses its appreciation of the great victory at Santiago without further loss of life in battle by presenting to its readers the picture of General Shafter.

—The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST came to our table last week changed in form from a sixteen to a thirty-two page journal, and otherwise greatly improved in appearance. We congratulate Bro. Garrison, the editor, and the Christian Publishing Co. in view of the manifest progress that has been made from year to year in the management and conduct of this superb religious journal. The first page contains a fine likeness of the editor.

Thanks to the Christian Oracle for the above words of good-cheer and hearty appreciation of our efforts to reach the highest possible attainment of usefulness in religious journalism.

—America's war with Spain will go into history with the evidences of divine help strongly on the American side. The marvelous escape of our ships from Spanish torpedoes and Spanish guns, the remarkable escape from injury of the American fleet in the greatest naval battles of history, the capitulation of Santiago, the miraculous escape of Hobson and his men from death in Santiago Harbor, the inability of the Spaniards to sink or even to disable one of our warships, and the utter destruction of their own fleets at Manila and at Santiago are certainly things of such moment as to cause the impression that God is indeed with us. And when we hear the captain of a warship saying, as is reported of "Bob Evans," of the Iowa, "Almighty God and our gunners did it;" and as said Captain John Philip, of the Texas, before his men, "I want to make public acknowledgment here that I believe in God the Father Almighty. I want all you officers and men to lift your hats and from your hearts offer silent thanks to the Almighty," we feel like going even further and saying, God was in these men, using them for the removal of great obstacles of progress. The prevalence of the religious spirit in the army and the navy has been remarkable from the first in this war. Not the sectarian spirit, but the wholesome acknowledgment of an overruling Providence in the affairs of men and of nations.

John Munro and family of Portage la Prairie, Man., have returned to their work after a prolonged visit in the East.

PERSONAL MENTION.

C. L. Pickett has changed his field of labor from Harlan to Woodbine, Iowa, and reports work starting off encouragingly in his new field. He delivered the Fourth-of-July address at Manilla, Iowa.

G. C. Audrey has returned from his vacation at Stafford to his work at Burrton, Kansas, where he has been preaching acceptably for two years.

J. S. Myers, pastor of the church at Sedalia, Mo., has received a call to the pastorate of the Twelfth Street Christian Church, Philadelphia, Pa.

Ammi Fike, of Newton, Kan., has been retained to preach at Moundrige another year.

B. J. Wharton, Marshall, Mo., preached at First Christian Church, this city, last Lord's day morning.

T. W. Grafton, pastor of the Christian Church at Rock Island, Ill., and his wife are passing the month of July at Oskaloosa, Ia.

John R. Wright, pastor of the church at Hot Springs, Ark., has resigned and become a chaplain in the army. His first station will be at Chickamauga Park. His address will be Co. M., First Ark., Vol. Inf.

J. W. Baker, who recently went from Minisila to Galvin, Ohio, reports the work in his new field in a prosperous state. Galvin is a city of 9,000 souls.

E. N. Kellar delivered the postgraduate address at Add-Ran University this year. He is a graduate of Drake University, and took a two years' course under J. W. Lowber for A. M. at Add-Ran.

F. L. Davis, of Dows, Ia., reports work about to begin on their new $2,000 house of worship, and church work prospering. He asks for your prayers in behalf of the work at Dows.

F. G. Tyrrell, pastor Central Christian Church, this city, left for Macatawa, Mich., where he joins his family for their summer's rest.

J. J. Lockhart, Chancellor of Christian University, Canton, Mo., preached for the First Christian Church, of Sedalia, Mo., during the pastor's absence in the East in June.

J. K. Speer says that the annual sermon before the high school graduating class at Clinton, Mo., by J. S. Myers, of Sedalia, Mo., was the "ablest sermon of the kind ever heard" in that city.

Vernon J. Rose, of Kansas, will address the church at Blandinsville, Ill., on the Church Extension work, Sunday morning, July 31, and the church at La Harpe, Ill., on the evening of the same date.

C. E. Smith, pastor of the church at Pine Flats, Pa., has been called by the church to retain that relation indefinitely. He will preach part time for the church at Gipsy, same county.

Z. T. Sweeney's address at the Endeavor Convention at Nashville on "The Royalty of Service," is denominated one of the best of the convention, by the Evening Republican, Columbus, Ind.

The Christian Oracle this week announces the marriage of F. M. Rains, treasurer of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, Cincinnati, O., recently, to a young lady who has been an assistant in the foreign office at Cincinnati for two years, but whose first name the Oracle had not yet learned. We join the Oracle in congratulations to Bro. Rains and his wife.

J. M. Austin preached at Havinsville, Kan., last Sunday. This was the home of W. H. Black, who recently departed this life for his heavenly home.

M. A. Carleton, formerly of Lincoln, Neb., but now of Perkins, Oklahoma, writes that he has been commissioned to travel in Russia for the Department of Agriculture of the United States, to investigate and gather seed of rust-resistant wheat varieties.

A. F. Harrall and wife, of Shawnee, Oklahoma, called at this office on last Tuesday on their way to his father's, near Ironton, Mo., where they will spend the next six weeks. During this time Bro. Harrall expects to do evangelistic work in that part of Missouri, after which they will go to some point in Texas for their future field of labor.

J. H. Fuller, pastor of the church at Newport, Ark., preached for the Compton Heights church, this city, last Lord's day. We learn that the visit was enjoyed by both the church and the visiting preacher. There was one confession.

J. N. Jessup, pastor of the church at Vincennes, Ind., has received and accepted a call to become pastor of the church at Little Rock, Ark., for a term of two years. This call was made on evidence of good work done and not on a "trial sermon." The preacher and congregation never saw one another. He will begin work there in October. He has had a pleasant work of four years at Vincennes, Ind.

Prof. W. E. Hackleman and Miss Pearl Perrine are on the program of the Fountain Park Assembly, at Remington, Ind., August 11 to 22, 1898. Of the preachers announced we mention the names of T. J. Legg, John L. Brandt, J. E. Pounds and L. L. Carpenter, all of Indiana, and J. H. Hardin, President of Eureka College.

Robt. Stewart has resigned his work at Grassy Creek Church, Pendleton county, Ky. In his ministry of eighteen months there he has held three successful protracted meetings. The last one just concluded resulted in 64 additions. The appreciation of the church for his services was shown by a gift of $12 cash and a beautiful Bible. E. S. Baker, of the Bible Collage, Lexington, Ky., assisted in the last meeting at Grassy Creek.

M. L. Hoblit, our C. W. B. M. missionary at Monterey, N. L., Mexico, has translated the tract on "The Disciples of Christ," by the editor of this paper, into their native tongue for use in his mission field. He is also publishing a little paper called Go, which he uses to create interest in the work. These he says are the first fruits of his new press. Bro. Hoblit keeps a public reading-room at his Mexican mission station and seems to be quite hopeful of good results in his Mexican field.

Frank L. Bowen and Sister Boen, of Kansas City, Mo., were sent to Nashville, Tenn., as delegates to the Christian Endeavor Convention for all of the Christian Endenvor Societies of Kansas City, Mo. This was a fine compliment to Bro. Bowen's work as an evangelist in that city, of which he makes good report in this paper.

The press of last week announced that J. S. Myers had accepted the call from the 12th Street Christian Church, at Philadelphia, and consequently has resigned his work at Sedalia, the resignation to take effect Aug. 31st. When Bro. Myers entered upon his pastorate at Sedalia the membership of the church was 425. Now it is over 1,100. The Sunday-school then had an enrollment of 200; now it has 700. Since he assumed charge a handsome $40,000 church building has been erected, and there is not a dollar's indebtedness upon it. A Second Christian Church has also grown out of his congregation. We hope to hear of an equally successful work under his skillful executive ability and able pulpit and pastoral work at Philadelphia.

Joel Brown, of Iowa, who has been appointed by the Christian Orphan's Home Board as their solicitor for Illinois, Indiana and Ohio, called at this office last week on his way to his new work and new field of labor.

W. S. Payne, of Princeton, Ky., sends us the following letter which speaks for itself: "At our union service last Lord's day, J. L. Hill pastor of the Cumberland Presbyterian church preached on Christian Union to a large audience. In the sermon he denounced creeds and denominationalism. Finally. after fully expressing his views declared his purpose to forsake the church of his father and kindred and henceforth to be known only as a Disciple of Christ and will this week be baptized and enter the Christian ministry unfettered by creeds. I have known Bro. Hill for six months, and he is very popular here with all classes. His congregations are the largest and his salary the best of any minister's in the city. He gives these up to begin again, as it were, the ministry of a freer life. He is a graduate of Lebanon University and has been preaching about ten years. Bros. Gordon and Glover, whom I know personally, both having preached here, have lately left the Cumberland church and united with us, and now that Bro. Hill has taken the decisive step it has caused no little notice. My knowledge of the Cumberland Presbyterian brethren is most fraternal, and I have known them in many relations and admire very much their deep spirituality and earnest Christian devotion. Bro. Hill will now doubtless do some work as an evangelist until he locates in some field more permanently as a pastor."

The Reader's Delight.

We are pleased with the way our new form is being received and think it but just to give the public a few of the many expressions of delightful appreciation which we are daily receiving from our readers. Here are some of them:

"You had, I thought, you have, I am sure, the best paper published by the Disciples of Christ." GEO. MUNRO.
New Cumberland, W. Va.

"The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST's new costume is handsome. You deserve the congratulations of the brotherhood. It will stand comparison with any religious paper I have ever seen." B. S. FERRALL.
Watseka, Ill.

"I call attention to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST with great friendly pride. It is a great paper." J. FRAISE RICHARDS.
Washington, D. C.

"Permit me to write you a word of congratulation over the marked improvement made in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Manifestly it is seeking the highest degree of perfection in religious journalism. It commends itself to the appreciation of every intelligent reader of its columns." L. H. STINE.
Paris, Mo.

"You have accomplished a splendid improvement. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be found in the front rank of the best papers." J. B. CRANE.
Waynesboro, Va.

"You look well in your new dress. The contents of the last number were especially good." CHAS. M. SHARPE.
Lawrence, Kans.

"I want to compliment you on the new dress of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. It is certainly, to my notion, the best paper in our brotherhood. I hope it will experience a large increase in circulation." F. L. DAVIS.
Dows, Ia.

"I cannot withold my congratulations on the new and improved form in which the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST appears this week. The mechanical execution is second to none. As to the spirit and tone, these are acknowledged. May your subscription list keep pace with your improved appearance." A. L. ORCUTT.
Indianapolis, Ind.

The italics in the last two quotations are ours. Improvements must have substantial encouragement, such as our present readers may readily and easily render by securing new subscribers among their friends and acquaintances. See our special offer of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the six months beginning July 1, 1898, and closing December 31, 1898, for seventy-five cents. Samples for distribution, if you are willing to try.

SUMMER HAS COME.

For some weeks past, Bro. Garrison, I have noticed in your ever-interesting editorial arm-chair lucubrations, strong symptoms of the annual attack of Macatawa, which never fails to come over you. We have no such lakeside paradise here to which to transfer the editoral office of the Christian Commonwealth, and therefore we are obliged to be content with occasional runs to any accessible resort, such as Margate or Brighton, or else stay in London, watching the beginning of the exodus of other people. It is pleasant to hear of the architectural and constructive enterprise of my never-to-be-forgotten and dearly-beloved friend, J. J. Haley. That masterly builder of great sermons is, I perceive, designing himself a holiday nest by that lovely lake, the descriptions of which from your own pen every summer makes such romantic reading. If flying-machines already made could only be pursuaded to fly, then I would take passage and alight on that pretty shore and enjoy fellowship with you in your retreat. Ever since the old Roman days, when Ciscero wrote those delicious letters to Atticus, telling of the feast of fellowship "in Tusculano meo" (meaning "in my villa at Tusculum," where Lucullus, Horace and other friends who were cultured in all but the gospel, which had not yet shown out), it has been the delight of men given to processess of thought often to retire from the crowded haunts of life's business. Well, there is one thing which many Americans have discovered. They have found out that in summer this whole island called Great Britain is just one paradise of simplest, sweetest beauty. Going last week to Cheltenham to preach and lecture, and returning yesterday, I more than ever admired the stretch of country of 110 miles, chiefly through the valley of the Thames. The whole ride is through one lovely park. As the years roll on, this country will become the world's chief playground. It is never hot and never cold here. In traveling in Europe I have met intelligent and cultured people who never saw England, and who are fully persuaded that we never see a sunbeam in this country, that all England lies steeped in an eternal fog, and we never take a walk except with the umbrella hoisted. It is perfectly true that our climate is fickle and uncertain, and that it does not so much consist of actual weather as of "samples of weather" of all sorts, as I heard a genial American visitor say. Some of the "samples" are not as agreeable as others, but they are all mild, transient and easily forgotten when the soft English spring and summer recur. Just now the early morning, with its elongated dawning, and the late evenings, with their protracted and delicious twilight, are almost heavenly. There is no country in the world in which work is so easy. Nowhere can the toiler work so many days in the year and so many hours in the day in perfect comfort. If in ages yet remote Britain should be commercially played out, if she should lose her great position as a nation, if her decline should follow in the course of history, then she will perhaps be loved and cherished more than in the days of her wealth and power, for then England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland, the Isle of Man, the Scilly Isles, the Channel Islands, the Hebrides, the Shetlands, the Orkneys, and all the islets that make up the group known as the British Isles, may be known as the choicest gardens of the world—the lovely and romantic Hesperides of the modern earth. And the day is at hand when these island realms will seem to Americans to belong to America rather than to Europe. For we English people are every year more and more losing touch with Europe and contracting close affinity with America.

OUR NEW THEOLOGICAL DIFFICTLTY.

Our new religious trouble is the same as the old one. It is ever recurring in some fresh phase. A bill has just passed through the House of Commons called the "Church Benefices Bill." To the American mind it may not seem at first sight as if such a measure could be of great importance. But life in England has been for a thousand years complicated by the appalling problem of a state church. The politics of our country are at this moment plunged into a perfect quagmire by the priests. The government, pushed on against its will by the bishops, has been trying its hand at a pretended reform. Now, the Benefices Bill is to give double power to the bishops over the clergy. It is intended that in future the bishops shall have the option of refusing to induct any clergyman to a parish living if they see reason in his character or conduct for rejecting him. But this bill in one of its clauses perpetuates one of the grossest abuses still existing in the Anglican Church. It forbids the sale of next presentations, but it permits the sale of advowsons. Now, the people, the church itself, who wants to see it reformed, are specially anxious to get rid of the abominable sale of livings, called the purchase of advowsons. It is a very common thing for a parish living to be sold at the auction mart at Tokenhouse yard, where the same auctioneer who has been selling horses, sheep, cattle and houses, then proceeds to crack up a parish in a lively speech, just as he does the sheep and the pigs, and after the competition has proceeded a certain time, at a tap of the hammer the parishioners are sold to the highest bidder precisely like animals. Often the sale is arranged of the next presentation; that is to say, while the minister of a parish is yet alive, the living is put up for sale in advance, the auctioneer in most unblushing manner descants on the probability of the poor incumbent not living much longer. Then the bids go up, till the next presentation is knocked down to the highest bidder. Now, the Benefices Bill has put a stop to this last abuse, but not to the sale of the advowsons. So in one respect the Church of England is worse than the Roman Catholic Church, for Papists glory in the fact that no such thing is permitted as the sale of livings in their communion. There has been a great fight in the British Parliament over this wretched bill, for the Liberals, under the brave leadership of Sir William Harcourt, have opposed the bill in a series of splendid speeches. Although this was in vain, for the Liberals are out of power, and the obstructive and retrogressive Tories are for the time omnipotent, yet these speeches are of immense use in enlightening the public mind.

THE GREAT ROW ABOUT RITUALISM.

All the matters I have been dwelling upon are closely related to the chief of all our present English religious troubles—the advance of Ritualism in the Church of England. A Mr. John Kensit, a well-known publisher in Paternoster Row, London, some months ago boldly stepped forward in his own parish church and publicly rebuked his clergyman for the Romish rights which had been introduced into the communion service. This led to a riot, some people trying to push Mr. Kensit out of the church, and others trying to defend him. He has been repeating his protest at several such churches, and was taken to the police court after one of these occasion, by order of the clergy. But the result is that he has gained immense sympathy, and has produced a great awakening to what is going on. The Roman mass and the confessional are now practiced in about two thousand of our Protestant churches, and the bishops have quietly allowed things to drift, many of them being themselves High Churchmen, if not incipient Romanists. Mr. Kensit has been the means of constraining the Bishop of London, Dr. Creighton, to send out a circular to his clergy. He should have done this long before, and now that he has taken this step, the circular is devoid of emphasis, and is so colorless as to give no satisfaction to anybody on any side. Mr. Kensit is now raising a fund for a very peculiar object. He is threatening to go to work to begin a Second Reformation, by sending out, two by two, what he calls "Wickliffite poor preachers." Students of the Reformation will remember that John Wickliffe, the pioneer of Protestantism, sent forth from his parish of Lutterworth in Leicestershire, in the middle of England, bands of poor preaching friars, in couples, and these scattered the truth up and down the land. Mr. Kensit means well, but he does not seem to know that there is a more excellent Reformation alread started. Perhaps we may yet enlighten him.

HANDEL HALL, CHELTENHAM.

It has been my privilege to pay another visit to our friends at Cheltenham who, by the kindness of our indefatigable brethren, J. and F. Coop, have been able at last, after long years of patient waiting, to secure a sanctuary for their own exclusive use. Ever since the cause was founded by the pioneering effort of our old e vangelist, H. S. Earl, the work has been located in the public hall known as the Corn Exchange, but recently an opportunity was afforded of purchasing on tempting terms an excellent b uilding which had been used as a musical college. Handel Hall, as it was appropriately named, is a structure capable of accommodating 500 worshipers. It is attractive in aspect, is splendidly situated in the heart of the town, has a fine series of class-rooms, is easy to speak in and is altogether what is wanted for the progress of the cause. Brother and Sister Bates, who it will be remembered came to take up this work, after long residence in Australia, are very hopeful of the influence which this new departue will exercise on the history of the church. I do not think that in all my experience I ever knew of the acquisition of a building on such advantageous terms as those involved in the purchase of this Handle Hall. There will now be a better outlook for the friends at Cheltenham.

Wheeling through England.

A rainy Sunday at sea, a rainy Monday off the north coast of Ireland, and then we land at Liverpool on a rainy Tuesday morning. The immediate outlook for cycling is not brilliant, but one of the rules already laid down is that everything is to be enjoyed. Remembering this, we comment upon the beauty of all rain and the special beauty of this particular shower. Then we go out and get wet in it. It seems rather an ominous indication of a moist climate that nearly every other shop on the first street we ascend displays waterproof goods in the windows. It seems as if half the population earned its living by keeping the other half dry. I have since learned that this is a slight overestimate of the importance of the mackintosh industry in England, but my conviction of its magnitude remains. In the course of a nine weeks' tour in any civilized land one is sure to have a variety of weather, and some of it wet. If we start with the worst the next change must be for the better. On the basis of such sage considerations as these we determined to make the start at once. Mounting our wheels early in the afternoon we rode out of Liverpool in a torrent of rain, and down the road toward Manchester. It was a delightful ride of twenty-five miles, between stone walls and hedges, and through series of Lancashire villages so closely set that one never knows whether he is really in town or country. Our wheels and ourselves were candidates for a Turkish bath, but after all it was not so bad. Our waterproof capes had served us well, and the wheels, after a good grooming, were none the worse. The start had been made, and the stop that first night was at a typical English inn.

The typical English inn is an institution singularly compounded of virtues and vices.

To begin with its virtues, it is, if it is good enough to deserve to be called typical, scrupulously clean. It is quaint, queer and cozy. Your wants are attended to promptly and respectfully, even if you order anything so extraordinary and un-English as a glass of cold water with your meals or a cup of coffee for your breakfast, the maid endeavors, though usually without success, to suppress her astonishment. Nowhere does the "local color" seem to be applied more freely than at a good inn. But the dark side of it all lies in the fact that the inn is generally a saloon as well as a hotel. Frequently the latter function becomes insignificant by the side of the former. Many inns have no provision for entertaining travelers over night, and in almost all of them the chief source of revenue is the tap-room. Here may be seen the gloomier side of English rural life, the curse of intemperance. At the same time one need not overlook the value of the inn, and especially its tap-room, as a social center and forum for the interchange of ideas. This unpleasant side of the English inn (which, by the way, is also a characteristic of the hotels of small towns in many parts of our own country and Canada) has given rise to a system of temperance hotels, always clean, quiet and respectable, but never anything but commonplace and uninteresting in themselves.

Wednesday morning we rode on into Manchester. Just how or why it happened, neither of us has been able to make out, but we were certainly the objects of more popular attention during the three hours which we spent in that city than often falls to the lot of two modest cyclists. Perhaps it was the mere fact that we were bicycle tourists, for that is something which can never be concealed; perhaps it was the fact that we had American wheels, for every one seems to recognize an American wheel at a glance; perhaps it was the color of the wheels, for my companion's was blue and mine was green (you know the Sterling color), while nearly all English wheels are black. At any rate, the people of Manchester seemed to consider the case well worthy of consideration. If we left the wheels at the curb while we entered a shop, the sidewalk and half of the street were immediately blocked by a curious crowd. If one of us staid by the wheels, they eyed him, too, as if he were a creature of supra- (or sub-) terrestial origin. Not a question was asked, not an intelligent glance directed at any part of the outfit—just a steady, stupid, brazen stare. At first I essayed to photograph the crowd gathered about the two wheels, but no sooner was the kodak unfolded than the crowd, catching sight of it, at once moved over bodily and joined in solid phalanx again about me and the camera. That put a stop to the hope of photographing the scene. Then we went into council and devised a plan to disconcert and abash our observers. The next time we stopped the crowd gathered as usual, and we were in the center of it. The crowd gazed stolidly at us, the inner circle being about at arm's length. Thereupon we leaned upon our wheels and proceeded to discuss the peculiarities of the various individuals about us, in a good, sonorous tone. The color of their hair, the cut of their clothes, the style of their boots and their various individual characteristics of physique, gesture, gait and garb were thoroughly gone over in their hearing. Some left when they saw that they were under fire. More staid, though with evident signs of embarrassment. Still more were absolutely untouched. As a means of ridding ourselves of a crowd of impertinent gazers, it had to be admitted that the scheme was a failure, and it is my conviction still that nothing less imperative than artillery would be able to disperse a crowd of Manchester gazers. It is but fair to add, in justice both to ourselves and the English people, that nowhere else has our appearance been greeted in this fashion.

From Manchester our route lay southwest through a corner of Cheshire and that portion of Derbyshire known as the Peak District. It is our first view of English hills. What else England may have in store for us we cannot tell, but if there is nothing finer than the hills and valleys of Derbyshire all our hopes will still be realized. A road like a park boulevard winds in and out, up to the hilltop, then down to the valley. Finally, after a steady climb for eight miles, followed by a swoop into the valley, a descent of five hundred feet in a mile and a half, we reach the town of Buxton, the highest town of England, and one of the chief inland watering-places. For us it is chiefly valuable as a halting-place for the night and the starting-point for the still more delightful ride through the very heart of the Peak District. Aside from the beauty of the scenery, two points stand out vividly in this day. They are our visits to Chatsworth, the home of the Duke of Devonshire, and to Haddon Hall, an uninhabited but well preserved baronial mansion of mediæval times. The description of these two noble houses is far beyond my power and scope. It is enough to say that one represents the utmost of magnificence in present-day architecture (the house is only two hundred years old), floriculture and landscape gardening, while the other carries us back five centuries to the days when every noble Englishman's house must indeed be his castle, or he would soon have no house at all. It is pertinent at this point to remark upon the generous spirit which moves the Duke of Devonshire to throw open his park, which is nine miles in circumference, his gardens, which are a piece of fairy land, and a large part of the mansion for the free inspection and amusement of the public.

Passing Derby, we leave the region of the hills and soon enter the less picturesque but more historic county of Warwick. Coventry is a singular compound of heterogeneous elements, the old and the new. One may wander for hours among its narrow, crooked streets, meeting at every turn some sight worthy of being photographed. In fact, it is a most tempting spot for the snap-shot artist. Only one of a thousand interesting objects is Ford's Hospital, an ancient monastery of the Gray Friars, in 1529 converted to more righteous uses as a home for old ladies. The building is much older, a timbered structure of quaint design, part of which dates from the fourteenth century. What can we say of Kenilworth Castle that has not already been better said? Since Scott's Kenilworth the castle has become first and foremost the scene of the royal romance of which the leading characters were Queen Elizabeth, the Earl of Leicester and Amy Robsart. The road to Warwick is full of interest, but we must hasten, for a storm is upon us. At last we are driven for shelter to the most beautiful spot on the road, the old Saxon mill, from which there is a charming view of Guy's Cliff, a baronial residence of much interest, across the Avon. Even the rain, the cyclist's most unrelenting foe, has for this once done us a good turn. But English showers, if frequent, are also short, and we are soon in Warwick. The Prince of Wales is visiting at the castle, and we cannot enter. So, we ride on, for we are to pass this way again in a day or two. We ride into Stratford-on-Avon just at dusk on Saturday night, and here we are prepared to spend the Sunday and as many more days as need be in absorbing the atmosphere of this place.

Kansas City Letter.

The few brief weeks that have elapsed since the beginning of our war with Spain have been full of surprises, not alone for the enemy, but for ourselves, and for the whole civilized world. Two such naval victories as those of Manila and Santiago are without precedent in history. Not in the fact of the sweeping defeat of Spain, but in the almost entire escape of the attacking fleets from injury to ships and men. Despite the brave and bitter struggle of the Spanish vessels, and the rain of shot and shell that fell upon the American vessels, not one of our ships was even seriously injured, and but one man killed. No wonder that brave Capt. Philip, of the Texas, after the battle of Santiago, called all hands to the quarter deck of his vessel, and with bared head thanked God for the almost bloodless victory saying, "I want to make public acknowledgement here that I believe in God, the Father Almighty. I want all you officers and men to lift your hats and from your hearts to offer silent thanks to the Almighty." The silence that followed must have been full of deep significance to the brave men, who with brows bared to the winds of heaven thus gave their recognition of the hand of God in the victory they had just achieved. Nor is it surprising that President McKinley should proclaim a national thanksgiving for the manifest providence that has attended our arms during this unhappy strife. It is but a symptom of the national feeling that we are warring on the side of right, and that our success means the enlargement of the kingdom of God among men.

But we must not press this truth of divine providence too far. To suppose that God himself directed the shells from our guns so as to make them strike the fatal spot, while he turned aside those of the enemy, and made them harmless, would be going farther than either reason or revelation would warrant us, though doubtless there are some who have about such a crude conception of the divine process. While it is not true, as Napoleon is reported to have said, that God is on the side of the strongest battalion, it is not safe for us to conclude that he will be on the side of the weaker one, even though its cause be just. There was perhaps never a war in which the right was more uniformly on one side and wrong on the other, than in the struggle of the Netherlands against Spain, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Philip II. and his successors were always in the wrong, their motives fairly Satanic, being none other than the stifling of conscience, the destroying of liberty and the burial of virtue beneath an avalanche of vice. The Protestants of the Netherlands were the most intelligent and virtuous of Philip's subjects, yet they were the objects of his cruelty during all the long years of his reign. Why was it that these intelligent and virtuous Protestants were defeated, in a majority of instances, by their superstitious and cruel enemies? Why were such awful tragedies as those at the sieges of Haarlem, Zutphen and Antwerp permitted? Why should the right be ground beneath the heel of wrong? Sometimes the superiority of force was on the side of one party, and sometimes the other. Was it because God withheld his hand from aiding his people? If so, why should we claim his assistance now? Are we better than the martyrs of the Netherlands?

The careful student of history will find a solution of such questions in the rational view of the divine providence, which takes into account not alone the readiness of God to aid his people, but the willingness of his people to receive and profit by his aid. In the historic example referred to, it is the saddest fact of all the sad history of the Netherland struggle, that the leader whom God raisee up for their deliverance, William the Silent, pleaded in vain for such co-operation among the oppressed states of the republic as would have made them invincible by the king. It was the lack of unity among the states that made them weak, and the selfishness and treachery of many of their would-be leaders helped on the cause of their oppressors.

In the present conflict with Spain we have been thus far victorious, chiefly because we have not been deaf to the voice of God in the years gone by, but have followed the path of Christian civilization, while Spain has tarried in the pathless jungle of barbarism. For this reason her feet are tangled in the toils of her own ignorance and superstition, and she is now paying the penalty of her own willful blindness. This is a contest of civilization with barbarism, of typical Protestantism with typical Romanism, and it is inevitable that the former should win. Were it otherwise we should be forced to question the very laws of the whole universe, and deny the necessary relation between cause and effect. We are indebted for our marvelous success to the Christian faith and life of our fathers, which have resulted in the quick intelligence, sturdy integrity and steadfast courage so gloriously and effectively displayed in the course of our humane and swiftly conquering war. That man is a traitor to his country who, in the face of the simple yet wonderful lessons of these weeks, would turn the hearts of our people away from that Christ whose holy religion has made possible such victories in behalf of the oppressed. Colonel Ingersoll ought to find his occupation gone, so long as the memory of Manila and Santiago shall endure.

W. F. RICHARDSON.

Kansas City, Mo., July 3, 1898.

Myrick vs. Willett.

"He that is first in his own cause seemeth just; but his neighbor cometh and searcheth him."

"A man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men."

The gravamen in this issue so impresses me as to put me into the critical arena, with the hope that justice may not thereby temporarily suffer. The straight charge of blasphemy, made against any one, is certainly shocking.

The constituents of blasphemy are the wickedly speaking or writing damaging, contemptuous, foul words, expressive of such feelings against God, Jesus Christ or the Holy Ghost.

It might be a fine point among critics, whether this crime can be legitimately uttered by an intelligent man against a man. But if it be so applied, and associated with the Holy Ghost, the blasphemy against whom hath never forgiveness, either in this world or in the life to come, surely then to pronounce against even the most reckless character this most dreadful malediction is bitter, indeed; but to do so against a man of fair fame and Christian profession, is quite far below the humane, not to say the Christian sensibility.

Look at this thrilling, chilling, perdition-consigning epithet, applied to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST Bible-school lesson teacher! Not outside the writings of avowed skeptics can such a blasphemous statement be paralleled."

"Christians believe Paul to have been inspired by the Holy Spirit, and to them this accusation will seem perilously near blaspheming the Holy Ghost," says Mr. Myrick, of Mr. Willett. What was the accusation? This: "At Athens Paul felt so embarrassed as to omit the vital part of the message and trimmed his story to please his audience," said Mr. Willett. If Paul did those things he had what he thought to be justifiable reasons for doing so. He was an expert casuist, and has given many evidences of that ability. Mr. Myrick says, "If Paul did as Professor Willett says he did, Paul was guilty of intellectual and moral cowardice." Possible? What other kinds of dishonesty than intellectual and moral dishonesty are there? Mr. Myrick should have seen by one of Paul's statements, which he (Mr. M.) quotes, how Paul qualified his method of preaching: "I kept back nothing that was profitable for them"—befitting, appropriate. On Mars' Hill Paul preached about the unknown God, and the resurrection from the dead, but omitted anything about the atonement. He thought that course profitable for his hearers, as it proved to be. Was he thereby guilty of anything? Although I need not to say anything pro or con. about Paul's course, as the criticism is upon Myrick and Willett, I may say, en passant, that Paul possessed that rare and valuable gift of nature which we call tact, which in the hand of its possessor is as potent as the fabled wand, or lamp, or shield, which so many coveted, but had no ability to obtain. Some persons know at a glance the befitting thing to be said or done, see the salient or the weak point, adjust the means to the end, gauge the calibre and fit the conditions for easy accomplishment of the foreseen result. Others blunder along in a hit-and-miss manner, producing effects contrary to all they intended, irritating where they designed to please and end as if they only meant to beat the air. They intended to produce great and good effects, but did only what the feeblest can do. Mr. Myrick asks, "How does Bro. Willett know that Luke reported every word Paul spoke in Mars' Hill? Luke gives presumably but an abstract of that sermon. To charge Paul with omitting the vital part of the gospel because Luke did not report all he said, speaks poorly for the critic's discernment." If so, does Prof. Willett's critic not also "discern" that himself imagines an element into his own fabric which may topple it? "Paul was inspired by the Holy Ghost." Was Luke inspired thus? "Luke gave a mere abstract of a sermon," not written on the spot, given from memory, awhile after, by a non-inpsired man. An abstract is an epitomized, contracted account, drawn off by the mind apart; an account by another, a hearer of a discourse, the reporter not inspired, and in any way only abstractly making a synopsis of a discourse.

Thus we have, according to Mr. Myrick, only an abstract by a non-inspired man of Paul's transactions by Luke. This wonderfully lightens the anathema of blasphemy on Prof. Willett "against the Holy Ghost." He can easily bear the stigma of being afflicted with "an abnormal imagination." Notwithstanding all this Mr. Myrick is much agitated because of a sentiment he affirms "is already wide-spread and still increasing, that the columns of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST would serve its own and God's interests better by being sent out blank than by being filled with Prof. Willett's expositions of Bible-school lessons."

This sounds quite excathedra, and is therefore out of the reach of criticism. I might suggest that the Editor and the Professor, with Mr. Myrick, should compose that triumvirate of investigation. Outsiders can but await finalities. I wish to say here that the chief personal motive I have in appearing on this evidently important issue is that I have been much interested and pleased with Prof. Willett's instructions as given in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and glad that the Bible-schools were having prepared an appetite for the guileless milk of the Word by so judicious and gentle a feeder of them as Prof. Willett. I have had a desire to know him personally.

Hypercriticism is a perversion of criticism, which must end in a series of misfitting, meaningless jumbles of factitious attempts at putting opposites together. Your critic makes a batch of statements and then lumps them up thus: "This charge is not a new one. It was born of Rationalism and pseudo-Christianity." etc. Pseudo-Christianity is as far from Christianity as any counterfeit thing is far from the true thing. There can be no such thing as a counterfeit dollar. There can be a counterfeit of a dollar, but it is not a dollar.

Rationalism is and always should be associated only with rational things. Never with anything pseudo—lying—false—counterfeit. There is a good deal of mental pseudoblepsis—false, deceptive mental vision; and because of that condition, "rationalism" has been very often put in bad company by pseudo-theologians, rather theologasters, who prate of their creeds as slaves prate of their masters.

Rationalism relates to reason and reasoning, and is the art and science of reasoning. It is the opposite of the irrational, the non-reasoning, the unreasonable, the absurd. Did Paul ever disparage rationalism? Did he ever intimate that Christianity was irrational? What part of that faith did he not pass through the alembic of his reason? The man who has a creed which leads him to fling sneers at "rationalism" will not edify his hearers, but he will do for them a far worse thing than rationalize them. He will never make great men tremble by the might of his reasoning, but he may make the superstitious tremble for fear of their omnipotent Friend instead of showing them how to know God, who is love, by learning how to love God. There is no "counterfeit Christianity." There are many counterfeits of Christianity, as there are of most other good things. But the counterfeits do not pass among rational people as those good things. Who now has any confidence in "a profession of religion" which any one may make of being a Christian? Indeed, why should they, if they know that there is but one test for that profession, and that test the rational one given by the Christ of Christianity? Jesus put no stigma upon reason, but he exalted it, challenging every one "of their ownselves to judge what is right."

Alas for the many, and many of those in high places, too, who do not seem to be able to judge what is right! They lack comprehensiveness, they can run a line for a space, but do not scope the periphery. Yes, "the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is a beautiful paper. . . . It easily stands at the front among our periodicals," as Mr. Myrick says of it. And this fact made me nauseate at the nondescript mess of foul stuff Mr. Myrick dumped into it in grewsome juxtaposition with Prof. Willett, and Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott, of New York. "It was born of Rationalism and pseudo-Christianity, and surreptitiously deposited on the public doorsteps by Lyman Abbott a few months ago. It seems that H. L. Willett discovered the spawn and was so enamored of it that he immediately adopted the miserable foundling and is trying to install it in the household of faith." Doubtless Mr. Myrick views that as a masterly piece of caricature of two "pseudo-Christians." Many of your readers will see in it an attempt to coarsely, even disgustingly, to abuse two educated and refined Christian gentlemen.

Dr. Abbott has a high national and international repute for literary attainment, and as a Bible commentator. He is an able speaker, an eloquent man, "who talks right on," never blundering, clear as the truth he sees and leads his hearers to see. As genial, modest and sensitive as a well-bred youth, he is as serious and impressive as a Quaker. They are delighted to have him lecture to them as he did in Philadelphia and elsewhere, on the Bible. Of this theme and of himself he says: "The one object and ambition of my life is first, to understand the message of this Bible, and secondly, to communicate this message to others; to understand the one pre-eminent life in which that message culminated—the life of Jesus Christ—and then apply the principles and the spirit of this book or collection of books, this ancient literature, this interpreter of God, to the affairs of human life political, social, industrial, individual." Now, who will elevate himself in the estimatfon of respectable people by attempting to in any way smirch that man? What impression can a tirade of fuming, bitter persiflage and sardonic sneers have upon him?

Dr. Abbott is as keen as a Damascus blade in criticism. He is as instructive in it as he is widely informed, and as ready to learn, either by unlearning, or by learning, as when he was a boy. A man of that makeup will not die of inanity, as he is sure he does not know it all. Job taught him to speak to the earth, and God taught him to speak to himself. Thus God and this world and all worlds and all that in them is, are his teachers, and he is a willing, receptive pupil, and like him, let us all go to school. A stranger friend just writes me from New York, "Let discussion go on, clear, keen, correctly, in the spirit of truth and love, and the truth will ever come to the top." The great Paul said, "We can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth. Not that we should appear approved, but that we should do what is honest, though we be esteemed reprobates." Reprobation is one of the results pioneers for truth should look for from those who think there are no truths to be discovered. "The judgment of God is according to truth." "I will say the truth, but now forbear lest any should think of me other than that he see me to be, or that he heareth of me." JOSEPH H. MACEL'REY.

Pittsburgh Letter.

The Pittsburgh brethren are very proud of the initial appearance of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in its new dress and form. It is now the neatest and most desirable of the many religious publications that come to this city. Your scribe placed the Interior, Independent, Presbyterian Banner and the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST side by side, and said to a practical printer, not of our brotherhood, he not knowing the object of the question, "Which do you consider the best paper from a typographical view-point?" After a rather close examination he said: "This," pointing to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Of the subject-matter, in the paper, one can only express high praise. The subscription list ought to roll up now as never before.

A spirit of joyful optimism seems prevalent among the brethren in and around these two cities of Allegheny and Pittsburgh. It does one's heart good to hear the glowing reports of the successful work accomplished, brought in by the preachers, at their meetings. "Souls for the Master," seems to be the keynote of their work, hot weather or cold. Each preacher seems to be a bundle of concentrated consecration.

After a very successful work at Homestead, Bro. E. A. Hibbler closes his work there August first. Two years ago when he entered the work he found a body of Disciples fifty-eight in number; now there are one hundred and seventy on the roll. The debt has been arranged for through the Extension Society, and the new man as he comes on the field, whoever he may be, will find things in good condition for work.

Very recently Brother Craig of the Belleview Church took the confession of ten children. The parents of these belonged in quite a number of instances to other churches, but so thoroughly were the children grounded in "the doctrine" learned in the Junior C. E., that refusals could not be considered. It was a beautiful sight at the baptism of these "little ones," and will be long remembered.

Bro. Thurgood, the energetic, at Central, has blossomed out as a full-fledged poet. Brother Thurgood's great work is among the children. He believes, and rightly too, that the best door-bell to a man's heart is his child's love. The children going home from the Bible-school and kindergarten tell of the love of Jesus as they sit on their papas' knee, and out of that Thurgood makes this "poem:"

"My papa's knee's a pulpit,
And I am papa's preacher,
My papa prays as I do pray,
And loves to heed his teacher."

A large number of men and women, led by a little child, have witnessed the good confession at Central, proving the value of work among children.

One of the novelties of the hour presented by the war is the sight of the stars and stripes floating gayly from the upper story of the Catholic priests residence on Norwood Avenue, Allegheny. We have seen a great many flags flying from many houses in many cities, but this is the first we had noticed flying from a priest's. Of course he has a right to fly it, no one denies that, but——

Pittsburgh being the center of the iron and steel activity of the United States, the war has set in motion a great amount of new business; and, by the way, we hear very little nowadays about the inferior steel armor with which our ships were supposed to be clad. At any rate it seems strong enough to withstand Spanish shells and shots.

The following churches near here are without pastors or soon will be Duqueenes, Homestead, Johnson, McKeesport. All of them good openings for the right man.

The Western Pennsylvania Christian Missionary Society is looking for a first-class evangelist to work in this very prolific field.

The pastor of the Observatory Hill Church is reading chapter by chapter an original story, entitled David McAlister, at the midweek prayer-meeting. The attendance of young people and older ones has increased as a result.

Texas Letter.

The following lines are said to be found in Byron's Bible:

"Within this awful volume lies
The mystery of mysteries;
Oh, happiest they of human race
To whom our God has given grace
To hear, to read, to fear, to pray;
To lift the latch and force the way.
But better had they ne'er been born
Who read to doubt, or read to scorn."

Rev. Louis Albert Banks, Cleveland, O., a leading Methodist preacher, is the author of these strong words: "Many of you who hear me know enough about Christ and the gospel to be saved, but you wait and wait, as though you expected some flood of supernatural influence would rise about you and sweep you off your feet and carry you against your will into the kingdom. You may be very sure that such a thing will never happen. If it should it would do you no good, for it would not change your character. The first move must come from you. God has done everything he can do for your salvation, until you yourself act in obedience to him. The reason you do not move is because you are chained by your sins. You must break those chains so far as to accept Christ, or you will be lost forever. You are like boats fastened to the shore—there is no use pulling at the oars until the chain is unfastened."

Quite a number of small-bore skeptics should study the following utterances of Prof. Tyndall: "While I make the largest demand for free investigation; while I, as a man of science, feel a natural pride in scientific achievements; while I regard science as the most powerful instrumentality of intellectual culture, as well as the most powerful ministrant to the material wants of man; still, if you ask me whether science has solved or is likely to solve the problem of the universe, I must shake my head in doubt."

B. H. Carroll, of Waco, who stands in the front rank of the Baptist ministry, has this to say about the tongue: "The tongue is a little member, but it is set on fire of hell. The mighty boa-constrictor, crushing into pulp the bones of the bison, can be tamed. That rattlesnake in the hollow of the rocks in Western mountains, whose awful warning, whose basilisk look, and whose deadly venom make him so feared, can be tamed. That Bengal tiger, with green, glaring eyes and yellow fangs, that howling Numidian lion, whose roar shakes the forest, can be tamed. Yon eagle, whose eyrie has never been reached by the shaft of the bowman or the ball of the rifleman, whose wings cleave space, and whose undazzled eye looks into the glory of the face of the sun, he can be tamed. But the tongue can no man tame. Yet God keeps an account of everything it says."

These brave words, reminding us of Saul of Tarsus, are from Ellsworth Faris, a Texas boy who, with Dr. Biddle, is leading the vanguard of our missionaries into Darkest Africa. Speaking of their return from a tour of observation, he says: "When we returned here to Texas, we learned of the death of Mrs. Schrivner, a dear woman of the Baptist Society of Bolsbo. Of the missionaries we have met, five have died since we came. However, none of us came to the Congo for a health resort, and if duty says I should die in Africa, I should be ashamed to be alive in America." (Italics mine.)

There are other heroes besides Dewey and Hobson. Not that I would take one leaf from the garlands which they so deservedly wear, but I would like for us not to overlook those in other fields, just as daring and deserving. Neither would I have us forget that heroism like that of Paul still dwells among the children of men.

M. Demolius, a Frenchman, editor La Science Sociale, has written a book on a living question: Anglo-Saxon Superiority. Here is the way he talks: "It is useless to deny the superiority of the Anglo-Saxon. We may be vexed by this superiority, but the fact remains despite our vexation. We cannot go anywhere without meeting Englishmen. Over all our possessions of former times the English or the United States flag now floats. The Anglo-Saxon has supplanted us in North America, which we occupied from Canada to Louisiana; in Mauritius, once called the Isle of France; in Egypt. He dominates America by Canada and the United States; Africa by Egypt and the Cape; Asia by India and Burma; Oceanica by Australia and New Zealand; Europe and the entire world by his commerce, industry and politcs. The Anglo-Saxon world is to-day at the head of that civilization which is most active, most progressive and most devouring. Let this race establish itself anywhere on the globe, and at once there is introduced with prodigious rapidity the latest progress of our Western societies, and often the young societies surpass us. Observe what we Frenchmen have done with New Caledonia and our other possessions in Oceanica and what the Anglo-Saxons have done in Australia and New Zealand. Observe what Spain and Portugal have made of South America and what the Anglo-Saxons have made of North America. There is as much difference as between night and day."

Fifteen years ago we had, practically, no navy. To-day we have one which commands the respect of the world. A naval officer, speaking of the first period, says: "A sense of humiliation dogged the American naval officer as he went about his duty in foreign lands. In the far East, in the lesser countries along the Mediterranean Sea, and even in the seaports of South America, people smiled patronizingly upon him, and from a sense of politeness avoided speaking of naval subjects in his presence. None but naval officers and a few Americans who happened to be abroad comprehend just how insignificant and cheap the great republic appeared in the eyes of the world." But Dewey at Manila, and Sampson and Schley at Santiago de Cuba, have turned the tide, and the smile of contempt has given place to the bow of respect. And well it may, for to say nothing of other parts of the navy, we now have afloat four great battleships, the "Indiana," "Massachusetts," "Iowa" and "Oregon;" two others, the "Kentucky" and the "Kearsarge" will soon join them; three more, the "Alabama," the "Illinois" and the "Wisconsin," are half finished, and three others have been authorized. And all this in the brief period of FIFTEEN YEARS. Similar vigor on the part of the church and the world will soon bow at the foot of the cross.

Iowa Letter.

Since 1776 there have been one hundred and twenty-two July months. For almost a century and a quarter the fourth of this month has been devoted to celebrations of our national independence. Three of these national days tower above all the others—1776, 1863, 1898. Such news as came yesterday is never to be forgotten. In 1863, in a Wisconsin town, we waited all day on the 4th of July, knowing that the fate of the nation hung in the balance at Gettysburg and Vicksburg. On the fifth we had a memorable celebration. I shall probably never see another 4th of July like '63 or '98. The destinies of nations and of untold generations in ages to come will be traced backward to these dates.

Last week the Christian Index, of Des Moines, Iowa, made mention of "Old Abe," the war eagle carried by the Eighth Wisconsin—the noble bird of many battles and scarred by three wounds. Ever since the temptation has been strong upon me to say that I was a Wisconsin boy when Mahwegatzig, the Indian boy, captured that young eagle from the tall pine tree on our river, the Chippewa; I was living in Eau Claire when our boys in blue secured him and took him away to the front, I knew many of the boys in the Eighth Wisconsin. After their return I worked side by side in a lumber mill with one of the men who carried Old Abe's perch or standard during the fight and on the march. All these years the brave Eighth Wisconsin and this noble bird have seemed more perfectly mine than yours. Why have I yielded to my temptation? Why have I spoken? These lines, found this morning, reveal the philosophy underlying it all:

"Tell them of sweet-dirged Winthrop, whom to name
Is to be braver as one grows more pure,
Breathing the thought of love or of saint."

"Ten prices for one copy of an honest book." Did you see the offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of June 30th, p. 404, col. 3, b? This offer is made by an Iowa Saint (Mormon). Why do Iowa Mormons want one honest book? Do they want it for T. W. Williams, their champion debater? Can a dishonest man (CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, June 30th, p. 408, col. 5, c.) recognize an honest book? How can eyes looking through colored glass know the real colors of truth. A thief, it is said, cries, "Stop thief!" in order to confuse his pursuers and escape justice. Is not this Iowa Mormon a guilty wretch? And is not D. H. Bays a lawful pursuer? And is not his book, "Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism," more dreaded than a policeman's club? If it is so full of errors as this flying fugitive insinuates, why did apostle (?) Joseph R. Lambert refuse to allow the Mormons to meet D. H. Bays at Defiance, Iowa (CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, June 16th, p. 381, col. 5, c.)? Physician (Mark 16: 17, 18), heal thyself.

Prof. Ed Amherst Ott, of Drake University, is one of Iowa's most popular orators. Other states are by no means ignorant of his powers and his merits. This message comes to me from De Witte, Clinton Co., Ia.: "Prof. Ott delivered his lecture—Sour Grapes—before the graduates of our high school. It exceeded anything this town had ever heard, according to the statements of the public. Everybody praised it.

One of the best pieces of work done by the Iowa State Board this spring is in Dennison, Crawford county. This is a fine county-seat town of almost 3,000 people. We have been hitherto without an organization there. There are a dozen or twenty members in and near the town. These, with J. J. Nicholson, pastor at Union, discovered a contract for the sale of two lots on easy terms. The contract lacked but two lots on easy terms. It was a bargain not to be missed. All money needed for the first payment except $75 was raised on the spot. One member of the State Board advanced the shortage and the purchase was made. Already 50 feet of the rear ends of these lots has brought us an offer of $500, leaving us a building site 100x110. These lots are the choicest in town. They are in the same block with the residence of Gov. Shaw. His corner faces south and east; ours south and west. A tabernacle and a meeting is the next step. This week Secretary Haggard will send out to every Iowa church, known as a contributor to mission work of any kind, special literature on the state work. The Iowa board expects this year an offering from every one of these churches. Read what he says and respond. Here is a condensed report of the Brainard meeting, which began June 5th,—7, 23, 26, 38, 41, 45, 52, 57, 60. This is new ground. House and lot in sight. And this is but one out of many places we are working.

Two Iowa books will soon be from the press of the Christian Index, of Des Moines. One by John M. Van Kirk on Seventh-Day Adventism and its issues; the other, "Doctrine and Duty," a volume of sermons and addresses by Iowa preachers. G. L. Brokaw, editor of the Index, assumes the responsibilities of the publication of this book.

The Iowa State Board will arrange a series of meetings for any good evangelist in the land, unless the demand is insufficient. It is now arranging a series for Jas. Small, of California, another for Benj. F. Hill, of Missouri, and one for G. W. Elliott, of Dakota. We are expecting to do so for R. A. Omer and D. A. Hunter and D. C. Kellams and others. Write A. M. Haggard, 206 4th St., Des Moines.

H. L. Willett and his Missouri critic: I do not like Prof. Willett's interpretation of Paul, and I doubt the method of his critic. I like an intense, positive, frank spirit. But is it wise to give our brethren an occasion to play successfully the role of a martyr. Prof. Willett is too sensible to do that, but others are not. Is it scriptural to think of "censorship?" Aside from Christ and the Holy Spirit, who is wise enough to do it profitably? Is not the censorship of the Holy Spirit in the Bible a geography of free speech—showing almost unbounded latitude and longitude for the utterance of both truth and error? What is the best thing ever done with an objectionable doctrine? Was it not to allow it statement—separate it from its author—examine it exhaustively upon its own merits, and leave it a monument in history? What is the worst thing to do with such a doctrine? Is it not to drag a good man down to the supposed level of a bad doctrine—to forget his goodness and magnify his mistake—to thus misrepresent the man to strangers and earn the dislike of his friends—and thus to change the issues of the battle from the doctrine to the man—and in the end leave many convinced that since the man is good the doctrine is also good, and since the opponents of the doctrine are unfair to the man, they have been also with the doctrine? Is not this the way to perpetuate false doctrine? And where in the Bible is there precept or divine example for it? Fire a bullet into the thick of my body beyond the reach of the physician's probe and note the result. My flesh will treat it more wisely than Christian churches often treat a supposed heretic. A surgeon is not always absolutely essential. Freedom is not panic. Nor is freedom flabbiness. Let us learn freedom in Christ Jesus.

A. M. HAGGARD.

For Debilitated Men, Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. J. B. ALEXANDER, Charlotte, N.C., says: "It is pleasant to the taste, and ranks among the best of nerve tonics for debilitated men."

The imbecility of some men is always inviting the embrace of death. It is the delight of such men to boast of what "tough fellows" they are, and tell how they overwork themselves and how they neglect little disorders and little illnesses that put other people on their backs.

It may not sound nice to say so, but it is a fact that the average man is just that kind of a boastful, cheerful idiot. If his head aches, it isn't worth paying any attention to: if he feels dull and drowsy during the day, it isn't worth serious consideration; if he is troubled with sleeplessness at night, he doses himself with opiates. When he suffers from nervousness, he walks into the nearest drug store and orders powerful medicines that even a physician prescribes with care. He is a very knowing fellow, but without knowing it, he is hugging death. There is a wonderful restorative tonic and health-builder that will keep the hardest working man in good working shape; it is Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It is made of pure native roots and barks. It contains no minerals, no narcotics and no opiates. It simply aids nature in the natural processes of secretion and excretion. It tones up the stomach and facilitates the flow of digestive juices. It makes a man "hungry as a horse" and then sees to it that the life-giving elements of the food he takes are assimilated into the blood. It invigorates the liver. It drives out all impurities and disease germs from the system. It is the great blood-maker and flesh-builder. It is the best of all nerve tonics. It cures bronchial, throat and lung affections as well.

"I had indigestion and a torpid liver," writes Mrs. A. I. Gibbs, of Russellville, Logan County, Ky., "Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cured me."

If constipation is also present, Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets should be taken. They never fail; they never gripe. Druggists sell both medicines.

Letter From Mr. Moody.

TO THE EDITOR—Dear Friend: Every day of the history of the war tends to confirm me in the opinion that Dr. Dixon was right when he said that he believed the church had an opportunity for reaching men with the gospel such as might not come again in this generation.

Many circumstances combine to make this true, but one of the most striking things is the fact that the Spirit of God is already moving wondrously in the army camps. The fields are white already to harvest and he is leading the reapers out into them. Upon a recent Sabbath at Chickamauga, upwards of 500 men confessed Christ as their Savior for the first time. Dr. Torrey, of Chicago, who was there preaching at the time, wrote me the next day: "I never saw anything like the marvelous work going on here. There is a revival all over the camp. Men break down and cry like children." One of the other workers wrote at the same time: "The work at this place is simply wonderful. Never have I seen men so anxious for the gospel. Testimonies are coming to us day by day of the influence of the meetings upon the men. A few nights since, a man who had been at the meeting became wonderfully convicted, and about eleven o'clock called for the guard and asked him to bring the chaplain. The guard tried to talk him out of it, but he kept it up until one o'clock when the chaplain was called, and in a short time the man was rejoicing in the Lord Jesus. It would make your hearts rejoice to hear the testimonies of the men before their comrades." Another writes: "One night last week a fine-looking young man from Wisconsin got up at the close of the meeting and said: 'Boys, I came on these grounds as tough a case as ever walked. My father is a Presbyterian minister and my mother is a God-fearing woman; but I paid no attention to them while I was at home. The night before last I came to the meeting and I accepted Christ as my personal Savior, and now I want to confess him.'" I might give other similar incidents, but these will be sufficient to show that the fields in our army camps are ready for the reapers.

Now we cannot expect that those who are not themselves Christians will be much moved by such facts as these. Christians must realize that this work is distinctively their work. They are the ones to whom God has committed the Word of reconciliation. They are the ones who will be deeply moved by the thought that many of our brave soldier and sailor boys are not ready to die. They are the ones who know that the indwelling Holy Spirit can keep men from falling into sin even in the midst of terrible emptations. They are the ones who know that Christ can give men perfect peace in the midst of fiercest turmoil. Those who know these things must do this work or it will remain undone.

God is not calling thus loudly upon his people in vain. From every direction are coming evidences that the church is alive to this opportunity. I wish space permitted me to give extracts from some letters I have been receiving with contributions.

The President sent out his proclamation calling upon us to join in thanksgiving to God for the victories of our forces by land and sea, and we have gladly responded. Shall we not be as faithful in praising God for the wonderful victories of grace among the troops? The government is taxing us to pay the expenses of the war. We are paying them without a murmur, and shall we not just as willingly tax ourselves to carry on the battles of our Lord and Master? Yours sincerely,

D. L. Moody.

The annual convention at Mankato, Tuesday, August 23rd to August 26th inclusive.

T. A. Meredith, the new pastor at Howard Lake, is in a meeting with excellent prospects, there having been eight confessions to June 18th.

E. J. Sias, pastor at Antelope Hills, writes: "Regarding our prospective meeting at Canby (Canby is the railroad station of Antelope Hills, five miles to the southward, and a town of eight hundred population), we have been keeping right after H. W. Elliott, of Dakota, till we have engaged him. Have the meeting well advertised and hope for a glorious time, beginning July 10th. Rejoice with us and pray for us."

Carey E. Morgan, of the Minneapolis church (there is but one church in this city of 200,000 population save two Scandinavian missions; take heed, O ye national boards), began his fifth year of service Lord's day June 19th, surrounded by a loyal and beloved brotherhood. In Bro. Morgan's four years' pastorate there have been 300 additions, leaving the present membership 450; and $20,000 have been raised and expended. The Bible-school has an enrollment of 200 and the Y. P. S. C. E. (Senior, Junior and Intermediate) 141. With particular satisfaction Bro. Morgan announced in his review of the incidents of the four years' service that he had married fifty couples, "and, like Alexander, 'sighed for more worlds to conquer.'" W. J. Lhamon, of Alleghany City, was Bro. Morgan's immediate predecessor, with Enos Campbell preceding him, which roll of honored servants accounts in no small degree for the unwavering growth of the Minneapolis congregation.

A LETTER.

Dear Fellow Workers in the Great Mission Field of Minnesota:—In our great state there are 81 counties, in only 21 of which is our plea represented in any way, or in one-fourth of the whole.

Is Equally Good for Babies, Children or Adults.

It's the most agreeable remedy made, but that's its least merit. It meets the requirements of those who insist on having the best possible cure for headache, biliousness, constipation and digestive disorders. 50c. and $1.

TARRANT & CO., Chemists, New York

In our great state there are 1,500,000 people, among whom only have we a membership of 3,000 brethren, or one in every 500.

In our great state there occurs a yearly growth, or increase of population, of 52,000, among which only is our increase of membership 300.

In our great state there are hundreds upon hundreds of souls going to perdition yearly with no one to warn of danger, etc., etc.

Now how soon is the plea which we are making to be heralded to the other 60 counties of the state?

How soon are we to press our missionary work anywhere like unto the yearly increase of population?

How soon are we to face the obligation laid upon us to tell the unsaved of Jesus Christ and his salvation?

Face it as unwillingly as we may, yet the answer must be, Not in a thousand years at the present rate of evangelization!

We are but playing at missions in Minnesota! One evangelist with which to serve 40 congregations, and to evangelize the state as a whole! No church of note and influence in all the chief centres, save two or three!

How comes it that after 40 years of history in the state, there is so little to show for past labor? All because of our weak attack upon sin, or in other words, because of lack of as great enthusiasm for Minnesota missions as for other missions. Nearly every other missionary enterprise and benevolence receives loyal support, while Minnesota missions—the salvation of souls at our very doors, and often at our very firesides—has been made to wend its way with the halt and the blind. The services of the one evangelist could be and should be profitably spent alone in cheering the disheartened and isolated congregations, while a half dozen others should be solely kept at work raising up congregations at the chief centres.

Reform must be our watchword, or we must continue to struggle on as ineffectively in the future as in the past, content to occupy but a small portion of our possible inheritance: content to exist but in the obscure corners of the state: content to view the onward rush of population without purpose in its salvation: content to see the denominations and Roman Catholicism seize all the points of advantage. Shall we continue thus supinely to labor? No! most assuredly not, you say.

But, brother, sister, there are thirteen churches, fourteen Bible-shools, thirteen Endeavor Societies and nine Junior Endeavor Societies—almost the half of all in the state—that are having no part in this work, and what say you to this? Is your society among the number? Are you personally a non-supporter of the work? If so, you surely have not purposed thus, but have remained a non-participant through non-acquaintance with all the facts. And now the state board asks at your hands, corporately and individually, response to the needs of the work, in the nature of a pledge, to be paid before the close of the yearly accounts on Tuesday, the 16th day of August. Shall it have such a pledge? We pray you to take action now; express the good will that is within you at this moment. And above all do not in a corporate capacity present the excuse that because of some other branch of the church contributing, you must be absolved, for this would be but to discriminate. For have you not contributed to Foreign Missions and other benevolences irrespective of what the other branches were doing? Should there not be as much loyalty displayed to Minnesota missions as to other missions?

Glory to God for all missions and benevolences, and let all continue to support them; but the responsibility resting upon all to present Christ's gospel to the unsaved touching elbows with them is equal to that respecting other missions and benevolences.

May all churches, auxiliaries and individuals, young and old, rally to the needs of the Minnesota work.

"Minnesota for Christ!"

St. Louis Letter.

The war excitement has largely disappeared. When men were enlisting, and the air was full of rumors, the excitement was intense; but now that the nations have not all become entangled, the Spanish Navy is about wiped out, and the successes of the war monotonously one-sided, the excitement has largely subsided. An occasional soldier is seen on the streets, several recruiting offices still open, and the shrill cry of the newsboy announcing an extra still heard, but no excitement or anxiety about results. It is a foregone conclusion, apparently, that America will win from the shores of Africa on the East to the coast of China on the West.

Some lines of business were greatly accelerated by war maneuvers, war news and war results, while others were retarded. Building and other trades have suffered severely. This had been expected to be a year of unusual activity in real estate and building circles, but the expectants have been disappointed. Some of the idle men have gone into the army, but there is still a surplus of labor on the labor market. A tour of the manufacturing interests of the city, outside of a few special lines, reveals no unusual degree of activity. Nobody is rushed with orders. An opinion, however, prevails to the effect that a "boom is coming." When the money now going for bonds gets out into the commercial and industrial channels there will evidently be a marked change in present industrial conditions.

On the twelfth of July this city is to vote on a proposition to amend its charter so that a new debt of twenty million dollars can be incurred, presumably for street improvement. The suspicious thing about this, however, is that when it was proposed to raise this amount for improving the streets of St. Louis it was also proposed that a special commission be elected by the people to see that the money went to the streets. But the authorities would not let this feature of the proposition go before the voters of St. Louis. They were in for the twenty-million assessment, but wanted to oversee its collection and disbursement themselves; wanted it to go through the regular political officials of the city, which in itself is a suspicion sufficient to defeat the measure.

If there is any class of persons in a large city that appreciate and deserve a vacation, it is the school class—both teachers and pupils—and that blessed boon has come to them again. The schools are all out, and the children are happy. Many of the teachers are on a tour, and the children are on a tear. Whether roaming the forest, romping on the lawn or rambling about the streets, they are happy; happy that school is out and more than two months of good solid rest from books has come.

The extension of the electric motor cars far out into the suburbs and country surrounding St. Louis is another source of relief to those who have neither the time nor the means for a longer tour. For a dime one can get a ride out on different car lines for a distance of from ten to fifteen miles, and thus spend an hour or an evening pleasantly and restfully. At many of these places are refreshment stands, cooling drinks, chairs, swings, rides, rounds and other innocent amusements which other than children enjoy. But, unfortunately, these places are not free, as they should be, from sinful temptations. These car lines are largely patronized and profitable sources of revenue to the street-car companies. Railroad and steamboat excursions are still popular with the people, and largely patronized, especially on Sundays. And in these evil is present, as in other popular pleasure resorts.

The Fourth of July was an open day in St. Louis. Never was an Independence day more generally and enthusiastically observed, is what the papers said of it the next day. The news of the destruction of Admiral Cervera's fleet off Santiago Harbor aroused the patriotism of the entire country, and the rejoicing was unbounded. Forest Park was filled with people, but this did not seem to lessen the crowds at other centers of attraction and places of resort for the day. Many serious accidents were reported, but no catastrophes. Nearly all the preachers of the city delivered patriotic sermons and addresses from their respective pulpits on Sunday, which helped to stir up their patriotism for Independence day. The demand of Gen. Shafter for the surrender of Santiago, the destruction of Cervera's fleet and the arrival of reinforcements for Dewey at Manila were more good news in one day than often comes to an entire nation. They were among the grandest Fourth of July orations that ever fell upon the receptive American ear.

Florida Letter.

The work upon which the writer has entered in Jacksonville, the season considered, opens up auspiciously. We are meeting many friends of former years, and have been given by them a cordial welcome back to a former field of labor. Usually at this season of the year in this city services are somewhat curtailed in many of the churches; but we shall endeavor to maintain throughout the summer our regular meetings. The presence of some thousands of volunteer soldiers in Jacksonville gives the city a very lively appearance, and has brought a large number of the friends of the "soldier boys" from different parts of the country to visit them. Regular services are conducted in the various regiments by the chaplains, assisted by the city ministerial force. A splendid work is being done at the encampment by branch tents of the Y. M. C. A. Sacred concerts addresses, prayer-meetings, band concerts and plans for amusement and recreation, with ample opportunities for reading and writing are freely offered in these tents. And everything is being done that is possible to add to the comfort of the troops. The ladies of this city have not been backward in assisting to make the sick soldiers as comfortable as possible while confined to the hospital tents. Our own sisters visit them frequently, and have done their parts nobly. The writer was made the bearer recently of a large package of sheets and night-shirts, presented to the hospital tents by the ladies of the Christian Church. The articles were most thankfully received, and the kindness of our sisters most courteously acknowledged by the surgeons in charge. Considering the number of regiments encamped here, the sick list has been a small one. We are daily meeting members of the Christian Church among the soldiers, and would be pleased to visit and become acquainted with any young brother in any of the regiments, if his friends at home would but drop us a postal card giving the regiment and company.

Our Lord's day services, all things considered, are encouragingly attended. Our Ladies' Aid Society is in good working order. Our Y. P. S. C. E. is young, but has in it the principles of growth. Our prayer-meetings are well attended and interesting, and we are in hearty sympathy with every branch of Christian growth and progress. We are receiving encouraging and helpful words from all parts of our state.

A Union Meeting.

The Churches of Christ in Polk county will meet in Des Moines, Ia., Sunday, July 24th, on the Chautauqua grounds, for a grand union meeting. The most enthusiastic and devout Christian men and women in Des Moines have been chosen as officers and committeemen to arrange for this union meeting. Everything has been done or will be done that will add interest to this Christian enterprise.

It will doubtless be an high day in the courts of our Lord when several thousand Disciples of Christ convene in the Jerusalem of this state to worship God as they did in the apostolic days. A very strong and satisfactory program has been arranged, as follows:

Dr. H. O. Breeden will preside at the morning service, at 10:30, in the Tabernacle.

Prof. Sherman Kirk will lead the song service, composed of all the choirs in the county.

Dr. J. H. Garrison, editor of the Christian-Evangelist, will preach the sermon.

Chas. J. Phillips will conduct the union Sunday-school at 12:15, assisted by the other superintendents of the county.

B. A. Roberts will be in charge of the music.

Dr. J. H. Garrison will conduct the communion service at 3:30, in memory of Him.

N. B. Ventress will superintend the deacon's service.

Bro. I. N. McCash will lead the Endeavor meeting at 6:15. At this great C. E. meeting it is hoped that every society in the county will be represented. Dale Stanley will be master of song. Chancellor Wm. Bayard Craig will preside at 8 P. M.

Dr. Edward S. Ames, Mrs. D. A. Wickizer, Prof. J. Mad. Williams and perhaps others will deliver short addresses.

The ushers will be directed by W. C. Cole.

At the morning service all the preachers of the county will occupy the platform; the superintendents at the Sunday-school hour; the elders at the communion service; the presidents of the Endeavor Societies at the Endeavor hour. There are more than six thousand Disciples in Polk county. You will be expected to enjoy this spiritual feast. To this great meeting the old, young, rich, poor, colored, white, saint, sinner, one and all, are most cordially invited. Our preachers will feed your souls and our families will bring baskets well filled to supplyy our bodily wants.

Chatauqua Notes.

On Wednesday last, 29th June, this Assembly opened, and an interesting bill was begun for the entertainment of a very fair attendance. Lectures on "Girlhood in Homer," "The Quaker Laureate of Puritanism," "Use of Historical Material in Romance," were given by Prof. W. C. Lawton last week. Patriotic Day exercises and evening fireworks were had July 4th, and the old flag waved triumphant. "Browning's Caliban upon Setebos" was the lecture by Prof. R. G. Moulton on Tuesday, and Dr. W. G. Anderson on "Ethical Value of Physical Culture."

To-day addresses by prominent Americans at librarians' meeting. Friday Mrs. Bishop lectures on "Don't Worry." To-night, stereopticon views of the Philippine Islands. Prof. H. L. Willett, of Chicago University, conducts Bible study for the Assembly at 9 o'clock next Sunday morning. Monday, "Religious Liberty," by Prof. Maury; and by the time the readers of the Christian-Evangelist see this notice, he will be speaking on Friday "Of Tolstoi and the Martyrs of Protestantism in Russia." On Saturday all the schools of study and lecture open, and there will be a great increase in the crowds. A lecture by Bishop Goodsell on Roman days, and a grand concert. Sunday, July 17th, Bible study by Prof. Willett and sermon by Bishop Goodsell.

Dr. Pohlman lectures Monday on "Highest Mission of Woman," and in the evening there is to be a musical flotilla on the lake and an illumination. Your readers will get an idea of some few of the many interesting things being given for the entertainment of all who come and care to have part in things scientific, literary or religious, which center in the pleasant woods of Chatauqua. We have prayer-meeting on Wednesday evenings at 7 o'clock, and expect to have service and communion next Lord's day at 10 o'clock at the headquarters. Tell your friends who think of coming to write Mrs. W. J. Ford, 437 Clark Avenue Headquarters. We have good rooms in the best location at fair rates, and the money all goes in to help pay for the headquarters' building. The register shows brethren coming in for social and religious intercourse from various sections of the Union.

Evangelistic Work.

The writer as preacher and G. W. Adams as singer began the season's work as evangelists with a large tent, songbooks and everything complete, May 12, 1898. First meeting at Ashton, Kan., 12 miles west of Arkansas City. Continued four weeks battling with cyclones, hailstones, indifference and the devil. The order of exercises was about this way all through. Service one night and the next stormed out, etc., etc. There was only one time during the month that we had as many as five consecutive meetings. The people there all have storm cellars, and when a cloud appears, and it begins to thunder, business stops and a break is made for the cellar. This is all right for safety, but hard on the evangelists. We fortunately had a few days of fair weather to close in, for which we were thankful. Organized a congregation of 24 members, all heads of families but one. A board of three elders and four deacons. Subscription paper started to build a church and money enough in sight before the close to assure its being erected. It will be pushed rapidly to completion. Meeting closed with a firm feeling and unanimous vote from the large congregation present for us to return this year and dedicate their new church and hold them another meeting.

We went from there to Liberty, Mo., pitched our tent and opened up in this stronghold of infidelity and sin. Stayed about three weeks. Gathered together those who were disposed to work. Added from the M. E.s and the world enough to organize them into a new congregation of 42 members, officered with elders and deacons, and a good hall secured in which to hold services till their new church building is completed, which they will erect at once, a subscription paper having been started and the money secured. We are at home resting a few days. Our next meeting will be in Oklahoma, point not yet decided; three invitations. Churches desiring tent meetings may address G. W. Adams, Sheldon, Mo.

ADCOCK AND ADAMS, Evangelists.

Not so Enthusiastic.

The revolutionary resolution referred to in a late issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST as enthusiastically passed, we are inclined to believe was not passed with so great enthusiasm as one might suppose. I refer to the resolution passed at the Mexico convention, and which looks to a division of the receipts of Children's Day between Home and Foreign Missions. It is yet to be shown that a majority of the workers present favored it. It was passed, of course, but how few comparatively voted either way! I voted against the resolution, but being a new man and not wanting to appear forward upon a short acquaintance, I took no part in the discussion. I may be pardoned now for a few lines to the point.

1. The day was set apart in national councils, not by any state convention. Hence this was not the place to set any part of its purpose aside, granting that the request of the resolution was just.

2. This day has been from the first held sacred to heathen missions. God has wonderfully blessed it. Now comes said resolution and appropriates a half interest in it without so much as consulting those who have promoted the day. The principle is wrong.

3. The vote for the resolution was almost to a vote from the preachers. A large per cent. of the vote against was from the lay delegation. The expressions from this source led me to believe that the very many who did not vote felt that the resolution was not the thing. It is not the people who oppose special days any more than the preachers. Many of these preachers who cry out against days, have never tried their people to see if they like them. When the proper course is followed these special days will be the most enjoyable of the year. We have but few national days. I tell you, if you want to cut off days begin upon these state and local days that are dawning everywhere. The national days are not too many, and we could have a children's day for Home Missions without hurting anybody.

4. I believe the result will be to cripple the foreign offerings without materially helping the home work.

5. The sentiment in this country among those who pay as well as pray, is for the foreign work. And it should be. With all the evangelical churches we have in America, I do not hesitate to say the cry of 900,000,000 pagans in six foreign fields—China, India, Africa, Arabia, Korea, Siam—should be considered more important than sending an additional force into our own land. Let no tongue set the demands of even New America against those of this heathen multitude. For the victories of our armies only multiply the reasons for foreign work.

H. A. DENTON.

Centralia, Mo.

[We have not seen the resolution referred to, but we feel sure that it would be very unwise to divert any part of the proceeds of Children's Day, on the first Lord's day in June, from that original purpose. This day has a history, and had its origin under conditions that look more like God's providence than man's devising. We would better let it alone and seek to enhance the Home Missionary interest in some other way.—EDITOR.]

State Mission Notes.

In the death of E. O. Waller, of Platte City, every enterprise of the church has lost a steadfast friend. The church at Platte City, his own family, all the poor and needy in the neighborhood gathered at his burying and poured out a tender tribute of respect in the tears of grief that ran down their cheeks. And there has lived but few men who were more worthy of such a tribute. Since his death I have received from the hand of his son, Bro. R. P. Waller, $20 which his father had requested should be given to State Missions. Thus in his death he has befriended in life shall still be assisted by his generosity in the years to come? Verily, such men are worthy of the encomium of the blessed Word, "Their works do follow them." Our men of means will learn in the years to come that there is a blessed joy in giving of their wealth to the service of the King. There ought to be two classes in every church, at least there ought not to be more than two, the givers and the receivers. No one but those who are objects of charity should refuse to help on the work of the Lord. This brings me to the consideration of

SOME FIGURES.

The number of contributing churches to our State Mission work last year was 104 larger than at the present time. I mean that the whole number contributing last year was 104 greater than the number so far this year. We are now near the middle of the first month of the last quarter in the year. In fact, as our convention comes one week earlier than it did last year, we are nearly within two months of the convention hour. We shall have to stir ourselves mightily if we reach the number of contributing churches of last year. But here is another figure or two. I have been working a great deal among the churches which did not contribute last year and the result is that of the number of contributing churches this year, so far, 68 of them gave nothing last year. This tells us that 172 of the churches that gave last year have not responded this year at all. Your board has depended on every one that gave last year to give this, and that we would make some gains. Now if the churches that gave last year will give this and the increase in new churches continues to the end of the year, we shall come out with flying colors.

But must have a general movement. We are in debt to the men in the field; they are needing the funds that are actually now owing to them to pay for the very necessaries of life. It is justly their due. I am sure that a great people such as we are cannot afford to have our brethren feel that they are neglected. They are doing the pioneer work for us, they are the skirmish line, they are at the post of danger, they are engaged in planting of our cause in the destitute regions, and upon their faithfulness depends our growth in a large manner in the days that are to come. What shall we do? Shall we let them suffer for the want of the very necessaries of life? I don't believe that we will. Yet to that complexion has it now come. Please send at once, that the money may be sent to these men and their families. I beg of you to hear.

Yours in his name,

T. A. ABBOTT.

The Alum Heart.

Many people are suffering from some form of heart disease who have no idea of the cause of it.

Any disturbance of the digestive organs affects the heart's action, and therefore every food which interferes with digestion is responsible where there are troubles of this character.

It has been discovered that the use of baking powder made from burnt alum coagulates the blood very rapidly, which interferes with its free flow through the arteries and valves of that organ. Formerly alum was used as a specific for children's croup, but owing to its tendency from the causes named to produce heart failure, physicians no longer employ it.

In face of such facts and in view of the overwhelming testimony of scientists as to the poisonous character of this drug when used for food purposes, can there be any excuse for the ignorance or unconcern which permits any one to take from the grocer a package of alum baking powder simply for the sake of saving a few cents in price?

It is a healthful sign that many states are limiting by law the sale of alum baking powder. Very soon it will be prohibited in all states, or treated as a poison, as it should be. But for such laws, how are the alum powders to be known by consumers?

Where alum powders are not branded as such, nor their sale prohibited by law, it is better to avoid the use of any new or doubtful brand until it has been analyzed. The purity of all powders may be suspected if they are sold at a price lower than the price of the best standard brands. We know the Royal to be a first-class cream of tartar powder, and if consumers insist upon having that brand, they will be sure of a pure, healthful article. In view of a recently reported case of poisoning of a whole family living near Logansport, Indiana, from the use of alum powder, it behooves every one to use extraordinary care in purchasing their supplies. We do not hesitate to recommend the Royal to all who are in doubt as to the powder they have been using, as the United States Government tests placed that brand at the head of all the tartaric powders.

The Illinois Encampment

Will begin at Eureka, August 1, and continue seven days. The state missionary convention will be held August 3 and 4. Watch next week's papers for the program. It is important that the brethren attend these meetings in great numbers. We hope for one of the largest encampments we have ever held.

Notes and News.

The 5th annual reunion of the Churches of Christ, of McDonough and adjoining counties, at the Old Bedford Christian Church (Blandinsville, Ill.), June 30th, was a grand success and was well attended from abroad.

M. D. MELVIN.

A correspondent writes us that the church at Mechanicsburg, Ill., will soon be out of a pastor. The church will then want another preacher, and the present preacher another church.

We are glad to learn that E. W. Brickert's work at Red Oak, Iowa, is being appreciated and that good results are coming from it. The different activities of the church are doing effective work and our correspondent thinks that a bright future is in store for the church at that place.

F. M. Jones, an elder of the church at Pea Ridge, Ark., wishes to say to his correspondents through our columns that the church there is small, but active in faith; that S. R. Beaman is the pastor; that Benton county is the fruit orchard of Arkansas; that they have a good normal school at Pea Ridge, and that Pea Ridge is seven miles west of the old Pea Ridge battle ground and five miles west of the railroad.

Indiana Letter.

This year has been a successful one in Indiana. The state evangelist and his assistants have had 2,300 accessions, raised over $4,000 for evangelistic purposes, and $10,400 for all purposes. The corresponding secretary and the districts pushed the amount up to about $14,000 used in missionary work in Indiana this year. We have dedicated twenty churches. At our state convention at South Bend, J. V. Coombs was re-elected evangelist, and T. J. Legg corresponding secretary. The next state convention will be held at Irvington. Next year I will not confine my work to Indiana. I will go out of the state for a number of meetings. I can hold a tent meeting in August. J. V. COOMBS, State Evan.

A Beautiful Preasent.

Through the courtesy of Dr. J. W. Young, Ft. Wayne, Ind., a fifty-dollar gold medal will be given to the Christian Endeavor Society which has the largest delegation at the state Christian Endeavor convention of the Disciples of Indiana, at Bethany Park, August 8, 9, 10, 11, 1898. Junior and intermediate societies can compete for it. An excellent program, in which quite an array of talent is presented, has been prepared.

Chesterton

Is a country town, on the L. S. & M. S. Railway about twenty miles west of LaPorte, Ind. Last Tuesday night, about seven o'clock the writer, in the line of business, drove into said town, and seeing a tent in the suburbs and a blackboard notice upon the street, I made a few enquiries and learned that the Christian Church was conducting a meeting. I walked down and stood around like other fellows, and presently here came Bro. Coombs; it is a long time since we met, and my beard was gone, hence he did not recognize me. I said nothing until after the last amen, but walked in and took a back seat. I looked at the tent and wondered whether Bro. Coobs had been compaigning near the bottomless pit and an angry devil had come up and dropped a 13-inch shell through the roof, besides sending a few four and six-pounders through its sides. I don't blame the devil at all. Bro. Coombs has a habit of creating serious disturbances around his Infernal Majesty's domains.

The audience was rather small, but possibly select. Reasons: Short nights, harvest time, and especially the fact that Chesterton is not noted for its piety. Besides, the meeting had only been in progress about a week, and was not likely to continue but a few evenings longer. Presently the Gospel News man announced a song and his vest-pocket organ got down to business, and I preceived that the one-armed orator had lost none of his vim; he could sing.

After awhile he opened his ammunition chest at Gal. 6:7 and brought out his gun, a 13-inch gun, and a rapid-fire at that. The slashes, gashes and rents made in his saloon business, dancing, card-playing, etc., were awful. The gunner got hot; no wonder, the devil was mad.

The good people of Chesterton doubtless hope that Bro. Coombs will have an opportunity to return and finish the job. Chesterton's Morro Castle needs storming. By the way, I think Coombs is fatter than usual; the spring chicken has appeared, you know! J. H. LACEY.

Attention!

The Executive Committee of the Benevolent Association of the Christian Church have recently determined to more vigorously push the benevolent work of their orphanage, the National Orphans' Home, located in St. Louis, Mo. To this end they have put into the field as solicitors two more brethren.

Our solicitors now are, Bro. W. B. Young for Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Texas and all southern points; Bro. Dempsey A. Hunter for Iowa, Nebraska, Michigan, the Dakotas and northern points; Bro. Joel Brown for Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and all other states except Kentucky. As Kentucky has a Widows' and Orphans' Home of her own to support, we do not allow our agents to solicit in that state.

These three are all good men, and we bespeak for them the kindest treatment at the hands of our brethren wherever they may go. They will turn over all money to the corresponding secretary and make a report to the Board each month, and all contributions paid to them, or sent to the corresponding secretary in payment of pledges made to them, will be reported in the Orphan's Cry, which is issued monthly at 25 cents a year. Friends sending pledges to corresponding secretary will please not forget to state to whom and when and where the pledge was made, that they may be canceled without trouble. A receipt will be returned for all money so sent.

Each solicitor carries a certificate signed by the president and secretary of the board.

City Mission Work.

My first year's service as City Missionary for Kansas City, Mo., closes this month. I came to Kansas City, in July, 1897, from Lynnville, Ill., and was given a warm reception by the people and also the weather.

It has been a busy year and richly blessed of the Lord. We wish to commend heartily the spirit of fellowship and the co-operation manifested both by the pastors and people of the various churches and missions within the city.

I cannot fail to speak of the Endeavorers throughout the city. They have been exceedingly kind towards our work and have entered enthusiastically upon any work suggested. They have aided by prayer, offerings and by active service. Many young men have spoken at the mission when called upon and have done excellent work.

There were two missions when I took up the work. One now called, "East 15th Street Mission," the other at 24th and Vine Streets. During the year a mission was organized at Wanboe, a suburb of the city. I preach here every Friday night. Sunday-school on Lord's day at 3 P. M.

Sheffield church has come under the direction of the board and we supply preaching through our Endeavorers every Lord's day evening. Sunday-school here in the morning.

I preach every Lord's day at Vine Street and East 15th Street, also have Sunday-school, Junior and Senior Endeavor, Ladies' Aid and prayer-meeting at each place every week.

Have preached 207 sermons and there have been 145 additions during the year. There have been visits without number. Many poor families were assisted in time of dire distress. Clothing, coal, tickets on railroad, funeral expenses for the destitute, food for the hungry—these and many other calls are constantly coming to us in this general work.

Among all the helpers there is none more faithful and efficient than Sister Bowen. She is God's purpose incarnate. "An helpmeet" indeed. Ever ready to go and do wherever she is needed. With all thy gettings, get a good wife.

The future is bright with promise, the cities are the open doors—the Macedonian calls. God grant that we may enter now more fully upon this important work!

Eureka College Debt Fund.

The following will be of interest to those who have been watching the progress of the raising of the fund for relieving Eureka College from debt:

The finance committee of the board of trustees of Eureka College having carefully looked over the list of notes secured by Dr. J. H. Hardin and J. G. Waggoner for the purpose of liquidating the $30,000 of present indebtedness of said college, consider the notes good and sufficient, and payable according to the agreed conditions, and as an expression of high appreciation of the most valuable service rendered the college, and the entire brotherhood passed the following resolution.

Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting and the Disciples of Illinois are due to Pres. J. H. Hardin and J. G. Waggoner for the persistent, able and courteous manner in which they brought the needs of Eureka College before the people and secured from a liberal public the pledges necessary to liquidate its indebtedness. Idaho Encampment.

The fourth annual camp meeting of North Idaho was held at Lewiston May 26 to June 6. The Christian Church of this part of the state owns a good tent with a seating capacity of about four hundred. This was pitched in the central part of the city, and the services were well attended by the citizens generally. Near by was a little field of cottage tents, where a number of families were quartered, some from remote parts as the Camas Prairie and Nez Perces countries.

Lewiston is a beautiful city of about 2,500 people, is a county-seat, and has the State Normal School. In addition to the already good steamboat navigation, a branch of the N. P. R. R. reaching Lewiston is nearing completion. The development of irrigation upon a large body of valuable land just across Snake River adds interest to the place. A town called Vineland is building up there, and will soon be connected with the city by bridge. The site of Lewiston can never be forgotten. It lies in the bend formed by the junction of the Clearwater and Snake Rivers. Just across to the north lies an immense hill, lifting itself 2,500 feet to the level of the great Palouse country. This abrupt change in the altitude gives Lewiston a delightful climate of almost perpetual summer.

The Christian Church here was formed in the home of Bro. Cantril about a year ago, but they now meet in G. A. R. Hall, which can be rented only by the month. They began with very few members, and now have but 45, of these 15 were added during the camp meeting, mostly by baptism. Bro. J. O. Davis ministers for them half time. He is an earnest and capable young man, and the friends of the cause have reason to expect that this work will be blessed under his ministry. The visiting preachers in attendance were Bros. Daisley, of Pomeroy; Laing, of Vineland; Herrold, of Walla Walla; Smith, of Rosalea; and the writers, of Moscow and Pullman. The faithful band of disciples rejoice very much in the result of the meeting, and feel strengthened for the future.

This entire work is the outgrowth of the labors of Bro. Rogers, then of Moscow, who was holding a meeting near by, when he contracted his last illness. He died in the home of Bro. and Sister Mounce, who now stand as pillars under this work. Bro. Rogers still lives in this work, and his memory is sacred to all the people.

The camp meeting will be held next year at or near Nez Perces City.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

After one of the most interesting and successful conventions in our history, we have entered our twenty-third year, praying that it may surpass all preceding ones.

To this happy end, as in the past, I look to my preaching brethren as a chief dependence, knowing their love for Christ and the children.

Will all the schools keep in mind that the amount pledged at the Mexico convention is accepted by the board as the apportionment of your school? So that the schools so pledged need not answer the cards now going out, only as they remit the first quarter right away.

The board at its first meeting planned for some changes in the work, of which all will hear in due time, and which we are sure you will heartily and fully endorse.

Bro. D. R. Dungan remits in full his pledge for this new year, and the Marshall Endeavor does likewise. Alvah Clark, Perry, aslo sends in her pledge in full for the new year, which encourages us to believe that all, personal and school pledges, are to be paid with more promptness this year than ever. Thank these friends for such substantial manifestations of their co-operation with us.

Before the convention closed, John Giddens was arranging appointments, and immediately entered upon his work.

Brunswick, with J. P. Furnish as preacher, is pushing to the front in the Lord's work. Five years is the term of the Furnish pastorate, and the brethren seem to appreciate him today as they never did in the past. The children did not learn of the Reward of Merit Cards until near the convention, but they took right hold and have a creditable showing on the Roll of Merit in the convention minutes. The brethren handed me their apportionment for the year just closing in full.

The Marshall school, of which J. A. Gordon has been the superintendent, did not wait for the notice of quarterly dues, but remitted immediately.

Four schools have notified this office that they intend to carry the banner home from Plattsburg, one of which is Memphis, where J. T. Boone is doing such fine work, and where one of the boys carried off one of the gold medals.

We have among our county superintendents this year two more ladies, both of whom will assist us greatly. Miss Alice Potts, Lincoln, is the county superintendent of Benton, a county from which we have never had a full report in the past, but will hereafter. Mrs. Luella Hargis has kindly accepted the superintendency of Jackson, and will do for us what the others in the past have not succeeded in doing: give us a complete statistical report, with map of county, and you will see it on the wall at Plattsburg. Will some one speak for Buchanan?

At Huntsville, found I. J. Marshall just closing a successful meeting for J. A. Grimes. The school was just as prompt in meeting their apportionment as if I had worked a week for them. At Huntsville lives Miss Nora Kiernan, one of the first to volunteer her services as a county superintendent, and who has every year since given us such good reports as to come within a fraction of carrying off the banner. Aubrey Hammett is now the school superintendent, coming in from the country faithfully every Sunday; and yet people say, "Why, Bro. Davis, we live in the country," which seems to excuse all from duty. Does it?

At Arkadelphia, I sought to help a faithful band, small but devoted in service where Miss Susie Browning has taken the Normal course, solitary and alone, her grade on every book running near the 100 mark. While here it was my pleasure to unite in marriage Dr. O. R. Edmonds, Tina, and Miss Alva Creason, Avalon. Alva is a friend of long years' standing, while Dr. Edmonds is one of the rising young physicians of the state. Such unions bring happiness into the world.

To all the workers in Missouri, command us at any time for institutes.

Will You Help Us?

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS:—You have no doubt already heard that during an electrical storm, on the 8th inst., our church building was struck by lightning and was burned, and now we have no home. We had done all in our power to erect this building, and at last, with the aid of others, succeeded in relieving the church of all pecuniary embarrassments, but once again the task is before us, and we cheerfully begin the work of raising funds for another building, feeling confident that God will put it into the hearts of the people to assist us in this work. On the receipt of this my dear friends, think of the responsibility for the many unsaved souls around us, and there are many here that are still aliens from the cause of Christ, but the work is hampered. The gospel is the power of God unto salvation, men and women are willing to hear it, but we have no house to invite them to. So, in order to carry out our plans, and accomplish this work, we ask that every minister in Missouri bring the matter before their congregations, and give them the privilege of contributing something to assist us in rebuilding our church, the money to be paid on condition that we raise the amount necessary to put up the building.

All money sent by churches or individuals will be receipted for and deposited in Dunklin County Bank as a "Building Fund." In the event we fail to raise the amount necessary to insure a neat, modern brick building, we bind ourselves to return every cent to the contributors. Now, my dear friends, we sincerely ask your assistance in this matter, and feel that we will not be disappointed. May God help you to extend a helping hand to those who are so much in need of your assistance, and may God's blessing rest upon those who give cheerfully and willingly. We must have a church. Won't you help us? Address all communications to Indian Territory Convention.

Our convention met in South McAlister at time appointed.

Attendance was small—this we expected—those who attended were well paid doubtless for their time. Arthur W. Jones, of Ardmore, was elected secretary of the convention, and made a good one. F. D. Wharton, of Bloomington, Ind., led the singing to the delight of all. A. M. Cane, of Cincinnati, Ohio, was in attendance, and delighted all with his eloquence and advice. He will be remembered many days hence. H. A. Major, of Purcell, I. T., made a strong speech on the possibilities of the convention. Arthur W. Jones, W. H. Polk and others took part in the convention. Bro. C. C. Smith disappointed us, without even sending us an apology, but we forgive him.

The report of the corresponding secretary was read and received with much interest by the convention. I submit a few facts taken from the report: Total number of additions from all sources, 532; 10 churches organized during the year; two church houses built; money for salary for secretary $556.90; moneys raised in territory for church purpose $4,000.

We ask the attention of our brotherhood throughout the land to these figures, a larger number of additions for the amount of money expended than in any other part of the country and with the exception of a few meetings had by some outside men, this work was done by the secretary, on small pay. Why will not our members living in this country we are trying to evangelize and who are contributing to outside missions help us at home? Why will not the States take an interest in this struggle we are making in this territory, and help us? Why will not the Christian Endeavor of our brotherhood in Missouri, Kansas, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, Iowa and Texas and the churches as well come to our relief and help. Look over our brief figures, then act in the light of the facts.

Arthur W. Jones followed the convention with a protracted meeting at South McAlister. This leads us to say that he will hold any church a good meeting. Try him.

Gospel Melodies

Revised and Enlarged

Designed for the Use of All Christians in Public and Private Devotions

In offering this, the REVISED AND ENLARGED EDITION OF GOSPEL MELODIES, to the public, we confidently believe that the many excellent features of the work will recommend it to all who love good, pure words, and music adapted to their expression.

The typography is large and clear, with words printed between the music staves, so that both words and music may be seen at the same time.

An important feature of the book is the brief, practical treatise on the subject of learning to sing by note, as found in the thirteen pages of rudiments, prepared by a teacher of experience.

The "Supplement" contains a large number of the very best old standard songs, without which any book designed for use in public worship must seem incomplete.

The authors have earnestly endeavored to make this book worthy the patronage of the public.

WHAT THEY SAY ABOUT THE REVISED AND ENLARGED EDITION OF

GOSPEL MELODIES.

We like the book very much.—DR. J. R. WHITE.

Dear Sir and Bro.—I received "G. M." by this afternoon's mail. It's in good condition, and my sister is greatly pleased with the same—much more than with any other book we ever had.—ED. CABS.

Dear Sir:—Salem church purchased a supply of "Gospel Melodies" from your agent. All are highly pleased with the new books.—MISS BELLE CLISER.

I think your song books are the best I ever used.—E. Y. GAY.

I have examined your new song book, "Gospel Melodies Revised," and can heartily say it is the best book for revivals, Lord's day school worship and family circle, I have ever seen. The large, clear print, with the words between the staves, make it very convenient. The pure words and music adapted to their expression are indeed cheering and inspiring to all lovers of music. I cheerfully recommend to all who want a book next to the Bible, "Gospel Melodies."—D. M. CLISER.

PRICE.—Boards, Singly, by Mail, 40 Cents.

"Hear Ye Him."

CORNELIA P. BOZMAN.

I come not to the Mount,
Where smoke and flames arise,
And lurid lightnings flash athwart
The dark and angry skies,

And the loud trump of wrath
With Sinai thunder blend,
But unto Zion's holy hill,
To seek the sinner's Friend.

The spotless Lamb whose blood
Cleanses from every stain,
"Who will not break the bruised reed
Nor quench the struggling flame."

Jesus—the Friend divine
Who bore our grief and care,
Whose words of promise cannot fail,
"Give ear unto my prayer."

"Out of the depths" of sin,
I lift my cry to Thee,
Whose arm can bring salvation down,
And set the captive free.

Break every link that binds
The soul in Satan's chain—
Remove the heavy yoke and rend
His iron bonds in twain.

"To whom all power is given
In earth and heaven" above,
Who came to seek the lost, and light
A darkened world with love.

A contrite heart I bring
And count all things but loss
For Him who hath fulfilled the law
And "nailed it to the cross."

My fortress, rock and shield,
My hope, my hiding-place,
My Advocate, plead my cause
Before the Father's face.

Forgive my sins, dear Lord,
Even as I forgive
My brothers' debts, and grant me grace
As in Thy sight to live.

Walk with me day by day,
And light my thoughts on high;
Be near me when the shadows fall,
And give me grace to die.

The Legend of Chocorua.

MINNIE E. HADLEY.

"Good evening, Mr. Mulligan. Margery and I have driven all the way from the harbor to talk about closing the trade for the winter."

It was nearly dusk when the open carryall, conveying Mrs. Bingham and her daughter, drew up to the gate of a shabby-looking farm house among the White Mountains of New Hampshire.

"Margery and I have both worked hard and economized rigidly down in our little dress-making shop in Boston, to get the money to pay for the land, but I wouldn't take it under any considerations if I thought it wouldn't make good pasture for the cows, so that we can live by selling cream to summer boarders and butter to the Harbor people in winter."

"But I've heard a strange story of the intervale since I saw you last," continued Mrs. Bingham. "They tell me that long years ago, the whites chased Old Chief Chocorua to the top of yonder ledge whence, to avoid capture, he jumped to the awful depths below, pronouncing a direful curse upon the intervale, and that all cattle pastured here soon become diseased and die."

Farmer Mulligan sat down the two pails of foaming milk which he was just carrying in from the barnyard, and brought his fist down upon the gatepost with a heavy thwack.

"If yer the sensible woman I take yer fur, Misses Bingham, ye'll not give no credit to any sech silliness. I know them tales is allers being' told about here, and some keows have died on the intervale; but its only 'cause they're not keered fur. Why look at them four keows a standin' yonder. Healthier, fatter keows ye never seed an' been feedin' on the intervale more'n two year past. My wife made heaps o' money off of 'em afore she died, and I've been amakin' it sence, till that boy Bill o' mine got to bein' careless in strainin' away the milk.

"Them summer boarder's mighty pertick-lar an' Bill's clean spiled me hull trade by leaving keow-hairs an' specks o' dirt an' sech like in the milk.

"But a sensible woman like you ken take them four keows yonder an' make heaps o' money off f'm the intervale. Yer too wise lookin' to be believin' any o' them fool superstitions agoin' about."

"I guess I'll close the trade with you, Mr. Mulligan. My health is failing fast in the city. The doctor says I must breathe the fresh mountain air, and the scenery about here is such a delight to Margery. If the little cottage over there at the foot of Chocorua can be vacated by Monday I think we shall move in."

"Any time that ye set, Misses Bingham. Ad' ye'll take the four keows along with the intervale?"

"Yes, we must have something for a living. Do you hear one word we've been saying, Margery?"

Margery sat as one in a dream, gazing intently at the western sky, where bold old Chocorua projected its stern, rocky front against a background of crimson red.

To her poetical nature it was a mighty revelation—something for which her soul had always longed during her short life of fifteen years, but which she had never known before in the strict confines of their little shop in Boston. She heard her mother's decision with a vague incredulousness. To live here, to breathe into her very soul, as it were, this atmosphere of marvelous beauty, was something better than she had ever dreamed of.

However, it was all settled on that very evening before the little carryall drove away, and the end of the next week found them safely lodged in the little cottage at the foot of old Mt. Chocorua.

"It all seems so strange and dreamlike, mother," said Margery, one evening as they sat on their little back porch, gazing at the smooth stone face of the mountains which, illumined by the setting sun's reflection, seemed to be glaring down upon the valley, but whether with friendship or enmity Margery could not just make out.

"Its so different from our little shop in Boston. Do you suppose, mother, that we shall be permitted to live here in peace and plenty, or will the old Chief's curse be visited upon us as it has been upon others living here in the valley?"

"Nonsense, Margery! Don't let that spoil your happiness. No special ill has ever befallen the people of the intervale that I know of, except that their cattle have sometimes become diseased and died. But I think as Mr. Mulligan says, there must have been some special cause for it. I'm sure the cows we have bought from him are healthy enough. But what is it I see moving over there at the base of the mountain?"

"It's Bill Mulligan, mother. He's been there all the afternoon, cleaning out the spring and sinking a box into it for our cows to drink from. I was over there and talked to him this afternoon. He may be a good enough boy, but I don't like him, mother. He wears such shabby clothes and speaks such horrible English, but it isn't that I dislike so much as the mean, sneaking look he wears in his countenance. I guess it was what he said that makes me uneasy. He says the old Chief's curse is still living, and that we'll find it out soon enough. He says also that more than once the Mulligan family have sold this intervale at a good price and then bought it back again for almost nothing, because the people were glad to get rid of it. And what do you suppose I overheard the men saying up at the sawmill? They said it was a shame for old Farmer Mulligan to rob us of our hard-earned money. They said this patch of ground wasn't worth a cent to any one but him, and that we shall soon be glad to sell it back for little or nothing. All the people about here, in fact, seem to think that the Mulligans have for generations back possessed a secret charm that wards off the curse and no one can find out what it is."

"Tut! Margery! What nonsense!"

But in spite of Mrs. Bingham's seeming indifference, she sometimes felt a vague superstitious dread of something, she knew not what, and her own feelings almost frightened her.

"If we put our trust in God and try to serve him he will certainly prosper us. If it was not his will that I should die of oxygen starvation, pent up in that little shop, it cannot be his will that I should die here of food starvation. No, Margery, my faith is stronger than that. God will protect us from any wicked schemes or plots if we trust him, and as for that curse it is an empty superstition."

Margery felt comforted by her mother's strong faith, but resolved to shun Bill Mulligan for the future.

She positively disliked his sneaking, wizard-like face, and his evil predictions only rendered her angry and miserable.

"I wonder what sort of view one could get from the top of that low ledge?" said Margery the next evening as she and her mother sat as usual watching the sunset on Chocorua. "I'm going to run across and see, mother, if it is growing a little late; it won't take but a moment."

The next instant she was bounding over the intervale like a startled deer. Away she ran, bareheaded, with her long, black curls floating out in the gentle evening breeze.

To scramble to the top of the ledge was for her agile body but the work of a few minutes, and she soon stood gazing down upon a delightful portion of the intervale which she had not yet seen. A little white, worn path was just visible in the gathering twilight. It seemed to lead out from a sort of excavation under the rocky ledge on which she was standing and then to meander off through the green grass in the direction of the Mulligan farm house.

"I wonder what it's for," thought Mar gery. "There must be something of importance under this ledge. I shall soon find out."

A clump of dwarf pines were growing along the ledge of the cliff to which Margery clung for support in her descent, and soon she found herself at the opening of a little hollow cavern under the ledge.

"Why, what a queer little hollow! And what's all this stuff piled into it for?"

There were pineknots, cobblestones, brush, sticks, and all sorts of debris heaped promiscuously into the hollow.

"Some one has done this for a purpose. I'm going to see what it all means."

It was growing dark and Margery almost felt afraid, but she stooped down bravely and was just in the act of rolling away a huge cobblestone when something seized her by the arm and drew her forcibly back.

With a terrified shriek Margery tore herherself from the grasp, and turning quickly around she beheld the wizard-like face of Bill Mulligan staring at her with a broad grin, but with the same evil-looking eye glaring out from under the old slouch hat.

"How dare you touch me!" cried Margery, indignantly, her large black eyes flashing like fire in the twilight.

"Keep cool, Miss. 'Twas fur yer own good. Ye didn't know your danger. Them's a den of poisonous snakes as ever drew a breath an' to a been bit by 'em 'ud a killed ye quicker'n lightning."

"But what's the path for?" asked Margery, in a more subdued tone.

"Me an' par an' a lot o' men use to come up here every day an' try ter kill 'em out —that's what made the path. But sakes alive! 'Twant no use. Ten come to life for ever one killed."

"Better not come near this place again, miss. 'Taint safe for no woman."

"Thank you," coldly answered Margery as she started for home, in a swifter run than she had come.

"I don't believe a word of it, mother," she cried indignantly after relating her story.

"There is something else under that rocky ledge and it has something to do with the charm for the old Chief's curse and I know it. I shall not rest until I've made out what it is."

"Don't worry over it, Margery, and don't go near there again," answered her mother. "I don't see what it matters to us whether it's a den of snakes or a den of witches so long as they don't trouble us."

Two months passed quietly and prosperously for the new residents at the intervale, and the snake episode was almost forgotten when something happened one morning which brought matters to a crisis.

It was a bright June morning and Margery stood by the front gate as usual with well-filled milk-cans awaiting the arrival of the hotel boy who came regularly at this hour of the morning to take the cream to the summer hotel.

At length the cart drawn by the lazy white horse came slowly up the hill with its driver lounging still more lazily on the front seat, partially shielded from the sun's rays by an immense straw hat.

To Margery's great surprise he motioned her back when she started to meet him with the milk-cans.

"Don't bring 'em out miss, jes drew over ter tell ye we can't take no more o' yer cream up t' the hotel."

"yer' cows are gettin' the disease that ever one o' 'em gets that pasters here, but Dan Mulligan's. That ole Indian did'nt curse this here ground fur nothin'!"

"Look 't the hair on that cow's back now!"

He reached the butt end of his whip through the barnyard gate and rubbed at a little tuft of loose hair on Brindle's back which immediately fell off.

"I know it," said Margery. "They are all getting that way; mother and I noticed it yesterday and thought they were shedding."

"Cows don't shed this time o' year. Its the curse an' nothin' else. That's the way they all git."

"No use yer tryin' ter sell any more cream an' butter in this neighborhood. Good mornin'!"

"It's upon us already," thought Margery, and as she turned toward the house the very ground seemed sinking beneath her feet.

That night she and her mother sat talking until long after midnight trying to plan what to do.

All they had was invested in this little home and now their only means of subsistance was taken away.

To go back to the city meant death to Mrs. Bingham and they both realized it, and in spite of the direful curse which seemed to hover over them from the first, both had learned to love and cherish the old mountain as a part of their lives.

At length Mrs. Bingham fell asleep in her chair.

A heavy thunder storm had come up early in the evening and it had been raining hard all night.

It was almost two o'clock in the morning when it broke away and Margery sat by the window gazing off in the direction of old Chocorua.

The moon arose and as Margery looked she saw two men approaching Snake Ledge as she had called it since her adventure.

It was Bill Mulligan and his father. Margery watched them with beating heart. Directly she saw them carrying more debris and filling up the hollow.

"If I could only reach the top of the ledge unobserved and listen what they are saying."

Seizing a light shawl she threw it around her and by a circuitous path soon reached the ledge unnoticed.

She crouched in the midst of the little pine thicket and listened. Every word they said was distinctly heard.

Suddenly her heart gave a great leap for joy. She had found the charm for the curse!

Quietly she stole from her hiding-place and ran breathlessly to the summer hotel. "Tell Mr. Murchison, the geologist, that I must see him at once," she said to the night clerk. "He knows me and will not mind being disturbed."

Margery knew him in Boston and since his stay in the mountains they had become better friends and had talked together a great deal about the mysterious cause and its charm.

"Eureka!" shouted Margery, joyfully when he appeared at the door.

"Come with me at once and analyze the spring water that our cows have been drnking. I'm sure it contains mineral ingredients that causes them to become diseased."

"And what do you suppose is under Snake Ledge?" she continued.

"A spring of pure water at which the Mulligan cows have always drank and which they have tried to choke up since we came here. They've added a fresh supply to it this morning already owing to this heavy rain, and my little white path is nothing more nor less than a cow path."

Scientific investigations revealed the truth of what she said.

The Mulligans for generations back had changed the drinking places for the cattle so quietly by opening up one spring and choking up the other with every transfer of the land that the simple and superstitious country people had never discovered the fraud.

Now that it was brought to light, Dan Mulligan and his son were given just one week in which to sell out and leave the neighborhood or else suffer a "tar and feathering."

Their place was soon sold to one Mrs. Bingham's old Boston patrons for a summer home.

Snake Springs as it is now called soon restored the health of the diseased cows which were suffering from the excess of mineral ingredients in the other one.

Alaskan Letter.

We have moved a little lower down the lake in order to try our boats. They are all right, except a little small; we are as far down as we can get until the ice goes out of Lake Marsh. We are passed the police station at Tagish and they search everything in an outfit; they overhauled our boat completely. They have a good deal of trouble about whisky. One of the officers told Mr. Garrison that he was looking for whisky, but he said we had a dry boat; he could not find a drop in our outfit if he should hunt a month, that is one article we did not buy. They seem to be nice men, and I guess they hunt for whisky more than anything else.

It seems that I have been gone a year, and yet it is only three months. But time goes so slow up here—the days are so long. I can get up at three in the morning and it is real light and at seven or eight in the evening it is still sunshine; so you see we have plenty of daylight. We think we will go out of here in a week, but it is hard to tell as the nights keep cool and that holds the ice so much longer than if the wind at night was warm. We sleep comfortably under two blankets, but the days are quite warm.

We hear some good reports from the interior as we get lower down, but at first we could get no news of any kind, neither up nor down.

We came to this place yesterday and did not have time to fix boughs (Alaska feathers) under our blankets, and the ground was very hard, so we did not enjoy our nights rest much, so we have just finished fixing a place to rest, and it is very cozy indeed. I do wish you could see us, for we have things in good shape, and know how to take hold, our tent is 12x14 and we have our bed across the back end, and the stove is in the left hand front corner. I cook once in a while,but do not like it. I want to do my part, but I am such a poor excuse to do things like that; I can make bread, fry meat and cook fruit, so you see

I am not an expert at cooking a fancy meal.

I see several women, but only give them a passing look, but the rest of our crowd make a great ado, when they lay eyes on one. But to tell the truth they are all ugly.

I am in excellent health, and feel as well as I possibly could. This is a healthy country, and there are no contagious diseases up this way. I have only seen two sick men, and they were in that condition doubtless from overwork.

We had a very nice ride in our boat yesterday except in starting. Tagish Lake in some places is very shallow, our boat draws about eighteen inches and we had hard work for three miles to get her to go.

We all had on our high rubber bosts and we walked and pulled it until we struck deep water. We all got quite wet, as the wind was high and when the waves struck the boat the spray would fly ten feet high and fall on us, but the ice water seemed to do us good for we are in excellent shape to-day.

We are all careful as we can be and try to be on the safe side. Of course we do not know what is ahead of us, but I hope nothing but success is at the other end for us all. We were just one month too late in starting, for we could have gone on the ice as far as we wished to go, and as it is we lose a month in waiting, and as for the cold, we can all stand forty degrees below and work outside all day; a person can stand this cold and not mind it at all. Mr. Garrison wanted to come a month earlier, but his neighbors also said it was too early.

This has been a windy day and we did not work any. Charley Carlson and I went fishing this morning down the river in a skiff, but came back without a fish. I forgot to tell we are on Six Mile River just below the mouth of Tagish Lake about two miles, and about four from Marsh Lake which is about nineteen miles long.

We want to make one more move down the river to Marsh in order to get with another party of four; we will then lash our boats together, stretch a tent over them, so as to have a place to rest, put up sails and while one party manages the boats the other can rest; besides, in that way they will be less apt to rock and tip in a gale. My next letter will probably be written at Ft. Selkirk. A. D. BOURN.

Lake Tagish, Alaska, May 11, 1898.

Language of Flags.

To "strike the flag" is to lower the national colors in token of submission. Flags are used as the symbol of rank and command, the officers using them being called flag officers. Such flags are square, to distinguish them from other banners.

A "flag of truce" is a white flag displayed to an enemy to indicate a desire for a parley or a consultation.

The white flag is the sign of peace. After a battle parties from both sides often go out to the field to rescue the wounded or bury the dead, under the protection of a white flag.

The red flag is a sign of defiance, and is often used by revolutionists. In our service it is a mark of danger, and shows a vessel to be receiving or discharging her powder.

The black flag is a sign of piracy. The yellow flag shows a vessel to be at quarantine, and is a sign of contagious disease. A flag at half mast means mourning. Fishing and other vessels return with a flag at half mast to announce the death of some of the men. Dipping a flag is lowering it slightly and then hoisting it again to salute a vessel or fort.

Horned People.

Probably not one of our readers ever saw a man or woman with horns like a beast, and yet a number of such freaks of nature have been authenticated. A Paris journal contains an able article on the subject, and mention is made of a book in which the author describes seventy-one cases of horned human beings, the most of them being women. It is further shown that the horns of the women are usually longer than those of the men. In the British Museum is a specimen of a human horn eight inches long, and it at one time ornamented the head of an English nobleman. In the seventeenth century Mrs. Allen, of England, had a pair of horns of which she was very proud, and wore them all her life. They attracted to her many admirers. Another lady, known as the beautiful Mary Davis, had her horns cut off four times. One growth was presented to King Henry IV., of France. M. Lamprey, who traveled in Africa in 1887, reports a number of cases of horned people. He met a majestic-looking negro who had two horns, one on either side of his nose. It is recorded that a Mexican was seen with a horn seven inches long, containing three branches like the horns of a stag. There are well-authenticated cases of horns being found on dogs, horses, and even rabbits. There is mention of one case where a horn was found on a cat. These facts are gleaned from a recent issue of the Literary Digest. In ancient times horns were regarded as the emblem of strength. On some of the coins which he ordered, Alexander the Great had himself represented with a pair of horns. Michael Angelo, when he made a statue of Moses, pictured the hero of the wilderness with horns as a sign of his strength.—The Gospel Messenger.

Short Stories.

The Post says that among the specialists whom the government employs in Washington is a learned gentleman who was once the superintendent of a Sabbath-school. One of the stories he tells of that epoch is of a day when a visiting clergyman addressed the school. On the very front seat sat a pale little boy who had come to Sunday-school that morning for the first time in his life. He watched the visiting clergyman with almost painful interest. The visiting clergyman was a very large man, with great, dark eyes, and a voice like unto that of the bull of Bashan. He rose.

"Children," he thundered, "who made this glorious universe?"

His black eyes glared fiercely at the new boy on the front seat. The urchin squirmed and trembled.

"I did, sir," he said huskily, "but I won't ever do it again."

Some amusing stories are told of a well-known professor of theology who is both absent-minded and short-sighted. Once at a dinner party he took up his fork and plunged it into the hand resting on the tablecloth of the lady at his side, saying, "My bread, I believe." On another occasion his hat blew off and was carried by the wind into an adjoining garden, and away he went after it. He jumped over one wall, only to see it apparently flying over the next; and so he valiantly pursued it over half a dozen walls, and then found out it was a black cat. On going back to the starting-place he found his hat. The same man frequently mixes up words in preaching. For instance, "We all know what it is to have a half warmed fish (half formed wish) inside us," he said once. And again speaking of the different social grades of this mortal life he added, "But when we die we all come to a lead devil" (dead level).—Exchange.

He wanted to ask her to be his ownest own, but the conventional words he had studied up so carefully failed him. She guessed his purpose, but saw no chance to help him out.

"Did you read about the Manila cable?" he asked.

"Yes," she said. "It's cut."

There was a long silence.

"What do they do with cables that are cut?" she softly asked.

"Splice 'em," he answered.

She gave him a timid sidelong glance.

He woke up.

"Let's get spliced!" he hastily cried.

"Let's," she gently answered.

And the ordeal which had worried him for many weeks was suddenly forgotten.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

There is an old story of a maiden who sat in a boat, on a lake, toying idly with a necklace of pearls. She did not notice that one end of the string had become unloosened, and that the pearls were slipping, one by one, irrecoverably into the water, until they were nearly all gone from her possession forever. Then she burst into tears. But a wise friend admonished her that she was permitting the moments and hours and days to slip from the strand of life, losing them forever, and urged her to a more serious and thoughtful existence, lest she become bankrupt at last in the entire loss of what is infinitely more valuable than pearls. And she awoke. It was a dream. But she was made wiser by it, and set about making her life one full of usefulness and earnest action. Then, though the days passed by, she became wiser and better, and did not lose the days, because she kept what they brought to her life.—Christian Leader.

Kisses for Mother.

Keep your warmest, tenderest kisses for mother's lips. What though her face is growing wrinkled, and silver threads are multiplying on her head. Away back when you were little she kissed you when no one else was tempted by your fever-tainted breath and swolen face. You were not so attractive then as now. And then the midnight kisses with which she routed so many bad dreams as she leaned over your restless pillow have all been on interest these long years. Do not forget to pay them back, principal and interest.

Profanity.

One of the most common and most reprehensible practices on earth is profanity. Most vices, in some degree at least, gratify him to practice them. But profanity is one that absolutely affords no gratification of any kind. It is simply repugnant to the finer feelings and better instincts of humanity without one single compensating feature. There is neither gain nor momentary pleasure about it, and hence it is, of all sins, the most foolish and most inexplicable. The man who is an habitual swearer disgusts all who hear him, even those who use an oath occasionaly themselves. Guard your temper and you will be less prone to profanity.—The Messenger.

WIFE'S AWFUL ECZEMA

My wife was in the most horrible condition of any human being, from Eczema. She could neither sit down nor lie down, her torture was so intense. I tried all the doctors that I could reach, but she got so that I firmly believe she would have died within twelve hours if I had not been advised of CUTICURA REMEDIES and got them. My wife went to sleep in two hours after the first application, although she had not slept for seven days, and with two boxes of CUTICURA (ointment) and one cake of CUTICURA SOAP she was absolutely cured, and is well and hearty to-day.

ROYAL INJUSTICE IN ISRAEL.*

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

The present study affords a glimpse of the character of Ahab's reign in relation to the rights of the common people. The whole narrative of this portion of 1 Kings deals with the contrast between Ahab and Elijah. The two men represented the opposite principles in government. Ahab was a bold, wise, far-sighted king whose ambition it was to increase the power of Israel on the line of Solomon's empire. The king was to be everything. Alliances with foreign nations would cement the power of the throne. While the worship of Jehovah was recognized as the state religion, it must not be regarded as the exclusive religion of the realm. It was more important that the friendship and assistance of the neighboring states be secured than that the ancient worship of God be safeguarded. If the best interests of Israel demanded an alliance with Phœnicia by marriage, there could be no special objection to the introduction of the worship of Phœnician gods under official sanction. With these ideas of Ahab went along the enrichment of his capital. Solomon himself was outdone. He had possessed a throne of ivory, but Ahab built a palace in which ivory was so extensively used in decoration that it was called the "ivory palace" (1 Kings 22:39). In all these things Jezebel seems to have ably seconded her ambitious husband.

But Elijah presented the opposite tendency in state and religion. He was opposed to the enrichment of the nation, because it menanced the simpler life of the people. The policy of kings like Solomon, Ahab and Jeroboam II. was always antagonized by the prophets, who perceived in it the promise of approaching danger to the true faith. But in the present study another point of opposition is developed. The kings had always respected the rights of the citizens. Among these rights one of the most cherished was the holding of ancestral estates, which were recognized as belonging sacredly to the families holding them from the beginning. This sentiment was sanctioned by established custom and found its embodiment, at least later on, in the statutes of the land (Lev. 25:18-28). The conflict of the growing monarchy with this sentiment occurred when Ahab sought to gain possession of a certain vineyard owned by Naboth, a citizen of Jezreel. The king wanted the property for a park. He could not understand why a property owner should not be willing to dispose of his field if he was offered a sufficient price, or a more desirable property in exchange. The narrative indicates that Ahab made Naboth a perfectly fair offer for his vineyard, and that the latter chose to refuse to part with his hereditary possession, which was his right. He could sell or he could refuse to sell. He chose the latter course, and Ahab knew enough of the sentiment of the people he governed to respect the will of a freeholder in Israel. No king had ever ventured to tamper with such privileges. There was nothing to do but submit, and though Ahab could ill brook the disappointment, he knew of no means of success. Petulent, thwarted and checked in his personal desires, he went to the palace, threw himself upon his bed and turned his face in anger to the wall.

But Jezebel, his wife, shared none of his scruples. She had been reared in a land where autocratic power was more firmly established, and the rights of the common people less safeguarded than in Israel. Indeed, it must ever be of interest to the student of social conditions to observe the amount of independence which was preserved to the farmers, laborers and tradesmen of Israel. This was largely due to the work of the prophets who were the tribunes of the people, and often stood between them and royal tyranny. Jezebel roused Ahab to a sense of the power he ought to exercise. Did he really rule, or was he but king in name? She knew how such things were managed in other lands when a mere peasant resisted the will of his king with pretentions to "rights" of his own. Whatever may have been Ahab's misgivings as to the success of his wife's plan, he was too much interested in getting the field to refuse her his consent. And here began the crime. Ahab would have dropped the project on its first rejection by Naboth, but led on by the masterful spirit of his wife, he plunged into open violation of right and justice. His authority was invoked to work the destruction of the honest and sturdy freeholder, Naboth. A fast was proclaimed in token of a fearful crime which was imputed to the Jezreelite. He was arrested in the king's name. At the trial false witnesses, worthless fellows, were secured to testify that he had been heard to curse God and the king. On these grounds the condemnation of the man was secured, and he was taken outside the town and stoned to death, according to the Hebrew custom of inflicting capital punishment. All this was accomplished by the magistrates of Jezreel under the direction of Jezebel. Her influence was too great to be resisted except on pain of death. It seems likely that all this had been done without the knowledge of Ahab. He had not been responsible directly for the mock trial. But he could hardly have failed to suspect the means by which his wife would gain her ends, and it could have been no surprise to him when he was told by her that Naboth was dead and the vineyard was now his.

But when the king went down to take possession of the property, the brand of murder was on his soul. His abdication of power while his wife won for him the coveted treaure could not relieve him of responsibility. One morning centuries later, a Roman governor finding himself hard pressed between his conscience and a howling mob, abdicated his judgment-seat, washed his hands in token of freedom from all responsibility, and said, "See ye to it." But the ages have held Pilate responsible for the death of Jesus, and Ahab for the murder of Naboth.

The king went to Jezreel with a feeling of satisfaction. No obstacle hindered his enjoyment of Naboth's forfeited vineyard, and no citizen would henceforth dare refuse his royal demands. But while he walked about in his new possessions he was met by Elijah, the incarnation of divine displeasure at the king's misdeeds, the indignant tribune of the people denouncing justice on royal sin. His fierce words crushed the spirit of Ahab into abject humility, and sent him back to his palace to walk with bowed head and soft tread for many days. And later years witnessed the fulfillment of those words of fire; for when Ahab was brought back from battle to die, and his blood-stained chariot was washed at the pool of Samaria, men remembered that years before on that very spot there had lain the mangled body of Naboth of Jezreel; and when Jehu entered that summer capital of the kings of Israel, his horses trampled on the form of Jezebel of Zidon, and the children of Ahab, the last surviors of his house, perished by the sword of that same fierce charioteer.

SUGGESTIONS FOR TEACHING.

Naboth was a martyr to the cause of popular liberty, and his death was an eloquent protest against the irresponsible authority of kings. No sight is more humiliating than a man who is unable to control his own bad temper. Ahab is not the last who has sulked because he could not have his own way. It was the evil advice of an unscrupulous tempter that led Ahab into crime. We are responsible not only for what we do, but for what we permit to be done when we might prevent it. The children of belial "worthlessness" live among us yet; people who by evil suggestions, insinuations, slanders and falsehoods, ruin character. The rulers of a city or state, who do corrupt and wicked things at the bidding of a party boss or commercial dictator, are as despicable as were the cringing elders of Jezereel. Sin is sure to bring its penalty.

TOPIC FOR JULY 31.

THE EVILS OF COVETOUSNESS.

(Ex. 20:17; Luke 12:13-21.)

Perhaps this sin of covetousness is less spoken against, in proportion to its prevalence, than almost any other. Perhaps the very fact that one may rise above his origin in America more than in any other country, lays us liable to inordinate desire. We see men's splendid homes and wish we lived in them. We hear of men's great incomes and wonder why we might not just as well possess such advantages. We see clothes and carriages, social and intellectual opportunities, that others possess, far exceeding ours in value, and since we recognize no degrees of birth in our country, we ask why should one man possess these more than another. Some even covet other people's expensive men-servents and maid-servants. Some covet others' domestic felicity—their husbands or their wives—as if any one could be sure how much or how little domestic joy reigns behind the closed doors of any home. Fools that we are! Let us each go home to his own little cottage and bring into it all the heaven our hearts are big enough to carry.

So we see that the first great evil of covetousness is the discontent with our lot, born of comparison with others. The Greeks had a legend that once all the people of the world grew so disconted that they came together and each laid down his peculiar burden beside the others, and each chose another's burden and went his way in life. Then, behold! the discontent grew graver than ever. A great wail went up from all the earth, every one crying out for his own old burden. On an appointed day, then, all came together again, each took back his old lot in life and went on his way in joy. How do we know what there is behind the great stone fronts and oak doors of other people's possessions? Certainly men's happiness is not in proportion to the things that they possess. Whether these things be chattels or chances. Heaven sits not in coin and currency, lands or deeds, nor yet in intellectual or social or political opportunities. Heaven on earth is spun by that unresting little spider out of his own vitals—the heart.

"I swear 'tis better to be lowly born,
And range with humble livers in content,
Than to be perked up in a glistening grief
And wear a golden sorrow!
By my troth, I would not be a queen!"

But, poor Anne Boleyn, she was a queen, and uneasy lies the head that wears a crown, whether that crown be held in right of birth or of wealth and social leadership. When shall we learn to heed Paul's words, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith [or therein] to be content."

Envy is very close akin to malice, and there is grave danger of covetousness bringing a worse evil in its train—hatred. We hear social teachers imploring the rich to make displays of their wealth, lest the people should look on in anger. As if the removal of all temptation is possible, or could keep one's heart right, if it were possible! It is impossible but that inequalities should exist; let all men, high and low, make the most of it. It is not altogether certain that the high has the best. It is certain that he has not, unless he is the best. It was a close cousin of us all whose name was Patrick and of whom it is said that he was a communist. A friend asked him one day how he would reform society. "Well," said Pat, "I'd divoide iverything up aquel." "And don't you know, Pat, that in six weeks you'd have spent all yours, and the rich man would have hold of it again?" "Well, then," said our unabashed first cousin, "Oi'd be in for another divoide."

It is foolish and illogical to demand that all should share alike in the world's goods. How should we determine what are the goods and what are the bads? Riches are sometimes curses, while a hard lot often makes a soft heart. No use, then, to hate those who we fancy have fared better than we in the world's shake-up. Far better to be contented in our own little backyard, knowing that if it were not the best place for us to serve God this side of paradise, he would not have put us in it.

Covetousness sometimes even leads to crime. Many a man has been placed behind bars because of his inordinate craving for what another owned. All of us who covet are in danger of crime; if of no other crime, then the crime of covetousness. It is a crime against content, against usefulness, against cheerfulness, against ones home, against society, against God who made us and placed us here to make the most and best of our lot and of ourselves.

The C. E. Reading Courses.

A READING COURSE CATECHISM.

BY J. Z. TYLER.

General Editor and Manager.

[The following catechism contains in briefest form all necessary information concerning the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses. The questions are those most frequently sent to headquarters. Please read the answers carefully, and preserve for future reference.]

1. Must each reader own a handbook? It is best; yet two or more persons may be so situated that they can use one book in common without serious hindrance.

2. Is there a discount when a number of books are ordered at the same time? No; the books are sold to the single reader at the lowest price, so that further discount is impossible.

3. Is it required that cash accompany each order? Yes; we have no other means of paying the printer and of meeting other necessary expenses. Moreover, we have found that some forget to send the money at all if they do not send it with the order.

4. To whom should money orders, drafts, etc., be made payable and how should orders for supplies be addressed? Money orders, etc., should be made payable to the Bethany C. E. Company; the address is 798 Republic Street, Cleveland, Ohio.

5. Must those who paid membership fee for the past year be required to pay a similar fee for the second year and what is the amount? Yes; and the amount is still twenty-five cents a year, although we now give more than was originally intended. That twenty-five cents now pays not only for membership, but for the Bethany C. E. Bulletin for a year.

6. Is there an enrollment of members kept at headquarters? Yes; and between 3,500 and 4,000 persons actually enrolled during the first year.

7. Are the handbooks and the Bulletin sent directly to each member or to the Literary Leader to be distributed by him? That is to be just as each reading circle prefers. Perhaps it is better, as a general rule, to send all the supplies to the leader to be distributed by him to the individual readers; thus enabling him to keep the work better in hand. But supplies will be sent directly to the readers whenever preferred.

8. May subscription to the Bulletin begin at any time? It may be sent in at any time, but it will be credited as paying for the current volume and so will be credited to the beginning of that reading year. All subscriptions begin, therefore, with the October number.

9. May the reading be taken up at any time? Certainly; it is better to begin promptly with the beginning of the year. The year begins October 1, and closes July 1.

10. When should we begin to organize a circle? Begin early; the earlier the better. Your order for supplies would better be in at headquarters by Sept. 1, if possible. Earlier than that would be still better. If every society waits until nearly Oct. 1, it will be impossible for each order to receive prompt attention. Begin now.

11. Are the quarterly examinations important? We think they are. They secure definite results and aid in forming systematic habits of study. Besides, the certificate given at the close of the three years' course will be a souvenir worth having.

12. If persons find it impossible to take all three courses may they not take one or two? The readings are planned to be taken together, yet if persons find it really impossible to take all three they may take one or two, making their own selection. Some circles may prefer to complete the entire reading assigned to the year by giving three months, in turn, to each of the studies. This may be done.

13. Are the articles published week by week in the "C. E. Reading Column" of our church papers included in the required readings? No; but any one makes a serious mistake who does not give these articles a careful reading. They have been of a high order and contain much valuable information in addition to what is contained in the handbooks. Do not neglect the "C. E. Reading Column."

14. In what papers does the "C. E. Reading Column" appear, and why does it not appear in all? During the first year this column has appeared regularly in the Christian-Evangelist, the Christian Oracle, the Christian News, the Pacific Christian, the Christian Courier, Our Young Folks and the Gospel Messenger. We would be glad to publish these helps in all our papers if they would permit us.

15. Are the second series of handbooks—the handbooks for the second year—now ready, and what are they? No; they are not yet ready (July 1, 1898), but they are in course of preparation and we confidently expect to have them ready for delivery in September. H. L. Willett is preparing a handbook on "The Life and Teachings of Jesus;" W. J. Lhamon is preparing one on "The Missionary Fields and Forces of the Disciples;" F. D. Power is preparing one containing "Brief Sketches of Our Pioneers." There will probably be another handbook entitled "Bible Doctrine for Young Disciples," dealing directly with the doctrinal position of Disciples. The second series of handbooks will be along the same lines as the first and will be of similar size and appearance. We shall make every effort to keep them down to the same price. More definite announcement will appear in our church papers before the opening of the second year.

PHELPS.

Margaret Mitchell Russell was born in Kentucky, October 11, 1819. When 11 years of age she came with her parents to Illinois, riding the entire journey on horsback. She was married December 27, 1838, to William H. Phelps. Her husband died three years ago, her married life covering a period of 56 years. She was the mother of 11 children, six surviving her with a number of grandchildren. She became a Christian under the ministry of A. J. Kane in 1845. She died July 7, 1898, for 53 years a pious member of the Christian Church in Macomb, Ill. Always faithful. Funeral by brother L. D. Goodwin.

J. C. REYNOLDS.

GOSNEY.

Mrs. Lucy Hawes Gosney, one of God's dear and aged saints, passed to her eternal reward on June 4th, 1898, at the advanced age of 97 years, six months and one day. "Grandma" Gosney was born in Shelby county, Kentucky, December 3rd, 1800. Was married to Alfred Gosney at the early age of 18, with whom she lived in happy union until his death, in 1862. Twelve children were born to them, of whom seven are yet living. Previous to Sister Gosney moved from Kentucky to Indiana, in 1850. Here they were known, as they had been in their former home, as zealous Christians, fully committed to the plea of the Disciples, which they had both accepted at an early day in Kentucky. Sister Gosney confessed her Savior when a little girl, and united with the Baptist Church. When first the fathers of our reformation preached New Testament Christianity in Kentucky, the simplicity and beauty of their message won her heart and life, and she became an intelligent and earnest advocate of the principles for which they pleaded. Some 20 years after her husband's death, in 1882, Sister Gosney came with the family of her daughter, Mrs. S. V. Wilson, to Kansas City, Mo., where she made her home until her decease. During these latter years her sight was almost gone, and her general health was not good, so that she was deprived of the privileges of attending public worship. But her faith in God, patience in suffering, and unfailing cheerfulness of spirit were an inspiration to all who entered her presence. She was ministered to with unfailing kindness by her daughter and granddaughter and her son-in-law, who was to her all that the most affectionate son could have been. The weary years of her waiting for release from age and suffering were sweetened by their gentle and loving care. She is at rest with her dear ones who preceded her to the better land. We shall meet her again in the land of eternal youth and peace.

W. F. RICHARDSON.

Kansas City, Mo., June 6, 1898.

SARTORI.

Sister Sabra Ann Sartori was born in Marcelline, Illinois, December 21, 1842. Died in Springfield, Missouri, March 26, 1898. She was married May 28, 1868, to Matteo Sartori. Sister Sartori was one of the faithful members of South Street Christian Church. Her beautiful Christian character was a perpetual sermon. She was early surrounded with the influences of the Christian religion, her father being a minister of the gospel. Her young heart yielded easily to the gentle influences of the gospel and her entire life was but the unfolding and ripening of this seed sown in good ground. Sister Sartori was faithful unto the end and died in the triumphs of a living faith. She was laid to rest in the beautiful Maple Park cemetery, amid the evergreens and flowers, fit emblem of her beautiful and unending life. A husband, son and daughter are left to mourn this loving wife and mother. N. S.

MITCHELL.

Sunday morning, June 26th, Mrs. Catharine Mitchell, of Monmouth, Ill., fell asleep. Catharine Miller was born in Madison Co., Ohio, 1819; married Amos Haines and lived on a farm in Pickaway Co., Ohio., until 1840; moved to Henderson Co., Ill. Her husband died in 1855 leaving seven children. In 1857 she married Wm. C. Mitchell who died in 1881. Two children resulted from the second marriage. She was a member of the Christian Church more than 40 years, living a loyal Christian life, and the Rosette Church, this state, is largely a result of her bounty.

NEWCOMER.

J. S. Newcomer was instantly killed by a passing train on his farm at Falls City, Neb., the morning of July 4. Deceased was born in Fayette county, Pa., Jan. 28, 1829, where he was married May 27, 1851, to Elizabeth Stoner. From 1854 to 1881 the family lived in Stark county, Ill., and since then near Falls City, Neb. Four children have preceded him to the home above and six remain to comfort their lonely mother. He was a Christian for more than 50 years and ever faithfully led his family into the house of God. Every child born to this household early became a Christian save the one taken home to the Savior in infancy. Happy thought—a family united on earth and in heaven. Miss Annette, corresponding secretary of the Iowa C. W. B. M., was home for a short rest. Charles B. is in Berlin, Germany, where next year he finishes his four years' university course. As personal friend and former pastor the writer conducted the funeral services from the church where for 17 years the deceased had regularly worshiped God. His was a clean life. He kept the faith. A. The Christian Hymnist.

A New Church Singing Book.

A Brand-new Singing Book for All Departments of Church Work and Worship.
Over 300 pages, More than 500 Tunes, and between 600 and 700 Hymns.

Part One
Contains the old standard hymns and tunes, gathered from every available source, together with a large number of new tunes, written expressly for this book.

Part Two
Contains choice and valuable hymns and tunes of the "Gospel Songs" order by leading writers and composers.

In compiling and editing this book, both the Choir and Congregation were kept in mind, as, in fact, were all the departments of Church work where praise in song is given.

Choice Tunes
From such writers as TENNY, the FILLMORES, SHOWALTER, OGDEN, TOWNER, HERBERT, GABRIEL, ROBERTS, HOFFMAN, PAINTER, ROSECRANS, HAWES, WARE, KIEFFER, O'KANE, THOMPSON, DOANE, GIFFE, LANGLEY, DOUTHIT, SUFFERN, RHEEM, MOORE, KING, ALLEMAN, KURZENKNABE, CRIST, BELDEN, MCPHERSON, HUGG, MCINTOSH, MCCAULEY, LORENZ, HOPKINS, and others, will be found in this collection.

Our Own Writers
Another feature of the book is the number of our own hymn-writers represented: BATEMAN, BROWN, BRADLEY, COBB, TRICKETT, WRIGHT, GILCREST, and others.

The Music
In this work is sufficiently classical for the most cultured choir, yet of a character that can be comprehended and rendered by any congregation.

The topical arrangement of the work is so perfect that an appropriate hymn and tune for any occasion can readily be found.

"WONDERS OF THE SKY," or God's Glory Exhibited in the Heavens, by W. J. Russell, is just fresh from the press; handsomely bound in cloth, beautiful side stamp, and the price is 50 cents, postpaid. This book contains 82 pages, and the following table of contents will indicate the scope of this volume:

Preface, Introduction, The History of Astronomy, The Depths of Space, The Stars and their Number, Celestial Distances, Movements of the Stars, The Sun, Planets Farthest from the Sun, Asteroids, Are the Planets Inhabited? The Supreme Power.

The Gospel Advocate, Nashville, Tenn., says, "The author of 'The Exiled Prophet,' J. G. Encell, has spent twenty-five years investigating the Book of Revelation, and in this volume we have the fruits of his labor. In seventeen lectures the author gives what he believes to be the meauing of seven seals, the seven trumpets, wondors or signs, the first and second beasts, the returning church, the vials of wrath, the great harlot and her fate, and the millennial age."

"IN THE DAYS OF JEHU,"

By J. Breckenridge Ellis, is just in line with the Sunday-school lessons for the present quarter.

The lessons being found principally in the Book of Kings, this volume will be found a valuable aid to a thorough understanding of the Sunday-school lessons for the present quarter.

The characters of Elijah, Jehu, Jezebel, Ahab, Obadiah, Naboth and others are presented in such facinating style that the reader is both charmed and interested at the same time. The book contains 188 pages and the price is 75 cents.

New Books

IN THE DAYS OF JEHU. By J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS. 12mo, cloth, 75c.

A well written and intensely interesting Bible narrative. Without sacrificing historical accuracy, the author has given us a book more interesting than a work of pure fiction.

I have read "In the Days of Jehu" with interest and pleasure, and regard it, in a literary point of view, as a meritorious production. There is here shown an exceptional power of constructive imagination, and at the same time a wisdom of expression and soundness and reach of thought. Besides, the style is simple, lucid and good, so that the thoughts fall into the mind of the reader without effort on his part. I think there is opened up, in this book, a mine which will yield much good ore, whose metallurgy will enhance the interest of the sacred volume.—DR. H. CHRISTOPHER, Editor Medical Herald, St. Joseph, Mo.

THE EXILED PROPHET; or, What John Saw on Patmos. By J. G. ENCELL. 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

The author has devoted a great many years to the study of this wonderful book. Illustrated with nearly forty half-tone engravings.

This is a valuable book, prefaced by an essay on Daniel by Dr. D. R. Dungan, covering seventy pages, and is exceedingly interesting to the student of prophecy. The seventeen chapters following on the Book of Revelation are equally as interesting and evince much research and earnestness for the truth. The author's conclusions will generally be accepted, and a careful reading of the book will awaken new interest in What John Saw on the Isle of Patmos.—Christian Tribune, Baltimore, Md.

For a number of years the author has been giving the substance of this book in a series of illustrated lectures. The marvel is that he has succeeded in condensing the work to its present form. It is suggestive and stimulating, and is probably as readable and satisfactory as any small volume published on this riddle of the ages, called the Apocalypse.—Christian Oracle, Chicago.

LIFE OF ALEXANDER CAMPBELL. By THOMAS W. GRAFTON. With an introduction by Herbert L. Willett. Large 12mo, cloth, $1.00.

A condensed, concise and accurate account of the life of this great religious reformer, beginning with his boyhood, and following him through his trials and triumphs. It is written in an attractive style. It is just the book for the busy people.

People who know nothing about Mr. Campbell, and who wish to ascertain what manner of man he was, and what he taught, can obtain from this volume the desired information. There are tens of thousands of church members who should buy this book and read and master it.—The Missionary Intelligencer, Cincinnati, O.

AFTER PENTECOST, WHAT? By JAMES M. CAMPBELL, author of "Unto the Uttermost." 12mo, cloth, 297 pages, $1.00.

This work is a discussion of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit in its relation to modern Christological thought. The following Table of Contents will give an idea of the scope of the book: Introduction, The Significance of Pentecost, A Spiritual Christ, A Spiritual God, Spiritual Worship, A Spiritual Apprehension of Truth, An Influx of Spiritual Life, The Spiritual Man, Spiritual Holiness, Spiritual Authority, The Distribution of Spiritual Operations, The Impartation of Spiritual Power, The Production of Spiritual Works, The Formation of a Spiritual Society, The Inauguration of Spiritual Movements, The Establishment of a Spiritual Kingdom.

ROSA EMERSON; or, A Young Woman's Influence. A Story of the Lodge, the Church and the School. By JOHN AUG. WILLIAMS. 375 pages, cloth, $1.00.

Rosa represents most of the beautiful female virtues, and young Thornton is as bright and noble and fearless as a knight. Their love is strong and true, without the heartaches and heartbreaks which so frequently send the Cupid-smitten unfortunates dangerously near the mad-house. The whole-soulness that left no stone unturned to find the heir of the estate of the father French, and succeeded at last in laying the prize on the head of Simon Bugg, who was not a bugg at all, is as wild and beautiful as the story of Pythias and Damon. Here is another diamond, first in the rough, but polished, in the old way, with his own dust, until Simon French Stuart, as he proves to be, comes fearfully near getting the crown of heroism. I like the fine selection of characters, with which to expose hypocrisy and sham. Faithfulness in the discharge of duty is made to rank high above sectarian orthodoxy, and to throw a white light on the miserable sectarian apologies for religious conviction and Christian living. I hope the author will receive a liberal patronage, and the book a wide reading.—D. R. DUNGAN.

What We Plead For.

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

For the right against the wrong;
For the weak against the strong;
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.
For the truth, 'gainst superstition,
For the faith, against tradition,
For the hope, whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

PLAIN TALKS TO YOUNG MEN ON VITAL ISSUES. By PETER AINSLIE. 16mo, cloth, 60c.

Should be in every Sunday-school and Endeavor library. A good book for parents to give their sons. Treats in a masterly way gambling, cursing and swearing, lying, the theater, dancing, Christian service, etc.

THE LIFE OF JESUS. Edited by DR. FERDINAND PIPER, Professor of Theology in Berlin. Translated from the German by Wm. E. Clarke. 12mo, cloth, 310 pages, $1.00.

This book does not attempt a consecutive story of the Saviour's life, but is a compilation of sermons, by the leading minds of Germany, upon the overshadowing events, thereby comprehending his nature and mission. It is not, therefore, the product of one mind, but of many minds.

ACROSS THE GULF. By MRS. N. M. VANDERVOORT. 12mo, cloth, $1.00.

A wonderfully interesting and instructive story of the time of Christ.

The reading of "Across the Gulf" will awaken thought, strengthen faith, and stimulate the life of the reader to nobler service.—N. S. HAYNES.

The author is careful in her quotations of Scripture, and the harmony of Gospel narrative is happily preserved. The story centers about the ideal Christ, the author's aim being to lead the reader to reject all teaching that is morality only, and instead be drawn to the simple, yet pure and abiding faith and service in and for the Master.—Christian Leader, Cincinnati, O.

STUDIES IN ACTS; or, The New Testament Book of Beginnings. By W. J. LHAMON, M. A. Introduction by A. McLean, Corresponding Secretary of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Large 12mo, cloth, 416 pages, $1.25.

This book is not a commentary; it is not a collection of sermons; but it is a volume of essays, in which the author seizes upon the most critical and interesting portions of the Book of Acts, the strategic forces, and mountain peaks of its history. These he treats with a charm of style, a vigor of thought and mastery of material that have called forth the hearty praise of many readers, though the book is but recently from the press. 116 pages at the end of the volume are devoted to Notes and Comments. A few are by the author, but for the most part they are selections from first-class authorities, and are exceedingly helpful upon many difficult and important passages.

JESUS AS A TEACHER, AND THE MAKING OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By B. A. HINSDALE. 330 pages, 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

Contents: Jesus as a Teacher. An Introductory View. The Education of Jesus. His Insight into Mind and Character. His Relation to Tradition and Legalism. How Jesus Used the Scriptures. His Historical Antecedents. His Institutions. His Authority. His Use of Accommodation. His Methods of Teaching. His Recognition of Apperception. His Use of the Developing Method. His Recognition of Moral Perspective. How He Handled Cases. His Severity. Jesus and the Child. His Theory of Teaching. The Making of the New Testament.—Object and Point of View Stated. The Ministry of Jesus. The Preaching of the Apostles. The Epistles. The Gospels. The Evangelical Tradition. Some Characteristics of the Documents. The Canon in its First Stage. The Canon in its Second Stage. Further History of the Canon.

Professor B. A. Hinsdale, of the University of Michigan, is recognized throughout the country as one of the ablest teachers of teachers. His writings command the respect of every educator. He has recently published a volume entitled "Jesus as a Teacher, and the Making of the New Testament." Although the association of Prof. Hinsdale is with a denomination other than the Congregational, yet he is a man broad in religious and educational ideas. Therefore, everyone, whatever may be his ecclesiastical relations will find suggestions and helpfulness in this volume.—The Advance, Chicago, Ills.

ORGANIC EVOLUTION CONSIDERED. By ALFRED FAIRHURST, A. M., Professor of Natural Science in Kentucky University. 12mo, cloth, 386 pages, $1.50.

This is a very thorough and scholarly discussion of Organic Evolution by one who has had many years experience as a teacher of science.

Prof. Fairhurst has occupied the chair of Natural Science in the University of Kentucky for many years. He has not, like many college professors, contented himself with the daily routine of his work, but has been a diligent student of the several branches which he teaches, constantly extending his knowledge of them, and steadily increasing his skill in the laboratory. This book is the first result in printed form of these faithful scientific studies. It proves the author to be familiar with the writings of all the masters of the theory of organic evolution, and to so have studied them that he understands them well, and knows their weak points. At these points he has attacked their positions and arguments, and has successfully refuted them. His arguments are brief, crisp and satisfying. He understands the art of direct attack, which puts his opponent to flight without keeping his reader in suspense. It seems to me that any candid person who reads the book must close it with the conviction that the hypothesis of the origin of organic species by the process of evolution is not only an unproved hypothesis, as its ablest advocates admit, but one that is essentially false. In addition to what the author says on the subject of evolution, he furnishes the unscientific reader with a large amount of information about matter in its various forms and about organized beings that is both interesting and valuable. For this reason, as well as for its value as a refutation of the hypothesis which it chiefly combats, the book should have a wide circulation among intelligent people everywhere.—J. W. MCGARVEY, Lexington, Ky.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The situation at Santiago, Cuba, has undergone a great change since the surrender. The population is returning, business houses are being opened, ships are unloading their commerce, the people are being fed, the city is undergoing sanitation and a general air of cheerfulness and activity prevails where but a few days ago gloom, want, fear and demoralization were the prominent features. Many business men of the city and others interested in its well-being do not conceal their satisfaction that they are no longer under the dominion of Spain. General Wood, late Colonel Wood, of the Rough Riders, has been appointed military governor of the city, succeeding General McKibbin, who was first appointed to the position. Under the assurance of a stable government, administered in the interest of the people, goods are being rapidly rushed into Santiago, and the busy scenes of trade and commerce will soon take the place of carnage and bloodshed. What is taking place in Santiago is only an indication of what will take place throughout Cuba when Spanish rule gives place to modern and improved methods of government.

A regrettable feature of the campaign in Cuba, ending in the reduction of Santiago, is the defection of General Garcia and the offering of his resignation to General Gomez. In a letter to General Shafter he explains the cause of his action. He claims that while he had been a faithful subordinate to Gen. Shafter, cheerfully obeying his orders, according to the instructions of the Cuban Republic, yet when the city of Santiago surrendered to American arms he learned of the fact through other sources that Gen. Shafter who, in all the negotations, never conferred with or notified Garcia about the terms of surrender, and in the important ceremony of surrender he (Garcia) nor none of his staff were invited to represent the Cuban army on the occasion. This statement is in conflict with the report that he declined to take part in the ceremony of surrender because of his hatred of the Spanish who were allowed by Gen. Shafter to remain in the city, and further explanation is needed on this point. It is probable that Gen Garcia feels that he has not received the credit and honor due him on account of his long service for Cuba, but the chief cause of complaint, no doubt, is the liberal policy toward the Spanish, outlined by the President in his proclamation. These Cubans have suffered so much from Spanish cruelty that it is not strange, perhaps, that they should cherish the spirit of revenge and wish to gratify it by treating their oppressors as they have been treated. It is manifest, however, that the United States could not lend its sanction to such a method of warfare, or permit it. If the Cuban leaders lack the greatness which enables men to be generous even to their foes, it will prove a serious hindrance to the establishment of self-government in Cuba. The Cuban Junta in this country do not endorse the course of Gen. Garcia, and believe that with proper explanation the breech between the insurgents and the United States Army may be healed. Meanwhile, Gen. Garcia has retired with his forces into the interior.

Latest advices from Manila state that Aguinaldo, the insurgent leader in the Philippines, has declared himself dictator and proclaimed martial law throughout the island. Since the arrival of the American forces he has shown a decidedly hostile spirit. He has declined to see messengers sent to him by the American commanders on the pretext of being unwell or asleep, until Gen. Anderson has written him a letter that will probably develop his real attitude. It is reported that Gen. Anderson's forces are moving on Manila, without waiting for Gen. Merritt. The purpose is to capture South Manila first. The California troops, under command of Gen. Greene, are in the advance, and are only two miles from the Spanish lines. It is said that the Spanish troops in Manila, who have been expecting the fleets of Cervera and Camara to reinforce them, have just learned the fate of Cervera's fleet and the destination of Camara's, and are not a little dispirited over the news.

The Porto Rican expedition, under command of Gen. Miles, the commanding General of the United Stafes Army, is at this writing on its way to Port Rico, and the advance will have reached that island before this appears. It has been understood for sometime that after the fall of Santiago, Porto Rico would be the next objective point. The season is too advanced for campaigning in the region of Havana, and besides, it is a comparatively easy matter, now that the Spanish fleet is destroyed, to starve that city into submission while the war is being carried forward in other fields. It is hard on Gen. Blanco, of course, to be ingloriously starved out of the splendid fortifications he has built at such pains, without even an opportunity of winning military glory, but this war is not being waged for the special purpose of promoting the renown of Spain's captain-generals. If it were, its complete failure so far would have to be acknowledged. It is not probable that Gen. Miles would encounter very serious opposition in Porto Rico. The futility of resistance to our army and the co-operating battleships must be apparent, and as soon as Spanish "honor" has been satisfied the island will pass into the possession of the United States, where it will probably remain as a permanent part of our domain.

A dispatch from Santiago, lacking official confirmation at this writing, reports that Gen. Garcia, after leaving Santiago, met a force of 5,000 Spaniards coming into Santiago to surrender. The Spanish commander notified Garcia that his command was a part of the forces which surrendered to Gen. Shafter, but Gen. Garcia is said to have ignored this fact and continued his attack until he was defeated by the Spanish troops with considerable loss. This breach of faith and of civilized warfare is almost incredible, and we trust there is some explanation that will relieve this incident of its present ugly appearance. Vice-President Capote, of the Cuban Republic, now in this country, expresses sincere regret at Garcia's course, and is to return at once to Cuba to see if it is not possible to explain the situation to Garcia and other Cuban leaders, so they can understand the intention and policy of the United States toward Cuba. Perhaps sufficient pains have not been taken to make these leaders understand the aim of this government and its methods of procedure.

The reverses to Spain have had the effect of awakening activity among the Carlists of Spain. Don Carlos has been in Brussels for sometime watching the course of events and biding his time to make a decisive stroke for the throne of Spain, to which he believes he is legally entitled. His friends have been active of late, and it is thought that recent events have produced the conviction that the time is ripe for action. General Weyler is believed to be in sympathy with the Carlists, and it is reported that his visit to the north of Spain on the pretense of looking after his possessions in that region, is for the purpose of joining the Pretender in his proposed struggle for the throne. A great deal of uneasiness is felt among the friends of the present dynasty as to the loyalty of the Spanish troops, and Dona Isabella, sister-in-law of the Queen Regent, has been addressing the soldiers urging them to be loyal to the Queen. Martinez Campos is exercising the power of dictator in the interest of the present dynasty. Truly Spain's ship of state is riding at present over a stormy sea, but toward what port, no one can tell.

The facility with which the government loan of $200,000,000 was taken up by the small bids of $500 and less is a gratifying indication of the faith of the people in their government, and also of the improved financial condition of the country. Not only was the entire loan taken up within the time-limit, but six times the amount of the loan was asked for. The smaller bids received the preference, as was proper. The price of these 3 per cent. bonds has already advanced 103 3-8, but not many of the small investors have been tempted so far to part with their bonds. A great many banks are said to be anxious to secure these new bonds, and are willing to pay a reasonable premium for them. The eagerness to secure these 3 per cent. bonds is a striking illustration of the relation between the credit of the borrower and the rate of interest. The semi-annual payment of interest does not account for the difference in the rate of interest at which the government can borrow money and the rate which private individuals must pay. Perhaps there is some attractiveness about being a government bondholder, and we may hear less denunciation of this class in the future than we have heard in the past. The truth is, if all loans had been made popular as this one has been, there would have been less occasion for criticism.

The Carlist movement is not the only danger that threatens the present Spanish government. Republican leaders have recently declared their convictions in a circular, in which they blame the existing government for the Cuban war, and for the defeats of Spanish arms. After denouncing the policy of the government toward Cuba and toward the people of Spain, these republicans say:

We must take to heart the lesson which our sufferings are teaching us. Spain must be governed by Spaniards. We shall lose Cuba and all our possessions in foreign seas, but out of this loss will grow up, with God's help, a free people and a free country. We must see the country prosperous and happy, the people governing themselves and the money which is spent to-day to maintain a foreign family in luxury will be used under the Spanish republican regime to reconstruct our country, naturally rich in mines and agriculture, and to educate the youth of the kingdom. This money comes now from the pockets of the workingmen. Every one pays a school tax, but it is not the children of the poor who are benefited by this money. It is to the interests of the clergy and the government to keep the masses in dark ignorance that they may not comprehend what is transpiring around them, and only the sons and daughters of the wealthy receive that education which enables them later to make common cause with the spoils people, who have gone before them.

Assistant Naval Constructor Hobson has been on a visit to Washington, under orders from Admiral Sampson to report to the authorities there the condition of the vessels of Cervera's fleet, which were sunk by our warships. He was received very cordially by officials at Washington, and received an ovation from the people whenever they got sight of him. He bore himself very modestly and seemed more intent on having some of the Spanish vessels saved to our navy than on talking about his exploit. He believes it possible to float two of these vessels, the Cristobal Colon and the Infanta Maria Teresa, provided the wrecking force be increased and new appliances be supplied at once before the hurricane season sets in. These two ships, if saved, will make a handsome addition to our already formidable navy.

Since the destruction of Cervera's fleet Admiral Sampson has been engaged in capturing and destroying Spanish gunboats, a number of which are said to infest the Cuban coasts. The expedition to Nipe, on the North Coast of Cuba, has succeeded in destroying the Spanish cruiser, Jorge Juan, which was defending that harbor, "without any loss on our part." Commander Todd, of the Wilmington, also destroyed five gunboats and two transport ships and a storeship at Manzanillo last week. It was this work of our navy that caused a little delay in furnishing the convoy to the Porto Rican expedition.

LIVING AND DYING NATIONS.

In a recent speech by a distinguished English statesman, he classified the nations now existing on the earth as of two kinds—the living and the dying. It is a most striking classification and one that seems to be justified in the light of history and of existing conditions. Lord Salisbury, the statesman referred to, did not, of course, say what nations, in his judgment, were the living nations and which were the dying, nor did he say which class outnumbered the other. It is safe to say, however, that the living nations are only a few, if by a living nation is meant one that is not only growing stronger within itself, but is imposing its language, its laws and its civilization upon other peoples and nations. It is safe to assume, also, that the distinguished speaker referred to would include Great Britain and the United States as among and perhaps as the chief living nations on the globe to-day.

The classification is one that raises an important inquiry which is worth our while to consider. What are the essential differences between living and dying nations? Or, to put the question in another form, What are the essential elements of a living nation? What are the conditions and characteristics that cause it to live? The question is certainly one in which all lovers of their country should have a deep interest. The law of the Survival of the Fittest applies to nations as well as to animal and plant life. Nations live because they are fit to live, and because they answer the purpose for which government is instituted among men. Ceasing to subserve this end, they enter into a moribund condition, and sooner or later pass away. But still the question may be pressed, as to what are the elements ofpower that fit a nation to live, and that enable it to fulfill the purpose for which a nation exists. This is the question that touches the very core of our national life and destiny.

In answering this question we assume the existence of a Supreme and All-wise God, from whom all governments derive their sanction and power. The state or nation is a part of the divine scheme for the education, development and well-being of the race. It is safe to assume that God, who guides the courses of the planets, whose word upholds the material universe, and whose providence is guiding the course of human history, has in view the moral discipline and spiritual welfare of mankind. So long as nations subserve this general purpose and are helpers rather than obstacles in lifting up the people to a higher plane of civilization, they are used of God in the accomplishment of his plans. But when they become engines of persecution, of oppression, enemies of human freedom and human progress, they run counter to the divine purpose, and it is only a question of time when the process of decay must set in and run its course to national dissolution. No one who believes in the sovereignty of God can doubt this proposition.

If, then, there are nations on the earth to-day that are in a dying condition, it is because they have forfeited their right to exist by failing to apprehend the divine purpose concerning man, and to work in harmony with that purpose. They have become obstructions to the execution of the divine plan for the well-being of man, and must give place to something that is better. If there are living nations it is because there are nations that stand for those things which God wishes to triumph in the earth. They will live as long as they stand for these eternal and immutable things, and thus serve the divine purpose. If they permit themselves to turn away from these high ends, they, too, will forfeit their right to live and must be classified with the dying nations.

In the light of these general principles it is not a difficult thing for the intelligent leaders of any civilized nation to tell whether the nation they represent is a living or dying nation. Does the nation stand for liberty, for freedom of conscience, for freedom of worship, for freedom to work out one's fortune and destiny according to his own judgment, in so far as he does not interfere with the rights of others? Does it hear the cry of the poor and the unfortunate? Does it relieve the oppressed? Are its laws and customs based on the principles of equity and truth? Is the government administered in the interest of the people, rather than of the governing classes? Is it seeking to promote the enlightenment of the people, and to give encouragement to all agencies and influences that make for the moral and spiritual development of men? Does it seek in its system of jurisprudence to enact such laws and administer them in such a way as will meet the demands of a righteous God? If these questions can be answered affirmatively, the nation is among the living. God has use for it. It is working along his lines and for the realization of his purpose.

On the contrary, if a nation exists for the benefit of its rulers, being based on hereditary rights, and seeks to keep the mass of the people in ignorance, lest they resist the unjust laws and restraints which are imposed upon them; if it does not permit its citizens to exercise their own free choice in the worship of God, but imposes upon them certain forms, creeds and ecclesastical usages; if it tends to build up castle walls between the people, and fails to recognize the inherent dignity and priceless worth of man as man; if it ignores the will of God as revealed in Christ, and refuses to respect the rights of all men, it is an obstacle in the way of human progress and of the divine purpose, and must needs be put away. It is a dying nation.

The principle involved in this is of universal application. It applies to men, to institutions, to churches and religious movements. The church of the future is to be the church that lends itself to God's great purposes; that lives, not for its own sake, nor its own glory, but for the well-being of man and the glory of God. The religious movement whose aim and tendency is to emphasize and promote those truths and principles which are vitally related to human good and to the extension of God's reign on earth has a sure hold on the future. It stands for things eternal. It is working with God, and whoever and whatever works with God lives and abides while God lives.

CHRISTIAN SERVICE.

What was the church established for? For self-edification? For social enjoyment and entertainment? For emotional satisfaction? For the gratification of æsthetic taste? Not for any of these exclusively or chiefly, but for service to God and man. The mission of the Christ is the mission of the Church of Christ; what he did we are to do. The church is in the world, not to be served, but to serve; it is not the world's master, but the world's servant; or rather it becomes the world's master by being the world's servant, as the Lord himself did. The church of the future will be the church that does the work of Christ in the world. Not the church of ritual, nor the church of creed, nor the church of dogma, nor the church of history, but the church of labor, and service, and sacrifice, and the Spirit of Christ. The church that strives to purify the community from corruption and temptation; to let in light on the dark places and drive out the unclean birds of the night; to make the city the city of God, and the country God's country, will survive as the true and only Church of Christ. But the church that sings and prays and preaches and sets up arrogant claims about creed and ritual, and wades neck deep in corruption without protest, will exist, if it exists at all, as a stench in the nostrils of God and all right-thinking men. As the servant of humanity the church must justify itself by what it does.

There are rich fields of service into which the church of to-day has scarcely begun to enter. What of the widely extended fields of commerce and politics? Has not this territory been the devil's own long enough? How would it do to take the kingdom of God and its righteousness into the court-house and into the counting-house? How would it do to take the Sermon on the Mount into the primary election? How would it do to take the Golden Rule into business transactions, and only take advantage of a man's necessities to gouge him as we would like him, under similar circumstances, to take advantage of our necessities to gouge us? This would work on us; I wonder how it would work on the other fellow. Suppose business men try the experiment and then ask him. How would it do to make character and capability qualifications for office instead of idiotic platitudes and party shibboleths? When Sir Joshua Reynolds was asked how he mixed his paints, he answered, "I mix them with brains." Would it not be a good idea to mix the contents of the electoral urn with conscience? Do we not need God at the poles as much as we need him at the prayer-meeting? Yea, more, for the men go to the poles, but not to the prayer-meeting, and if there is anything on earth needed in this country, it is that God should have a chance at the men. There is a disposition on the part of Christian men to withdraw from all active participation in politics, on the ground of its corruption and its demoralizing influence on character. Christ might have refused to come to this world on the ground that it was too corrupt a place for him to touch, but would that not have been a poor way to save the world? Civil government is of God, and is a human necessity; patriotism is a virtue; good citizenship is a grace; moral corruption and rascality in citizenship are a disgrace, and how can anything be purified by the refusal of good men to even make an effort to reform it? The devil gets into everything in these days. He gets into art; he paints pictures. He gets into music; he sings songs. He gets into poetry; he writes verse. He bulks to eleplantine proportions in modern literature, and runs away with the wagon in politics, and who shall go into these spheres of influence to drive "Auld Clootie oot" but good men, who cannot be bought with his money or corrupted by his wiles? There is no greater realm for Christian influence and Christian service than the purification of American politics.

Another world, and perhaps the biggest world for Christian service, is childhood. It is known to fools scarcely less than to philosophers that children are molded by the dominant influence brought to bear upon them in the plastic period of life, and the spiritual corallary of this fact makes it our business to create a religious atmosphere out of which children will grow up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. There are more than two hundred thousand children in the Sunday-schools of the state in which these lines are written, and more than six hundred thousand not in the Sunday-schools of this commonwealth, and it is not too much to say that multitudes of the latter are growing up in ignorance and as absolutely without a knowledge of God as the children of heathen lands. In towns and cities where churches abound there are hordes of children outside the sphere of religious training and influence. There are thousands of families in all our states without Bibles, and who never by any chance get so much as a peep at a scrap of religious literature. Swarms of boys are upon our streets on the Lord's day, smoking cigarettes, chewing the filthy weed, swearing, learning to gamble, secreting pistols and bottles of whisky and visiting places where their feet take hold on hell. Do churches and individual Christians understand the responsibility that all this lays on them? With this vast field stretching before us in which the devil is getting in his work to the demoralization of the country and the ruin of coming generations, is there not something better for Christian men and women to do than to spend their days in town and their nights around the card table? The first institution God established was the family, the second was the state, the third was the church. The domestic circle is the womb of civilization, the mother of states and churches. Here the foundation of the world's redemption and of the world's evolution of a better life is to be laid. When Christ said, "Suffer little children to come unto me," he converted the family into a church and brought the kingdom of God into the family. When you bring God and Christ and the Bible and the voice of prayer and an enlightened conscience into the family you do the most fruitful and far-reaching work for God in the power of mortal man to do. Other thoughts crowd for utterance on the great theme of Christian service, but hot weather and the demand for brevity admonish me to close at this point.

Hour of Prayer.

THE TRUE BREAD.

(Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, August 3.)

I am the living bread which came down out of heaven: if any man eat of this bread he shall live forever: yea, and the bread which I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world.—Jno. 6:51.

This language of Jesus grew out of a demand made upon Him by the caviling Jews, that He would perform some sign in order that they might believe on Him. They referred to the historic fact that Moses had provided their fathers with manna in the wilderness, and they asked Him what sign He would give them in order that they might trust Him. Jesus tells them in reply that it was not Moses that gave them bread out of heaven, but that it was His Father, and that the same Heavenly Father gives the true bread of heaven. The food which the Israelites received in the wilderness was not the true bread. It served only a temporary purpose, but "the bread of God is that which cometh down out of heaven and giveth life unto the world." This led them to say, "Lord, evermore give us this bread." When Jesus proceeded, however, to say, "I am the living bread which came down out of heaven," and that "the bread which I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world," they were puzzled, confused and unable to understand Him. It was the old story of attempting to interpret the figurative language of Jesus in a literal sense. Even many of His disciples stumbled at the words and went back and walked no more with Him. And yet the words of Jesus state one of the profoundest truths of revelation.

What is the meaning of the language? We understand that bread is the staff of life, and that it is essential to sustain and develop the physical life. What Jesus means is that as bread satisfies the hunger of the body, so he came into the world to satisfy the hunger of the heart, to furnish spiritual nourishment for the souls of men. There is a hunger of the soul, as well as of the body. This hunger must be met in order to the life and growth of the soul, just as the hunger of the body must be provided for in order to its life and growth. Jesus Christ came to supply men's spiritual needs. These needs are: the truth concerning God and man, the duties of the present life, the reality of the life beyond, forgiveness of sin, and strength imparted to overcame the evils of the world. All these, with that love and sympathy which the heart can find nowhere else, Jesus came to supply.

But in order to supply what our humanity needed, Jesus must needs die. The grain of corn must fall into the ground and die, or it abideth alone. He was to give his body to be sacrificed for the sins of the world. It was this fact that led Him to say, "The bread which I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world." It was through His death that we are enabled to know the height and depth of the love of God for sinful men. It was by means of His death that we are to be reconciled to God and receive forgiveness of sins. Hence His flesh becomes the life of the world.

We eat of this bread and drink of this blood by faith as we appropriate the teaching of Christ. Our souls are strengthened, our heart-hunger is appeased, only as we feed upon Christ, that is, believe upon Him, accept him and obey his teaching. This is to be a partaker of Christ. It is said, sometimes, that this language refers to the Lord's supper. It is truer, however, to say that this language of Jesus, and the Lord's supper both refer to the same great fact, that men live spiritually by becoming partakers of Christ, and sharers in His life. The Lord's supper sets this truth forth in symbol; Jesus here states it in figurative language.

There is no hunger so fierce as the hunger of the heart. There is nothing in all the world to satisfy it outside of Christ and His teaching. The heart cries out for the living God, for a loving Father and Helper. Jesus came to show us the Father. He came to manifest that love and sympathy for which the heart craves. He came to make possible that fellowship with God, without which man cannot attain to his highest estate, nor enjoy the greatest peace. The heart longs to know about the future, the life that lies beyond the grave. Only Christ has brought us the highest assurance of that life, and its nature. The heart longs for strength to overcome the evils of the flesh, and Jesus Christ alone supplies this strength. The human heart hungers for forgiveness and fellowship with God. Christ alone makes possible this forgiveness and fellowship.

When we come to see, as we ought to see, that in Christ Jesus all the deepest wants of the soul are met, and all its needs provided for, surely we shall be more loyal to Him and serve Him with greater fidelity. He would then, indeed, become to us "the fairest among ten thousand and the one altogether lovely." May it be that this meditation and study on this great truth—that Christ is the true bread, that alone satisfies the hunger of the heart—will lead us into closer fellowship with Him, and into more loyal and loving service for the extension of His kingdom.

PRAYER.

O, Thou loving and all-pitying Father, who hast heard the cry of Thine earthly children, and hast provided for their needs, we do thank Thee for the gift of Christ and for His ability to supply all our wants. Thou knowest, O God, what are the desires and aspirations of the human heart, for Thou hast created it. Thou knowest that there is nothing in the material world to satisfy the soul's hunger and thirst for truth, for love, for God. In order to provide for all our needs Thou didst give us Thine only-begotten Son, not only to live for us here in the flesh, but to die for us, that His flesh might become the bread of humanity. We bless Thy name that we have been permitted in some measure to partake of this bread and to rejoice in the satisfaction of soul which it gives. O that we may all partake of it more freely, to the end that we may have a more abundant life in this present world, and live with Thee forever in the world to come. And this in Christ's name. Amen!

For Foreign Missions.

Comparing the receipts for Foreign Missions for the week ending July 21st, with the corresponding time last year, shows the following:

Contributing:	1897	1898	Gain
Amount	$1,598.19	$11,123.57	$9,525.38

Of the above amount $9,690 was donated on the "Annuity Plan." There was a loss on the regular receipts of $164.62.

OR MACATAWA MUSINGS.

No book equals the Bible in its splendid similes. This splendid morning at Macatawa recalls a beautiful passage descriptive of –

"One that ruleth over men righteously,
That ruleth in the fear of God."

It is said of such an one, that—

"He shall be as the light of the morning,
When the sun riseth,
A morning without clouds;
When the tender grass springeth out of the earth,
Through clear shining after rain."

What can be more beautiful than such a morning? On yesterday evening the heavens were black with storm-clouds, whose rushing winds soon threw the lake into splendid fury. Few sights are grander than a storm approaching over the lake. At first all the tints of the clouds are reflected in the lake until the wind raises the billows and sends them like white-maned coursers chasing each other to the shore. Then came the rain, so much needed just now, in blinding sheets, blending cloud and lake into one, while the trees swayed their branches before the blast. But the clouds have passed with the night and it is—

"A morning without clouds;
When the tender grass sprlngeth out of the earth,
Through clear shining after ruin."

The son of Jesse was evidently a lover of nature, with a genius for expressing his thoughts in truly poetic language. Now that we have had an abundance of rain, our neighboring Dutch farmers will be able to continue their supply of fresh vegetables and fruits, which is one of the attractions nt Macatawa.

Religious services began here several weeks ago, Bros. Hughes, Earl and Everest occupying the platform in the order mentioned. On last Lord's day it fell to the lot of the Easy Chair Editor to preach, and he has seldom, if ever, addressed a more responsive audience. As on the previous Lord's day, the seats at the Auditorium were filled, while a number sat on the sand. One of the attractive features of the service on last Lord's day, both afternoon and evening, was a boy choir from the Presbyterian Church at Evanston, Ill., numbering about two dozen, who sang very sweetly. Last Lord's day evening we held the first of our beach meetings for the season, and it was one of the largest and best we have ever had. The unique character of these beach services attract a great many people who do not go to church. They like the large porportion of music, the short speeches, the picturesque scene of hundreds of people sitting upon the sand by the lake-shore, under the starlight, with their faces illuminated with the blazing bonfire, which is generally a feature of the meetings. It affords an excellent opportunity for sowing broadcast seeds of truth in minds and hearts that otherwise might not receive them. The freedom from all conventionality which prevails in these meetings, does not in the least interfere with the religious impressions made by these services. In witnessing the interest in these beach meetings, we have wondered whether it were not practicable for many of our churches in the cities, during the summer season, to unite their forces and hold outdoor evening services, which should take on some of the characteristics of our Sunday evening services at the beach, and whether such meetings would not be more profitable and more largely attended than the ordinary church services. The hint is thrown out for what it is worth.

The past week has been rather cool here, and as a result, perch fishing has been good. It is remarkable how many people there are, old and young, male and female, who delight in the angler's art. Greybeards and tiny children, stout dames and comely maids may be seen wending their way to the pier or the dock, carrying their poles with a look of eager expectancy on their faces. It is not an uncommon sight to see them returning with a string long enough to supply themselves and all their neighbors. The perch fishing is for the masses of the people, and all engage in it. The larger and gamer fish are caught in Black Lake, and only experts succeed in capturing many of those. The white and black bass are the great attractions here and the former are caught mostly at night. The lovers of piscatorial sport need not be out of employment here. It affords to many about the best means of mental rest which they can have, and in this respect it is more valuable by far than the actual worth of the fish caught, although fish constitutes an important feature of the menu in most of the cottages here.

The park is rapidly filling up now, and each day we see the faces of new arrivals. F. G. Tyrrell, of St. Louis, now Dr. Tyrrell by the act of the University of Missouri, is one of the latest arrivals. His family has been here for several weeks. Like ye Editor he has to unite some literary work with his outing, and the click of his reel must give place at times to the click of his typewriter. This union of literary work with fishing and boating is not a bad combination for those who are able to stand it. Bro. Tyrrell says so many of his flock are here that he felt it his duty to come up and look after them—so prone are men to seek to find conscientious motives for what they like to do! Bro. D. T. Kelley, superintendent of schools at Jeffersonville, Ind., has paid a brief visit to the park, spending last Lord's day here with a view to coming with his wife in Augast. He proposes conducting some nature-studies during August, to investigate the plant and animal life of this place, in connection with its geological character, provided he can secure a class. From present indications August is to be one of the fullest months for Macatawa Park it has ever had.

Macatawa Park has added a new attraction since last summer. An electric railway line, running down the south shore of Black Lake, connects this place with the city of Holland, six miles up at the head of the lake. The cars run every 15 minutes, and the people who visit Holland can now take their choice of riding on the little steamer or the electric cars. Both are pleasant methods of travel and the price of each is the same. There is naturally some rivalry betwen the two lines of travel, but since they both serve to accommodate the people of the park, and hence to promote its interests, they may prove mutually beneficial to each other in the long run. A little competition between lines of transportation is not a bad thing for the people, and in this case it has proven a decided benefit, not only in cheaper rates, but in better accommodations.

Current Religious Thought

Prof. Francis Brown, D. D., of Union Theological Seminary, has an interesting article in the Independent, July 14, on "A Comprehensive Church," the introduction to which reads as follows:

The Church, as God sees it, consists of those who are united to Christ. The ultimate test is one, not of opinion or act, but of a vital, spiritual relation, in which each is joined to Christ, and so becomes part of the organism made up of him and his. God's Church is comprehensive. It includes people of widely divergent views and habits, people who think quite differently about great things, and people who worship in different ways. The bond of union is that they are all Christians.

Now what men call the Church—the Church as it exists in manifest form on the earth—certainly ought to resemble as nearly as possible the Church as God sees it. Its real membership is made up of those who are united to Christ. God's Church and man's Church ought, therefore, to be exactly coterminous. No one holds that they really are. The defect is, of course, in man's Church. Men are not God; they do not see as clearly as God sees, and in making up the roll in man's Church some names are entered which God does not enter, and some omitted which God includes. But human imperfectness does not annul the responsibility of endeavoring to make man's Church correspond with God's Church. What men think the Church ought to contain all those united to Christ. It ought to be as comprehensive as God's Church is.

But we have the curious phenomenon of a great number of human organizations, calling themselves Churches, each of which recognizes, often with sincere joy, that it does not contain all the real Christians there are—that there are many truly united to Christ not among its members—excluding those whose union to Christ it does not question, and even recommending to them that they join another organization. To one who considers the essential test of church membership this is wholly anomalous. If opinions, or usages, were the essential test, then those whose opinions or usages were adjudged to be wrong might logically be excluded. But they could not then be logically regarded as true Christians, whatever other organization they might join. How, then, since union to Christ determines real church membership, can I logically drive out from my Church men whose real church membership I acknowledge? The situation is wholly anomalous. The ideal Church on earth will have done with this anomaly and be truly comprehensive, with ample room for difference of opinion and of religious usage—like God's Church always—making the one condition, that its members shall be really Christians.

The reception of members and ministers by one church from another in the future he thinks will become more common and in better spirit. On this subject Prof. Brown in his article says:

This ideal may seem remote, but it suggests a very practical question. In the anomalous situation in which we are, what is the duty of the separate organizations? The situation can not be changed in a day, or a week. Church unity is the goal, but what shall we do now? What is the duty of the different Church organizations in the meantime? Manifestly, to remove the barriers by which they are separated as far as possible under the circumstances. Each must try to keep out as few real Christians as possible, who desire to enter it. This is more and more the case. Individuals pass somewhat freely in Protestantism from one Christian denomination to another, without changing their opinions, and following their choice or convenience in the matter of usages. Such conditions as are imposed on the transfer consist, more and more, either of some formal recognition of transfer, or of some endeavor to make clear the individual's relation to Christ.

In the reception and transfer of Church officers, and specifically ministers, the matter is not quite so simple. Various bodies have somewhat rigid tests in the form of assent to elaborate creeds, or of the satisfaction of some majority as to theological opinions, or both; the acceptance of certain theories, the conformity to certain practices are required. Those who do not pass muster may be highly commended for their Christian character and bidden a sincere God-speed if they turn to another organization, but as teachers and pastors in the particular one which has examined them they are rejected.

Now the ideal of the Christian ministry neither contemplates nor tolerates any such thing as this. The one necessary requirement is that the ministry which men recognize should be the ministry which God recognizes. If a man is fit to be a minister in God's Church, then he is fit to be a minister in my Church. What, then, are the tests of fitness? Obviously, the essential test of church membership is fundamental here also. The minister must be a real Christian It is right that especial pains should be taken to secure this. Besides this, for his particular work the minister needs particular gifts and attainments. It is right that he should be examined, to ascertain that he has them. But will the ideal Church exact more than this? Will she demand adherence to a standard of orthodox opinion and the adoption of an approved set of religious habits and usages? It is easy to answer this question by saying that since the minister is set to preach the truth, and to order the affairs of the Church, his adherence to the truth and to the right ecclesiastical order is, of course, to be determined before he is received into the ministry. But it is quite certain that the ideal Church will not require of any of its ministers, as a condition of their ministry, opinions and usages which it does not require of all. That means that the fundamental requirements of opinion and usage are few and easily defined. It is doubtless necessary that a minister should hold to certain truths and practices, in order that the force of his Christian character, and the use of his attainments and gifts may be for the increase and edification of the Church. It might not be easy to secure prompt agreement as to what these truths and practices are. But matters now confined to some fragment of the entire Church certainly do not belong to the essential requirements. The necessary demands are in fact common to all parts of the Church. If you recognize co-ordinate branches of the Church, it is incongruous to deny a man entrance to the ministry of one on account of opinion, while you bid him God-speed in the ministry of another. The anomalous, divided condition of Christendom has exalted this incongruity into an important principle. Sometime Christians will come to understand the Church better, and then the anomaly and the incongruity will pass away together.

After a further discussion the relation of each candidate for membership or its ministry to a Church creed Prof. Brown suggests the following possible course of conduct as a partial solution of the barriers to a closer unity. He says:

1. The Church may see to it that it scrupulously keeps its part of the contract, imposing no new and arbitrary tests, and showing itself eager to recognize all the rights of its office-bearers.

2. The Church may interpret largely and with true respect and love, the fidelity of its office-bearers to their agreement.

3. The Church may remember, always, that the form of its contract is at best a temporary one, a makeshift, due to imperfect conditions, and that severe and harsh interpretation of its requirements is out of place.

4. The Church may make it evident that the contractual element in its relation to its office-holders is not that upon which it chiefly dwells. The ministry is a consecration to high service, with divine sanction, and should be considered chiefly from the point of view of efficiency in accomplishing its divine ends.

5. The church may fix its eyes steadfastly on those ends, and never allow itself to forget that it exists, not to promote any one branch of God's work at the expense of others, but for the growth and uplifting of the kingdom of Christ.

6. The Church may be constantly in an attitude of prayer and of receptiveness, longing and waiting for new visions of truth and new endowments of power, welcoming these when they come, and gratefully honoring, as messengers of God, those by whom they come.

For every separate Church organization thus to administer its own affairs in a Christian way will not, it is true, solve all our ecclesiastical problems; but it will surely beget the temper in which alone they can be solved. And when once these truly Christian thoughts and desires are in control, we shall have made a great advonce toward that Christian comprehension which is the Church's duty and privilege and power.

Rev. Dr. Amory H. Bradford, of Montclair, N. J., gave an address on the "International Relations of Congregationalism," at the triennial Congregational national council at Portland, Oregon, in which he gave utterance to the following words upon the necessity for a closer unity of God's people and the supreme object of all Christian missionary effort:

Every nation and every institution have those who interpret their meaning narrowly, and those who interpret it broadly; the former are sectarians in the church, and in the state they are absolutists and ultra-nationalists. Good causes are hindered by narrow interpretations and advanced by those who have detected in them diviner meanings. If Congregationalists glorify their past in order to build higher the walls which separate them from their brethren, the sooner they cease to be the better for the world. The days of denominationalism are numbered. The international mission of Congregationalism is not different from that of any of the free churches—meaning in this country by free churches nearly all except the Roman Catholic and Episcopalian communions; and that is, the preservation and promotion of the principles of Puritanism. These are to put conscience above tradition, to insist that the Spirit of God leads men now as truly as ever, and needs no church to interpret its message. The hope of a pure church and a pure state depends upon the development of men of the Puritan type. The days of the few are passed; democracy is the order of the future. Those who face the twentieth century are thinking of a church as broad as the kingdom of God, and a nation which knows itself to exist only to hasten that kingdom. It is the large privilege of the free churches, then, to co-operate with all who have entered into an appreciation of Christ's purpose to the world.

Here we are met by the fact that the free churches exist almost exclusively among English-speaking nations. Thus their international mission is to promote harmony among all such. English-speaking people are beginning to see eye to eye, learning what to forget and what to remember. It remains for men of Christian vision to make this harmony enduring, not that we may help one another against the world, but that we may join hands in leading the world toward unity and brotherhood. To uplift this ideal is the surpassing privilege of the pulpit, the throne of power in the free churches. Just now if two great peoples will bury their differences and link hands for the peace and welfare of the world, the day will be near when one man's good shall be all men's law. We may help to bind them together, then to permeate them with the principles of Puritanism, that the democracy of the future may be a people fearing God and receiving their laws from him, to the end that the unity of the world may be realized both politically and spiritually. That is no idle dream. The world is actually coming together. When the people say that war must go, the nations will have progressed a long way, even though for a time the strife among classes is intensified. The growth of democracy will take care of that.

To the end that the free churches may help change political unity when it shall come into actual harmony between the nations, education is required, and evangelization. The foreign missionary enterprise has not yet been understood. It is not a crusade to make Presbyterians or Episcopalians out of Buddhists or Vedantists; it is the proclamation of universal fatherhood and brotherhood, that the life of the universe and the ages is the love that led Jesus to the cross. Brotherhood is the larger patriotism. It is a great thing to be an American, but it is greater to be a man. A united world with no fatherhood and no brotherhood would end in anarchy. Others will push commerce; selfishness will promote education; but the Christian church alone appreciates the importance of evangelization, for it alone deals with man as a spirit. Not to win proselytes to any name, not to induce acceptance of any creed, much less to change Buddhist bigots into Christian bigots, are we commissioned; but we are called on to preach a personal God, the Father Almighty, to teach men to love one another with the love which was in Christ, to make the future democracy a blessing by helping every individual to realize that every other man is a child of God, and that the interests of one are the interests of all.

Failures for the week ending July 7th were $1,854,394 in amount, $946,611 manufacturing and $899,763 trading. Failures for the week have been 215 in the United States against 263 last year, and in Canada 23 against 27 last year.

Questions and Answers.

A preacher stated recently, in commenting on Matt. 20:23, that if we took immersion as a mode of baptism the candidate would have to be drowned entirely before his baptism was complete. What do you think of such exegesis? J. R. Dallas.

Vernonia, Ore.

It is too superficial, not to say partisanly stupid, to justify refutation. If the death of Christ and the disciples mentioned was a part of the baptism of suffering, why would not sprinkling as a mode of baptism entail drowning, or death in some form? The man who is not capable of seeing that baptism is here used figuratively to indicate the intense suffering with which Jesus was to be overwhelmed, needs some primary instruction before he undertakes to be an exegete.

1. What is the usual procedure among our churches when a member is being excluded from the church?

2. Supposing a member were recommended for expulsion by the official board, because he had committed an offense for which the New Testament requires exclusion, would it be proper to take a vote of the church on the matter? Or would it be assumed without question or vote, the law of the Lord would take effect. G.

1. After the proper investigation has been made, and all efforts exhausted to bring the offender to repentance, a statement to this effect is usually made to the congregation, with the recommendation that the wrong-doer be no longer regarded as a member of the church. If no objection is made to this decision, it stands as the order of the church.

2. The acquiescence or endorsement of the congregation is usually sought in some way; either by saying, "If there be no objection this recommendation will be considered as endorsed by the church," or by a formal vote. When the vote is taken, it is not upon the propriety of following the New Testament teaching, but is an expression of the judgment of the congregation as to whether the New Testament rule is being followed in this particular case under consideration.

1. Who were the messengers sent before the face of Jesus as recorded in Luke 9:52.

2. Did the incident recorded in Luke 9:54, where James and John wished to call fire from heaven, transpire after the feast of tabernacles or before?

1. The messengers sent before His face were some of His disciples, probably James and John, to make arrangements for his entertainment.

2. It is probable that Jesus was going to Jerusalem for the purpose of attending the feast of the dedication of the temple. As the main question between the Jews and the Samaritans was as to the proper place for the temple—whether at Jerusalem or Mt. Gerizim—the fact that Jesus was going to attend this feast would explain the feeling of hostility on the part of the Samaritans, which made them refuse their hospitality. On this supposition it was after the feast of tabernacles that the incident occurred.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST: — What you say in a late CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST Budget, commendatory of the monthly paper, the Boy's Friend, will doubtless meet with ready endorsement by the readers in general of its later issues; but—

1. Are you aware of the full-fledged secret society, "Knights of Character Castle," of which "order" the paper is the organ and ardent advocate; and for the enrollment of its youthful readers, in the membership of which society — with its ritual and ragalia, its grandiloquent titles and oath-taking—the paper mainly exists?

2. Inasmuch as one of the means being employed by the promoters of said society and paper for interesting and "holding" the boys is to drill and train them in the production of "plays" or dramatic performances, would it not seem that the tendency of such amateur theatricals—involving as they do the accessories of costuming, stage-settings, etc.—is to educate the boys in the direction of theater-going, if not to make some of them out-and-out theatre actors?

3. Would you advise the boys of Christian parents to connect themselves with a secret society of this or any other character, or may the cause of Christ be better subserved by them, in standing aloof from such alliances? W. P. KEELER.

Chicago, June 13, 1898.

1. We know there is some sort of organization with which the Boy's Friend is associated, and have heard that it has a secret feature in it. Our commendation, however, was of the paper alone. We are not sufficiently acquainted with the organization known as "Knights of Character Castle," to either commend or condemn it. We have no fondness for secret societies ourselves, but we would not like to condemn wholsale every organization that has the element of secrecy, as relates to passwords, grips, etc.

2. We are not able, with our meager knowledge of the society, to judge whether its tendency would be to promote a love for the spectacular and encourage theatre-going or not. We feel sure, however, that the men at the head of this organization have no such purpose in view, and do not recognize such a tendency if it exists.

3. A man's sentiments are best indicated by his action. We have never been connected with any secret society, no have we ever encouraged others to do so. Nevertheless, we have never felt that the Roman Catholic Church was justified in its war on secret societies. The best rule is to judge every society by its fruits. We would advise the boys of Christian parents to be guided in such matters largely by the advice of their parents.

NEED FOR A BETTER TRAINED MINISTRY.*

ALLAN B. PHILPUTT.

The effort now being made to enlarge the faculty and extend the course of biblical and ministerial training at this time-honored seat of learning should meet with the heartiest support.

From the beginning our people have been the friends of education. Mr. Campbell founded Bethany College for the training of men to preach the gospel. As our movement traveled westward it carried with it a zeal for learning evidenced in the attempts to found a college in almost every state where we had gained any considerable influence. Young men were encouraged to study the Bible in the original tongues as an equipment for the ministry. The higher studies were not by the founders of our movement deemed useless or dangerous.

To be sure they urged capable men to undertake the gospel ministry who had no such training. And so should we always. Learning is not the only qualification for a preacher of the gospel, nor is it an indispensable one. The church needs strong-handed, noble-hearted, unselfish men, of native ability and consecration, to herald her faith to the ends of the earth, and she can ill afford to turn away from such because they cannot read Greek and Hebrew. Collegiate training cannot make a preacher of the gospel out of a man who is not one without it. But it seems to me a most desirable acquisition if one is to attain the widest and best influence in his sacred calling. A minister to-day has no exemption over men of other callings. He will pass for just what he is worth—no more, and no less. If he is ignorant the people will know it, nor will a specious unction atone for his lack of understanding. If he is rude, uncouth in manner, discourteous and full of self-esteem, he will be despised, for such faults render a man unfit and unworthy of the high calling.

A preacher now has to face an intelligent public and treat a wide range of questions, and if he has not the equipments necessary to enable him to do this he is quickly made sensible of this lack.

1. We need better trained men to handle the questions of modern biblical scholarship. The "Higher Criticism" about which we hear so much is simply a method of investigating certain problems pertaining to the Scriptures. It was formerly too much in the hands of the enemies of supernatural religion and their conclusions were somewhat startling. Let us raise our own higher critics. If there is any good in this method we have as much right to it as anybody. Truth is truth, and whatsoever is not of truth will finally be sifted out and come to naught. We can, none of us, have any interest in anything that is not truth, and the Bible has a way of coming through the fires of criticism brighter and clearer than ever. This new way of looking at the Bible has come widely into vogue. Our ministry must meet it, reckon with it and use it. To this end technical training is necessary. At present many are incapable of either accepting or rejecting the conclusions of modern scholarship, for the reason that they cannot handle the data nor grasp the processes involved in arriving at those conclusions. The result is that matters involving the deepest and most patient research meet their fate at the hands of an unreasoning prejudice rather than a judicial and truth-loving temper.

A new theory may be accepted in just as ignorant and narrow a spirit as that by which it is rejected. The man who too readily accepts every new thing is less fit for leadership than the one who too stubbornly clings to the past. Oliver Wendell Holmes used to say that he preferred a conservative mellowing down to a liberal tightening up.

What we want is a ministry that shall be hospitable to new light and yet not weary of the old paths, a minister that shall hear with candor and decide with fearlessness, as far as the facts may warrant, these questions that trouble the surface of our times. What there is in the Bible will remain. It cannot get away. In the end every man must say with Paul, "We can do do nothing against the truth, but for the truth."

A minister of the gospel is supposed to understand and teach the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. Is this supposition likely to be well founded in the absence of the severe discipline of study and an acquaintance with the results of modern investigation and discusssion?

2. Our ministry should have a higher training in order to meet the intellectual demands of their congregations. Time was when the minister shared with the schoolmaster about all the learning there was going. But that day is past. Now the pew is getting ahead of the pulpit. There is scarcely a congregation to-day where there are not some who can take the preacher to book if he makes a slip in the discussion of current questions. Matters of social science and philosophy, matters of practical benevolence and ethical questions, as well as the more recondite subjects of historical and theological import, he must be familiar with or his influence and leadership are seriously impaired. I know the cant saying, "Let him preach the gospel, and have nothing to do with these questions." But if a man is to bring the gospel of Jesus Christ into the life of to-day he must do it along the lines of man's advancing thought and menacing problems and difficulties. The congregation demands of the pulpit a wider treatment of themes than formerly, and that, too, in a tolerant, irenic spirit. The old-time cocksureness about everything no longer goes with the public. They prefer "sweet reasonableness" and fairness. The preacher who swings an Indian club over his hearers may win the admiration of the unthinking, but he will make the judicious grieve. He must treat his themes in a modern spirit. He dare not proceed on assumptions which have ceased to be granted or follow methods of reasoning no longer recognized as legitimate, and which in other provinces of thought have been abandoned.

3. We need more first-hand preachers, men who read the Bible in the original tongues and who can get at the true sources of correct interpretation. Too many are preaching what they have heard others preach. It may be true gospel, but it is not come by first hand, and cannot be proclaimed with the ardor of discovery. Our fathers studied the Word for themselves. They hovered over it long and prayerfully, and when they spoke it was with the fire and conviction of prophets. Let us imitate their example. We must ever examine anew the sacred Word, for there is still much light to break forth from it. I am quite well aware that high linguistic attainments and research do not go very well with a busy preacher's life. Very few, perhaps, will keep up their Hebrew other than up on the top shelf. But our scholarship is too low and we must look to schools like this manned with university-trained men to elevate the standard.

"The conclusions of sacred scholarship are no longer the exclusive possession of scholars," says Mr. A. S. Peake, in his "Guide to Biblical Study," "but have become part of the consciousness of the age, distilled in every possible form into those subtle modes of common thought, distinctive of our time."

Those who decry schools of learning and the higher education of the ministry forget that it was scholarship of the most profound and patient kind that gave us the Bible in a tongue "understanded of the people." I once looked upon the Alexandrian manuscript of the New Testament in the British Museum, and to turn from that to a neatly printed copy of the English New Testament will give one some idea of what scholarship has done for the Bible.

He who holds in his hand a volume of the "Cambridge Bible Text-book for Schools and Colleges," has perhaps the most splendid specimen of what long years of patient and learned study can do in textual criticism, annotation, commentation, and explanation of the sacred Word. To put side by side with one of these tasty volumes the original manuscripts from which it has come is to invite a companion which will excite our wonder. The achievement is one of the greatest ever accomplished by the mind of man.

HINDRANCES TO SPIRITUAL ENDOWMENT.*

The chief characteristic of the Christian dispensation as seen by the prophets, by the forerunner of Christ, and even by Christ Himself, is the new and more copious outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and that not upon a chosen few, but "upon all flesh." The universality of this gracious gift was no less a striking feature of the new dispensation than the peculiar forms of its manifestation. The Prophet Joel, as quoted by the Apostle Peter on the occasion of the beginning of the fulfillment of his prophecy, said:

"And it shall be in the last days, saith God,
I will pour forth my Spirit upon all flesh:
And your sons and your daughters shall prophesy,
And your young men shall see visions,
And your old men shall dream dreams:
Yea, and on my servants and on my handmaidens in those days
Will I pour forth of my Spirit: and they shall prophesy."

It will be seen from this that the outpouring of the Spirit in the present dispensation is to be "upon all flesh." That is, no racial or national lines are to constitute a bar to this divine gift. Neither is it to be limited to sex, for "your sons and your daughters shall prophesy." It is wonderful how the Holy Spirit ignores our ecclesiastical rules and usages! Nor is it to be limited by age, for "your young men shall see visions and your old men shall dream dreams." Nor are social conditions to stand in the way of the universality of this spiritual endowment, for "on my servants and on my handmaidens in those days will I pour forth of my Spirit; and they shall prophesy." There is, then, no sectional line, no color line, no age line, no sex line, no social line, in the realm of the Spirit. All may claim and enjoy the benefits of that fullness of spiritual blessing peculiar to the Christian age.

It is in harmony with the prophecy of Joel that John said of his own ministry, in contrast with that of Christ, "I indeed baptize you in water unto repentance: but He that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: He shall baptize you in the Holy Spirit and in fire" (Matt. 3:11). Again, the Apostle John attributes to Christ's forerunner the following language: "I have beheld the Spirit descending as a dove out of heaven; and it abode upon Him. And I knew Him not: but He that sent me to baptize in water, He said unto me, Upon whomsoever ye shall see the Spirit descending and abiding upon Him, the same is He that baptizeth in the Holy Spirit" (John 1:32, 33). Jesus Himself said to His disciples after His resurrection, when charging them to tarry at Jerusalem until they were endued with power from on high, "For John baptized in water; but ye shall be baptized in the Holy Spirit not many days hence" (Acts 1:5). You will notice I follow the American Revisers in these quotations. I follow the American flag, whether it be in revising an English translation or in revising the Spanish civilization! Since Christ is here designated as the one who ministers the Holy Spirit, we may infer from this fact the universality of the gift, since He is the Savior of all men. It is safe to infer, also, that this gift of the Spirit which He confers is vitally related to the progress and triumph of His kingdom.

But all do not enjoy the illuminating, life-giving and strength-imparting influence of the Holy Spirit. Not all Christians, even, have availed themselves of those gifts of the Spirit which it is their privilege to enjoy as followers of Him whose special prerogative it is to administer the Holy Spirit in such measure as each one is fitted to receive. And this brings us to state some of the hindrances to the enjoyment of the fullness of the divine power which is the spiritual birthright of all Christians.

First of all, let it be said with emphasis, that the hindrances to the reception of the Holy Spirit in such measure as to fit each one to do the duty that is laid upon him, are not upon the divine side, but upon the human. Jesus taught that His Father is more willing to give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him than earthly parents are to give good gifts to their children. Besides, we have just seen the universality of the divine purpose in bestowing the fullness of spiritual blessings upon men in this age. We must look, therefore, to human conditions to find the hindrances to the reception of the Holy Spirit. Of course we encounter here the old problem of divine sovereignty and human freedom. But we waive it with the single remark that there is a reciprocity between the divine and human spirits, which the Scriptures everywhere recognize, and to which every man's consciousness testifies. God always and everywhere respects human volition and moves upon the human spirit in harmony with the laws of man's mental and moral constitution. If this were not so the salvation of man would be simply a question of the divine will, and that would be no question at all, for God wills the salvation of all men. But man's co-operation with God is no less necessary in the attainment of the highest spiritual blessing than in the matter of forgiveness or reconciliation with God.

It is plain that unbelief or disobedience would prove an effectual barrier against the reception of the Holy Spirit. The condition of the soul out of which unbelief and disobedience arise is in such antagonism with the Spirit of Christ that reciprocity is impossible. Faith and love are the lines which connect the human soul with the divine, and along which the divine life and power are conveyed to the human spirit. The stronger the faith and the love, the stronger will be the current of divine life that flows into the human soul. The divine law of cause and effect does not cease operation in the kingdom of the Spirit. The Holy Spirit is a divine personality and we must suppose that in His dealings with the human spirit He will act in accordance with the eternal principles and established laws of the divine order. We must not attribute to Him capriciousness, partiality or moodiness of disposition, as is sometimes unwittingly done in our theories of spiritual operation.

When Peter told the convicted Pentecostians to "repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit," he was laying down a fundamental law in the kingdom of God, namely, that an utter turning away from the sins of the past, a complete about-face, and an absolute, unconditional surrender to Jesus Christ as Lord of all, are conditions precedent to receiving, in its fullness, the gift of the Holy Spirit. Is it not probable that the lack of a thoroughgoing repentance, that reaches to the very core of the moral being and reverses the moral judgments, and a lurking spirit of disobedience which hesitates to make a full and open surrender to Jesus Christ are serious hindrances to the reception, on the part of many professed Christians, of the enduement of the Holy Spirit? The question at least deserves the serious consideration of every one who feels that his spiritual life is not what it ought to be, and that there are certain causes which hinder his progress in the divine life.

A wrong motive may vitiate our desire for the enduement with power from on high. Why do we desire the Holy Spirit? Is it that we may excel our brethren in this or that line of service which we have decided to enter upon and thus acquire reputation and influence among our fellows? Simon Magus wished the Holy Spirit in order to promote his own glory and gain. God does not grant His Spirit for such unworthy purposes. Are we willing to serve God in any humble sphere where his providence may place us? And are we desirous of having such measure and such particular gift of the Holy Spirit as will fit us for service in that sphere? If so we are in that condition of mind and heart which fits us to receive the spiritual gift which we need.

Perhaps we have a wrong theory or unstanding of the Holy Spirit, which hinders our reception of Him. It may be that we are looking for ecstasies and rhapsodies as the only sign of the presence of the Holy Spirit. Failing to receive this proof and refusing to accept others, we may be unconsciously rejecting the Holy Spirit. Perhaps we have been expecting such an illumination of the Holy Spirit as will free us from the obligation of studying and being guided by the Holy Scriptures. We regret to say that there are those who claim such a measure of the Holy Spirit as to render them independent, in a measure, of the teaching of Christ and of His apostles. It is very safe to say that any impulse that leads one to treat lightly any command or doctrine of Christ and His divinely guided apostles is not from the Holy Spirit, but from an un-holy spirit. It is as important to-day to "try the spirits" as it was in the times of the apostles. The standard by which we are to try them is the doctrine of Christ and the apostles. If any man receive not this doctrine, let him not claim to be a participant of the Holy Spirit, whose mission it is to exalt and glorify Christ and to give us an increasing knowledge of His person and work.

One of the most common hindrances, we think, to that enduement with power from on high, which all Christian workers need in order to the highest efficiency, is the lack of any high and worthy ideal of Christian life and Christian service. Too many of us are content with being nominal Christians and living a poor, lean spiritual life. There is no hungering and thirsting after righteousness. There is no exalted conception of what a Christian ought to be and do and suffer for the sake of Christ and the extension of His kingdom. About all that many of us aim at is to keep our lives sufficiently respectable to maintain fellowship with the church. We have not planned any hard service for the Master, any work of self-denial and self-immolation. There is a lack of that heroism in our Christian life which was so prominent a characteristic of the disciples of Jesus in the first age of the church. There are too few Hobsons in the church who are willing to sacrifice their own selfish ease and, if need be, life itself, on the altar of Christian service, in order to defeat the enemies of Christ. Such a spirit of self-abandon in the service of God would invite and insure such a measure of divine power as would qualify us for success in every righteous undertaking. If we would undertake larger things for God, and harder things, and things which require and anticipate the co-operation of Omnipotence to bring to a successful issue, we might well expect larger measures of divine power to accompany our efforts. God dealeth with us as with sons. What father is there among you who, if his son, for the honor, protection and welfare of the family, engage in some hard and difficult undertaking, will not stand by him with whatever measure of support he is able to render him until his task is accomplished? Not only so, but the father would feel proud that he had a son willing to engage in so difficult a task for the sake of the family and capable with his help of bringing it to successful completion. Who can doubt but that it would delight the heart of our Heavenly Father if His children here on earth, banking on His infinite resources, should engage in the largest and most difficult enterprises looking to the extension of His kingdom in the world and the redemption of the race? Who believes that He would withhold the necessary enduement of power from those who would give themselves, unselfishly and for His glory to enterprises that look to world-wide conquest in behalf of truth and righteousness?

After all this is only saying that what the church needs to-day above everything else is the utter consecration of itself and all its powers and energies to the speedy accomplishment of its divine mission in the world. If it would but lay itself out in earnest Christian endeavor to bring this world right speedily under the sway of Jesus Christ and manifest a willingness to surrender everything in its life, in its teaching or its practice that is a hindrance to the success of its holy mission, the very gates of heaven would be opened to pour out upon it such a measure of divine power as would soon make the church militant the church triumphant. The church needs to come to a clearer apprehension of its mission as the divine agent for extending the reign of God on earth. It needs to devote itself with more singleness of purpose to the carrying out of this mission in order to claim the promise of spiritual enduement and of the divine presence. The promise of Christ, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world," is made to a church that is seeking to make His reign universal. What vast spiritual enterprises await the aggressive action of the church! What mighty strongholds of Satan await the assault of the awakened and panoplied sons of light! Let the Church of God, like a mighty battleship, clear its deck for action and bring all its powers to bear against the batteries of sin and unrighteousness, of ignorance and superstition, if she would realize, to the fullest extent, the promise of the divine presence and experience that fullness of spiritual power and energy which God always grants to those who make themselves the agents for carrying out His beneficent purposes in the world.

It is well to hold on to the old gospel and to be zealous for "the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints;" but conservatism is a virtue which may easily degenerate into cowardice or timidity. We must take the old gospel and apply it to the new conditions of our time. Nor must we be afraid to face the new problems which have grown out of the progress of Christianity in the world. We cannot do this except our minds and hearts are opened to receive the new truths that God is revealing to us by His Spirit in the enlarging experience of the church, in unfolding pages of human history, and in the light that is shining from every department of human knowledge and research. We cannot tie ourselves to the theories and theologies which have been outgrown and which belong to the dead past and expect to receive the influx of the divine Spirit to fit us for the new tasks of to-day. The church must cut loose from everything but Christ and what Christ approves, and under His leadership and unimpeded by the ecclesiastical and theological lumber of the past go forth to face the new issues and fight new battles of our time. The church that expects to be Spirit-filled must be both progressive and aggressive.

May it not be that our divisions, our denominational rivalries and jealousies, our sectarian narrowness and party spirit, our excessive zeal in behalf of our denominational tenets and theories have prevented the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in richer abundance upon the church? Whatever may be said in justification of the origin of our denominationalism and its inevitableness under the conditions which have existed and the improbability that these denominations will cease to exist in our day, one thing at least is certain: the time has fully arrived in this closing decade of the nineteenth century when the church of the living God must put away its sectarian strifes, its small controversies, its mutual jealousies and close up its divided ranks for a united assault upon the strongholds of the enemy, if it is to hold the respect of thinking men and win the approval of Him who is its Founder and its living Head. We cannot be loyal to Christ and do less than this. Not until the church, in spite of differences of opinion and of organization, has learned to co-operate fraternally for the advancement of the kingdom of God will it be worthy to be called the bride of Christ. Not until the sacramental hosts of God shall consent to stand shoulder to shoulder, arm to arm and heart to heart against the serried ranks of the enemy and wage a united war against a common foe, will Christ's prayer for the unity of His disciples, breathed out under the shadow of the cross, be fulfilled. Not until this prayer of our divine Lord is fulfilled in a larger measure than it is to-day can the church hope to receive the fullness of the divine Spirit to equip it for the conquest of the world.

This, then, is our message: God waits to be gracious to His church. He is willing and anxious to pour out upon it the Holy Spirit in rich abundance, when it puts itself in condition to receive the blessing. But we must put away our unbelief and our disobedience before we are ready to receive the Holy Spirit. The man or the church that says this or that right thing cannot be accomplished is guilty of unbelief. To doubt that the right will triumph over wrong is practical atheism. The church must apprehend its true mission in the world and undertake it in earnest, in order to receive the fullness of the divine blessing. It can expect God's co-operation with it only as it is doing God's work. It must cut itself loose from those theologies and theories of the past which hinder its progress and must go forward, unhampered, to meet the new issues of our day. It must put away its alienations, its jealousies, its bitter controversies and close up the gaps in its columns and move forward as a united host under the leadership of King Jesus, if it is to conquer the strongholds of the enemy and win the world for Christ.

This will require faith and courage of a high order; but if we heed the voice of our great Leader we cannot hesitate as to our duty. How we were all thrilled by one of the reports of the night entrance of Commodore Dewey's fleet into Manila Harbor. When the captain of the flagship Olympia singnaled, "We are nearing Manila Bay," the Commordo resignaled, "Steam ahead!" A little further on and the captain again signaled, "We are now entering that part of the channel supposed to be mined." "Steam ahead!" was the Commodore's response, and he signaled back to the fleet, "Follow me!" Soon there was a flash on the shore and the boom of a cannon from one of the forts. "We are fired upon from one of the forts of the enemy," signaled one of the captains. "Steam ahead!" was signaled once more by the brave Commodore. On went the fleet in the darkness of the night, over submarine mines and under the frowning batteries of the enemy, until it reached the very center of the harbor where, when day dawned, the squadron stood in battle array, every ship floating the stars and stripes, and the band playing "The Star Spangled Banner!" There, before them, stood the Spanish battleships and the belching batteries of Fort Cavite. Then came the onset and the victory which thrilled the world!

So the church as the old gospel-clad ship of Zion moves forward through the moral darkness of the world to accomplish her divine mission. Ever and anon the signal is given by some too conservative leader, "There is danger ahead; we are leaving behind us the old theories, interpretations and usages of the past!" "Steam ahead!" is signaled back from our divine Commander. But another timid soul cries out, "The batteries of the enemy are opened upon us, because we are threatening their strongholds. The Christian Endeavor army in its war on political corruption and the liquor traffic is drawing upon us the fire of these powerful antagonists!" "Steam ahead!" comes back the response from our great Leader. "Had we not better be content with the progress we have made, and pause here and rest upon our laurels?" suggests some timid and cautious leader in the church. "Steam ahead!" is the decisive signal waved back from our supreme Commander from the heavenly heights.

Some glad morning, not far distant, let us hope, when the mists that now obscure the issues between the church and her foes, shall have cleared away, the whole ecclesiastical squadron shall appear in solid battle array, each vessel flying the banner of the cross with the name of Christ inscribed thereon in letters of light, and all confronting the hosts of unrighteousness and the forts and batteries of Satan. Then shall come the great and decisive battle in the age-long conflict between right and wrong. Then shall Righteousness triumph in the earth and Truth shall be crowned with everlasting victory!

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL AND WALTER SCOTT AS PREACHERS.

J. B. C.

On one occasion while Mr. Campbell was addressing one of the most intelligent audiences ever assembled in Kentucky, quite a number of highly gifted and educated men arose unconsciously to their feet and leaned forward towards the speaker as if fearing to lose a single word that fell from his lips, and what makes the case more remarkable is that many of them were the public advocates of the views he was assailing, as being in his judgment contrary to the Word of God; yet such was the force, clearness and eloquence that he brought to the task, that even those who differed from him could not but pay the high tribute which we have mentioned to his admirable powers of close thought, of lofty and brilliant expression! Campbell's greatness and strength may in a great measure be realized by a careful study of his writings, and it is a wonder that a selection of his original writings on the great variety of subjects through so many volumes of the Harbinger have not been collated and published for the public. The noblest efforts of his worthy fellow-laborer, as far as the expression is concerned, perished almost at their birth; they could not be reproduced by either speaker or hearer; the impressions made on the minds and hearts of those who heard him, will never fade until all things else shall fade. But the tablets on which those memories dear and sweet are written are perishable, and when the present generation passes, or rather when the remnant of those who heard him in his prime which yet lingers shall have passed away, the world will not know anything save by dim and imperfect tradition of the wonderful eloquence of this gifted, this princely man! I claim not to have set him forth faithfully as he seemed to me and the thousands who heard him, but these few fragments, imperfect as they are, will give some idea of the man. We can safely entrust the fame of Alexander Campbell to the proofs which his writings afford of his great, his eminent abilities.

We give a quotation or transcript from the celebrated George D. Prentice, editor of the Louisville Journal. The writer was then taking the Journal and proposed to furnish said extract to Dr. Richardson who was then writing the memoirs of Mr. Campbell. From the Journal we read as now found in the second volmue the following, viz.:

"ALEXANDER CAMPBEDL.

"This venerable and distinguished man is now in our city on business connected with his college at Bethany, so recently visited, as our readers know, with a very disastrous calamity. We are gratified to perceive that neither years nor trials—and his Atlantean shoulders support a mountainous weight of both—have seriously impaired his bodily strength or dimmed, much less quenched the marvelous fire of his spirit. In all the characteristics of manhood he is still in the fullness of maturity. And long may he retain this rare possession of his great powers.

"Alexander Campbell is unquestionably one of the most extraordinary men of our time. Putting wholly out of view his tenets, of which we of course have nothing to do, he claims by virtue of his intrinsic qualities, as manifested in his achievements, a place among the very foremost spirits of the age. His energy, self-reliance and self-fidelity, if we may use the expression, are of the stamp that belongs only to the world's first leaders in thought and action.

"His personal excellence is certainly without a stain or a shadow. His intellect, it is scarcely too much to say, is among the clearest, richest, profoundest ever vouchsafed to man. Indeed, it seems to us that in the faculty of abstract thinking, in, so to say, the sphere of pure thought, he has few if any living rivals. Every cultivated person of the slighest metaphysical turn who has heard Alexander Campbell in the pulpit or in the social circle must have been especially impressed by the wonderful faculty with which his faculties move in the . . . highest planes of thought. Ultimate facts stand forth as boldly in his consciousness as sensations do in that of most other men. He grasps and handles the highest, subtlest, most comprehensive principles as if they were the liveliest impressions of the senses. No poet's soul is more crowded with imagery than his is with the ripest forms of thought. Surely, the life of a man thus excellent and gifted is a part of the common treasure of society. In his essential character he belongs to no sect or party, but to the world!"

Our Budget.

—A sweet spirit brightens the world.

—Good literature enriches the mind.

—The heat and the burden of the day develop the soldier.

—The saloon must go some day, else God's not in his world.—Cumberland Presbyterian.

—The church that waits for the saloon to "go some day" will lose God first.

—The large display advertisement of Christian College, Columbia, Mo., in this paper, is worthy of special attention.

—The Christian Endeavor World, July 21, contains an excellent account of the Nashville convention, touching up all phases of it. It is a good all round report of a great convention.

—The date of the meeting of the Virginia Tidewater district has been changed from August 10-12 to August 9-11. All interested parties are requested to note this change.

—One of the handsomest pages of our large edition of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST last week was the advertisement of our colleges, on the last page.

—This war ought not to pass without bringing entire destruction to something beside Spanish fleets. The whole canteen system ought to meet the doom of Cervera's ships, and will if the forces that make for sobriety in America continue the pressure already begun upon the war department.—New York Voice.

—James C. Creel, for more than ten years the editor and publisher of the Church Register, has retired from the editorial chair, having sold his entire interest therein to brethren Hoffmann and Wilson, as we stated last week, and will devote all his time to preaching from pulpit and house to house. The Church Register under the new management is to be removed, renamed, reformed and issued every week after September 1st.

—The catalogue of the Female Orphan School of the Christian Church, at Camden Point, Mo., for 1899, in tuscan red cover, is a finely executed piece of work from the printer's standpoint and full of promise for orphan girls from the religious and philanthropic view-points. We are glad to note the increasing prosperity of this school.

—Wright & Marion have started the publication of a monthly magazine at Monett, Mo., called "Just Think." Its motto is, "Just Think on These Things;" its religion, "To do good;" and its field, "The world." Not an advertisement appears on its pages; just think! These brethren have shouldered a heavy task, but it is one of the results of their thoughts and we trust that they may succeed in their enterprise. Just Think, Vol. 1, No. 1, has some good thoughts.

—The Foreign Christian Missionary Society has received $9,690 on the "Annuity Plan" from J. Coop, Southport, England. About this time last year his brother, Frank Coop, turned over $5,000 to the society. It will be membered that these are the worthy sons of the lamented Timothy Coop, who was so generous in every good work. The "Annuity Plan" deserves the favorable consideration of those able to dispose of money in this way. This amount will be of the greatest service to the Foreign Society in providing much needed buildings on the mission fields.

—When alluding to Bro. Myers' work at Sedalia, Mo., we forgot that the splendid house in which the church worships had been built and dedicated under the ministry of M. M. Davis, now at Dallas, Texas. In round numbers the house was said to cost $40,000. The real cost of the house, we have since learned, was $37,500, including organ and furniture, and of this amount all but $5,000 was paid before the dedication. It is due both to Bro. Myers and to Bro. Davis to make this distinction between their labors at Sedalia. Both did a grand work for the church there, and both will be held in loving remembrance for the same. A second church has been organized in Sedalia and a good house of worship built for it during Bro. Myers' ministry.

—Captain Philip said the immortal words for this war: "Don't cheer; the poor fellows are dying." It is better than Nelson's, "England expects every man to do his duty," or his dying words, "Kiss me, Hardy," or Decatur's, "Don't give up the ship," or Wolfe's, "Then I die contentedly," or Grant's, "Let us have peace." They recall Bayard Taylor's, "The bravest are the tenderest, the loving are the daring." They are the passports of that Christian soldier to perpetual remembrance.—The Interior.

—The letter in this paper from the Statistical Burea, Washington, D. C., on our trade with China will doubtless be a surprise to our readers. When you read the article do not stop at its commercial value, but view the facts presented from a missionary view-point. The possibilities for the extension of Christ's name in China cannot be overestimated at this time.

—The following statements concerning the city of Sapphira, Montana, from Rev. Lynde Hartt in the June Atlantic is about as strong an argument in favor of Home Missions as can be produced:

Look down from the rocky crest of Mount Sapphira and ask yourself why the city looks so singularly flat and thick-set, says the Rev. Rollin Lynde Hartt in the June Atlantic. Is it because there are no trees, or, at any rate, none that rise above the second-story window-sills? Perhaps. Or is it because the houses are all so much of a size? Possibly. But there is a better explanation than either. It is because there are no church spires. Churches there are, but you must have sharp eyes to find them. They are little, they are insignificant, they are monuments of a disgraced and unpopular cause. Says Broncho Billy, "Look at them darned, contemptible churches—all-same shacks! I could buy out any three of 'em!" Out of 10,000 people, only 1,500 Protestant church-goers! Sapphira is a peculiar town, too, for in Sapphira there are classes and no masses, unless you call the Chinese merchants, mechanics and laundrymen masses. It is not the old problem of reaching the masses. It is the entirely new problem of reaching the classes. Cultured, law-abiding, progressive Sapphira has little toleratfon for religion. The tiny congregations in the tiny churches are made up mainly of women; a Sapphira church is a "lady chapel." A Montana business man objects to walking on the same side of the street with a church. There is still more truth than fiction in the old saying that "west of Bismarck there is no Sunday, and west of Miles City no God."

—The following letter from a soldier at Chickamauga will show the interest our soldiers take in good literature and in religious culture:

CHRISTIAN PUB. CO., ST. LOUIS, MO.:

Sirs and Brothers—I received the papers you so kindly sent, and as I could not read them all by myself I gave them to the boys. I only had enough for companys D, H and M, but what I did give out were received by all with an eagerness which shows that the Lord is not forgotten even in the army where every one is supposed to be as bad as they make them. We have a Y. M. C. A. Commission on the camp ground, and I can tell you it is a place where many of the boys hear the Word of God, and a good many have promised to lead a better life. We have services twice a week. You may send more pamphlets if you will, and I will do my best to put them in the boys' hands, and may be it will do some good, which I am in hopes it will. Before we left the barracks the Bible Society gave each soldier a Testament to keep, and the boys are making pretty good use of them.

Chickamauga, Ga., July 13, 1898.

—We are glad that Bro. Atkinson, of Wabash, Ind., has sufficiently recovered that he can send us a message again, which you will find in this paper; but we regret that he will not be able to resume his work as corresponding secretary of the Ministerial Relief Fund. Fortunately, however, an able successor to Bro. Atkinson has been chosen by the trustees of this fund, as you will see, and the work will be vigorously pushed while in Bro. Lucas' hands. Bro. Atkinson has done a grand work in behalf of aged and dependent ministers and their families, and will be held in sweet and lasting remembrance for it. And while he cannot prosecute this work farther, as he had hoped, we are glad that our gracious Father in Heaven has spared his life to his family and to the church, for many years, we trust. Even his presence with us will be an inspiration to good works and loving deeds. Note carefully his requests in his message in this paper and give Bro. Lucas your confidence and prayers, that he may prosper this work.

—All Bible-school, Endeavor and Prayer-meeting leaders should read "A Curious Incident," in this paper, and heed the implied moral. Get others to work.

—There were some delays in running our edition last week, due to adjustment of our new press to its work, which will explain why we were later than usual in getting to our readers last week.

—We have thought it not out of place to give our readers the picture of a few of the prominent men now leading our army and navy to victory in our war for the freedom of Cuba. This week we give an excellent cut of Admiral Sampson.

—Concerning the origin of this city, the same authority produces the following which largely accounts for its irreligious state:

The history of Sapphira is the history of the entire commonwealth. First there was gold —$30,000,000 of it in Humbug gulch. Then there were pioneers. Immediately there was a camp. Upon the vampires pounced the vigilantes. Out of vigilantism came law. With law came women. With women came civilization. With civilization came the "boom." The boom "busted" and you have Sapphira!

LOOKING FORWARD.

In view of the efforts which we have been putting forth to make the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST the equal of any religious journal in the land, we are expecting a very large increase in the number of our subscribers. Our progress in this direction during the present year has been steady and satisfactory.

We have endeavored to give to our readers the very best that their patronage would justify, and we feel that it is in place to thank the friends of first-class literature for the gratifying support they have given to us in this work. Our paper is now better in both appearance and quality of contents than it has ever been, and is, therefore capable of greater good in the homes which it visits.

We have no disposition to force it upon any one, but are anxious that all should have an opportunity to judge for themselves concerning its excellency and of becoming subscribers if they so desire. We have determined therefore to offer to new subscribers the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST from August 1st, 1898, to January 1st, 1899, on trial, for the small sum of Fifty-cents, barely enough to cover the expenses of sending it to them. Such subscriptions will be promptly discontinued January 1st, 1899, unless otherwise ordered by the subscriber in the meantime. We solicit the earnest assistance of all friends of the cause in this effort to place a large number of our homes under the elevating influence of good literature. We can not allow commissions or premiums of any kind in connection with this offer because of the very low price which is mentioned.

Notice!

It is desired that all students seeking to secure rooms and boarding at Lida's Wood, Eureka College, will correspond with the President of the College as below pending announcement of the new management soon to be made.

J. H. HARDIN, Pres.

Eureka, Ill.

PERSONAL MENTION.

J. B. Briney, of Moberly, Mo., passed through the city Tuesday morning on his way to Allen Springs, Ill., where he is to hold a discussion with Mr. Throgmorton, editor of the Baptist News, Du Quoin, Ill. C. J. Kimball, our proof-reader, being one of the moderators of the the discussion, also left on Tuesday morning in company with Bro. Briney for the debate.

L. B. Coggins, of Mt. Hope, Kansas, is spending his vacation in North Carolina. He went first to visit his mother at Asheville in that state.

W. D. Cumingham, of St. Thomas, and Miss Blackstone, of New Haven, Penn., were recently married and will be sent to Japan in September, as missionaries, by our Foreign Missionary Society.

C. Percy Leach, of Moulton, Iowa, writes that they had the largest offering for missions on Children's Day, for many years. The church is making arrangements for extensive house improvements this summer. Bro. Leach delivered the annual address for the high school at Moulton this year.

There is to be an assembly of the Gentry Family at Crab Orchard Springs, Ky., August 1st, 1898. The object of this meeting is to bring together as many as possible of the descendants from the Revolutionary soldier, Richard Gentry (who is buried near Crab Orchard Springs, on the "Old Gentry Place"), his brother David, two sisters, Winnie and Oney, and of his uncles Martin, Watson, William and Moses Gentry, all of whom came from Virginia.

We are informed that Brother Royal, of Vermont, Ill., is down with what is thought will prove to be his last sickness. Bro. Royal has closed out a long and useful life in the Master's service, and will be among those of whom the Lord will say, "Well done thou good and faithful servant."

The church of Eureka, Cal., extended a call to S. A. Nesbit to remain another year as pastor. He has been with them nearly four years. It very generously tendered him a vacation of a month on full salary.

S. R. Cassius, the colored evangelist, Tohee, Logan county, Okla. Ter., has published a tract on Negro Evangelization and the Tohee Industrial School, which he is selling at ten cents per copy in the interest of his education and religious work at Tohee.

Rev. J. M. Tennyson, formerly State Superintendent of the Children's Home Society for Missouri, and more recently Field Agent for the Christian's Orphan's Home, has resigned his position in the latter institution and is now with his family in California. Rev. W. B. Young, formerly a district superintendent in the Children's Home Society, has been appointed to fill the place in the Christian's Orphan's Home made vacant by Mr. Tennyson's resignation. Mr. Young is a most estimable man and a great worker. We wish him success in his new field.—Moissouri Children's Home Finder.

Vernon J. Rose, of Kansas, will make the Church Extension address at Eureka, Friday, August 5th.

J. E. Hawes' present address is Blue Bell, Guernsey County, O.

A. B. Moore's present address is Austin, Minn.

Levi Marshall, pastor of the church at Hannibal, Mo., and his family will spend a month at Atlantic Highlands, N. J.

W. J. Price, who has recently removed from Ariel, Pa., to Gibsonburg, O., would like to do supply work for some church, hold a protracted meeting, or assist in pulpit work.

R. E. Loyd, of Kansas City, Mo., recently preached at West Moreland, Kan., on Lord's day and sends good report of the church there.

C. H. Hilton, of Perry, Oklahoma territory, has been called for his third year by the church there. He is the president of the ministerial union of Perry which is making a strong fight on transgressors of their municipal laws.

J. W. Ball preaches one-half time at Florence, Kan., and one-fourth time each at Whitewater and Ellendale, and reports the work progressing finely at each place. The chief lack mentioned at these points by Bro. Ball, at present, is of good religious literature —church papers—and we are sorry ta say, this lack is far too common among the churches generally.

M. J. Fergusson, of Riverside, Cal., attended the Southern California convention at Long Beach and reports it a great advance over former conventions.

S. W. Crutcher, of Plano, Texas, has accepted the unanimous call to preach for the church at Pine Bluff, Ark.

A. I. Myhr delivered the literary address to the graduating class of the Georgia Robertson Christian College, Henderson, Tenn.

Prof. Chas. J. Kemper, of Lexington, Ky., and his wife will spend a season at Cuckoo, Va.

E. T. Edmonds' column of church news in Christian Work shows that the church at Ft. Smith, Ark., is in a state of unusual activity for the hot season.

A. M. Haggard, of Iowa, preached at Marion, same state, on July 24. Pastor Seaton is in a meeting in South Dakota.

Romig and Dawdy lecture two nights in Marion, Ia., August 3 and 4.

Guy Martin was installed July 17 as assistant pastor in Mason City, Ia.

Joel Brown, general solicitor for the St. Louis Orphans' Home, spent Sunday, July 24, in North English, Ia., and took back one inmate for the Home.

Henry Goodacre, of Wisconsin, visited Ft. Dodge, Ia., recently.

Miss Jessie Williams, of Des Moines, Standard correspondent and office secretary of the Iowa Board, is spending her vacation in Colorado Springs.

C. C. Redgrave has located with Estherville, Ia.

J. H. Stark, of Illinois, preaches at Marshalltown, Ia., on July 31. He lectures next night.

E. C. Wigmore, of Charles City, Ia., leaves immediately for Palouse, Wash.

J. M. Hoffman, of Spencer, Ia., assisted R. J. Brondbridge, of Ruthven, in raising $110 so as to secure $400 from the Extension Board.

W. B. Crewdson, of Corning, Ia., closed his meeting at Brainard with 68 added, $400 raised on salary and $500 on building project.

R. A. Omer holds a meeting in Sidney, Fremont county, Ia., in August.

N. A. McConnell will preach next Sunday in Marion, Ia.

CHANGES.

R. L. Cartwright, Chicago to Morocco, Ind.
Wm. Branch, Centralia to Abingdon, Ill.
Samuel Traum, Wilmington to Nevin, O.
W. T. Adams, Des Moines, Ia., to Winfield, Kan.
W. H. Roach, Buda to Bradford, Ill.

From Our Exchanges.

As we have given some of the expressions of appreciation of our new form and other improvements from our readers, we will follow these with a few of the compliments which our exchanges are giving us:

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, of St. Louis, Mo., is out in a new dress. It is a thing of beauty and will be a joy forever, we trust. It now surpasses any of our papers in mechanical makeup. It is one of our leaders in thought also. May it enjoy a greatly increased circulation.—Christian Worker.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, St. Louis, Mo., is out in a new form, and takes its place as one of the handsomest American weeklies. Its first page contains a good likeness of J. H. Garrison, editor.—The Christian Tribune.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has joined the increasing company of weekly religious news papers which have adopted the thirty-two small-paged form, very few still retaining the large page of former years. On the first page is a picture of the editor, J. H. Garrison, who, if we mistake not, is the dean or ranking veteran among all the editors representing the plea for a return to New Testament Christianity. Of course we think the change of form improves the appearance of our contemporary. That this important journal may continue to prosper, and to improve in substance through every change of form, and that its experienced and devout editor may be granted many years yet to plead for and exemplify the motto of the paper, "In Faith, Uuity; in Opinions and Methods, Liberty; in All Things, Charity," is our sincere prayer.—Christian Standard.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, one of America's most interesting religious journals, has changed its form to smaller pages and more of them. It still retains, however, the high standard of editorial excellence which makes it a welcome visitor in many homes.—The Columbia, Missouri, Herald.

Health, Voice, Appetite and Strength Failed—Completely Restored by Hood's Sarsaparilla.

"Last year my health failed entirely. My limbs were so weak that I could scarcely walk. I had no appetite and suffered with constipation. My voice failed me in the pulpit. I began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla and very soon I saw a great improvement. In the winter I was attacked with the grip which left me weak and prostrated. I went back to my old friend, Hood's Sarsaparilla, which seems to be the thing for me." REV. C. S. BEAULIEU, pastor Christian church, Lowellville, Ohio. Remember,

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Is the best—in fact the One True Blood Purifier.

Hood's Pills cure all liver ills. 25 cents.

Publishers' Notes.

It is very evident that D. H. Bays, in his late book, "Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism Examined and Refuted," has torn down all the strongholds of the Mormon doctrine. He was for many years a powerful advocate of the Mormon faith, but seeing the errors of their teachings, he abandoned the Latter Day Saints, and has written the strongest book against their false doctrine that is now before the public. Should your community be invaded by the advocates of Mormonism, a few copies of Bays' book circulated in your neighborhood will cause them to "Fold their tents and steal silently away."

The study of "Organic Evolution Considered," by Prof. A. Fairhurst, of Kentucky University, is destined to set at naught beliefs in Atheism, Agnosticism or Materialism, or any character of scientific logic that blots God out of existence.—The Christian Leader, Cincinnati, Ohio.

READY FOR ORDERS.

We are now ready to fill orders for that beautiful little book by W. J. Russell, entitled, "Wonders of the Sky, or God's Glory Exhibited in the Heavens." Beautifully bound in bright colored cloth, and the price is 50 cents. No one can read this little volume without greater reverence for the Creator of the universe.

"In the Days of Jehu" will add much light to the present Sunday-school lessons.

The book will not be considered a commentary, but is a work which treats in an exceedingly romantic and attractive manner the Bible story as found in portions of the Book of Kings. It is especially valuable just now to the large army of Sunday-school officers, teachers and workers. The reader will find that the author has taken the biblical picture of the beautiful and wicked Jezebel, and woven around it a romantic story, wonderfully interesting without the sacrifice of historical facts. After reading the book no one will regret the cost of it, which is 75 cents.

The following books will be found valuable to Christian Endeavor workers:

"The Helping Hand," by W. W. Dowling, is a book containing a history of the Y.P.S. C. E. movement, and gives instructions concerning every phase of Endeavor work. Bound in flexible cloth, price, 25 cents per copy.

"The Young People's Prayer-meeting and Its Improvement," by Cal. Ogburn, gives full details how to make the Young People's Prayer-meeting interesting, spiritual and profitable. Cloth binding, price, 75 cents.

"Ways of Working," by Oreon E. Scott, contains valuable instructions to all committees connected with Y. P. S. C. E., the author having had many years experience in Endeavor work. 38 pages, price 10 cents.

A Card from Secretary Abbot.

To the many friends who have written to inquire concerning Mrs. Abbott, I can only say that the issue is not yet decided. Her condition is very critical and only He who knows it all can tell the result of the next few days. Pray for us all. Yours in His name,

T. A. ABBOTT.

Correspondence.

New York Letter.

Chaplain H. W. Jones, of the battleship Texas, preached to an immense congregation at the Lexington Avenue Baptlst Church on Suuday evening, July 17th. He was injured by a bursting shell from the Spanish guns before Santiago the day previous to the destruction of Cervera's fleet, but was privileged to see that awfui sea fight. He described in interesting detail the death and burial of a number of brave American soldiers, and many were the expressions of saddened hearts as he recited the story. At the same hour of this service Lietenant Tull, of the Seventy-first New York Regiment, occupied the pulpit of the Fremont Methodist Church. He was greeted by a great throng of enthusiastic people. We are glad to know of such excellent Christian men at the front with our army and navy—men who hazard their lives for their country and who are not ashamed to stand up for the great Captain of our salvation in the midst of their commands.

The League for Social Service in New York, of which Dr. Josiah Strong is one of the chief executives, is gaining many strong and famous men to its practical support. Dr. Tolman, for a long time prominently connected with the Association for Relieving the Condition of the Poor, has resigned in order to work with Dr. Strong in the new society. The principle object of the League for Social Service is educational; it will issue tracts, leaflets, etc., written by specialists on the various social problems of our times in order to disseminate as widely as possible the experiences and practical knowledge of those who are giving their lives to certain sociological themes. It will maintain a bureau of information to indicate to editors, clergymen, professors, students and such like the best information on any of the topics within its sphere. The advisory counsel embraces such celebrities as Richard Watson Gilder, Washington Gladden, Chas. H. Parkhurst and Bishop H. C. Potter. Dr. Strong's leadership insures ability and practical usefulness to the League.

The summer relaxation in church work in New York is upon us. Many congregations have suspended all or part of their public services for the heated term, and others will do so. The church on West 56th Street has no evening preaching services through July and August. Bro. Payne will be out of town in the latter month. The preaching services at the 169th Street church and all the services at the branch on the East Side will be suspended four weeks. Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor and midweek prayer-meeting, however, will be continued right through the warm weather. Quite a lively discussion, editorial and otherwise, has been going on in certain of our great dailies recently, on the question of closing churches in New York in summer. Certainly all earnest Christian people prefer the services open all the year; but the question of support is a grave one in New York. Most of the reliable helpers in the work are on their vacation, the indifferent ones are disposed to stay at home when the weather is warm, and the result is a mere handful of good people tug and pull through an uninspiring service with little or no spiritual profit. If our church were so large that a goodly contingency could always be relied upon even in time of the country exodus we would certainly keep open house for the Lord the whole year. Many of our people going out do good in his name and coming in bring renewed vigor and life into the work at home.

In his little parish paper, "Upward," Bro. Lowell C. McPherson, the hard-working pastor of the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, says he is thinking of taking a trip across the Atlantic to visit England and Scotland this summer, to be gone about five weeks. He further says, "His plan will include feeding horses during the passage across the waters for two purposes, namely, to defray expenses and for diversion." This is just like the noble, independent, heroic man Bro. Mc. is, and we shall be glad to hear of him carrying out his plans to visit the old country and return in time to be at our state convention at 169th Street Church in August-September.

Just before sailing for Europe on his vacation, Dr. Parkhurst did some plain talking to his congregation on church manners. He said:

During the first twenty minutes of our Sunday morning services there is a certain amount of disorder, there is a coming and going up and down the aisles, that must be distasteful to Him in whose temple we are met. Things ere not conducted in a decent manner. I don't mean to blame the ushers. Much of the disturbance is due to the conduct of the pew-holders who come in late. The ushers don't know whether they are coming or not, and cannot seat strangers who are present. This creates disturbance and should not continue.

It is more than likely Dr. Parkhurst's church is not the only one in the land to which this language might be addressed.

N. C. Fowler read a paper before the Twilight Club sometime ago on "Religious Publicity." A few of the extracts from his excellent paper will perhaps be of interest. He says:

Something for nothing never has been and never will be a part of Christianity's motion. Salvation is not free. If it were free it would not be worth having. If it be a commodity, it must be handled and advertised along the better lines of developing other commodities.

He continues:

The Bible is the grandest, the most exhaustive, the most sensible, and the best written and most effective advertisement ever conceived. Every chapter of the Bible is a glorious advertisement of Christian morality and of the benefits of goodness. In every book of the Bible there are the most beautifully written, the most emphatic, and the brightest of glowing descriptions of the magnificence of heaven and of the myriads of attractions for the benefit of the blessed. The church that has stood on that peculiar composition which its members think is dignity, and has handled religion without using any of the legitimate business of methods, is but a cold monument representing something and doing nothing. Those little conventional church advertisements among the religious newspapers are not the kind that business men use to announce millinery openings. There is nothing about the ordinary religious notice to make people go to church.

The Church of Christ has something to offer to everybody, and if that something is as good as the church says it is, surely it is worth advertising so as to bring it to the attention of men. More and better advertising the services of the Church of Christ would no doubt result in great good.

Wheeling Through England.

III.

For the Shakespeare-loving pilgrim, who has made Stratford-on-Avon the center of his daily thoughts and nightly dreams from the day on which he first stepped upon British soil, there may possibly be disappointment in store when he finds himself in the midst of the actual Stratford. Here one instinctively demands a more distinct flavor of antiquity, more of the England of three centuries ago, than elsewhere. And yet the traveler, coming through Coventry, where one might live in the sixteenth century and forget the nineteenth if he wished, through Kenilworth, which seems not so much to have come down into our time as to carry us back by some pleasant magic into the days of its early grandeur, finds in Stratford not a town of Shakespeare's time, but a modern town, containing a few relics of Shakespeare and his age. The town has been rebuilt with broad and fairly straight streets, and the stream of tourists (of which we are two) has swept it clear of its atmosphere of quaintness and antiquity, except such as lingers about the Shakespeare birthplace, the grammar school and the Holy Trinity Church. These places, so long as we are not in the town, are delightful and satisfying. It is a beautiful and touching thing to behold the homage that is paid to the great dramatist, and the crowd of pilgrims who frequent this shrine is an eloquent testimonial to his fame. But one cannot help regretting that the poet's memory is made so much a matter of merchandise. Stratford obtains not only all of its reputation, but most of its livelihood from the fact that Shakespeare lived and died there. It would be interesting to know what proportion of its pupulation are engaged in pursuits directly dependent upon this fact. The per cent. would be large. Neither is it altogether pleasing to see "Shakespeare Cigars," "Shakespeare Restaurants," "Shakespeare Hotel," "Shakespeare Livery Stables," and other signs of the same sort staring one in the face at every corner. Besides this, there are abundant evidences of the demoralization which results to the residents from habitual catering to a floating population of tourists. You cannot walk the length of a street without being accosted by from two to six urchins who, for the consideration of "tuppence" are anxious to guide you to a dozen spots where you don't care to go and acquaint you with a score of facts with which (thanks to your faithful friend, Baldeker) you are already familiar. They join themselves to you and will not be shaken off. When you decline their services, they unblushingly descend to undisguised mendicancy and still clamor for the "tuppence," or perhaps with more moderation, for a penny. Yes, it must be admitted that Stratfofd-on-Avon, as a town, fails to satisfy. It is a museum. Its individual exhibits are wonderfully interesting, but they bear the same relation to the town as the contents of any museum bear to the building in which they are kept.

The best thing about Stratford, to my mind, is Ann Hathaway's cottage, the scene of Shakespeare's courtship, and one of its chief charms is that it is not in Stratford but three-quarters of a mile away, in a village of a dozen houses called Shottery. It was Sunday evening. We had attended church in the morning at the Holy Trinity, where the poet is buried, and had spent the afternoon rowing leisurely up and drifting again down the Avon, basking in the sunsnine and then seeking shelter from a sudden shower under the bushes on the bank. It cleared again with a bright sunset, followed by a long, soft, mellow English twilight, the sweetest of all twilights. On such an evening we wandered along the path which leads across the fields from Stratford to Shottery. A hedge of wild roses is on one side and a meadow on the other, while here and there a poppy flames by the path. The air is fresh and fragrant from the rain, and presently the thatch of Ann Hathaway's cottage appears at the end of the lane. Ah! Shakespeare, who could blame you for loving the girl who lived at the end of that walk? The fact that she was nine years his senior ought for sentimental reasons, to have been forgotten long ago. It seems like an impertinence even to think of it as we follow this path which doubtless the feet of Shakespeare often trod on a Sunday evening—unless the ways of men and maidens have greatly altered in three centuries. The wonder is only that a girl, the path to whose house was so flowery, wild and sweet, should not have been married to some other Stratford youth while the future dramatist was yet in grammar school. As I stood looking at the house and thinking it all over, a little girl ran up with a wild rose fresh plucked from the hedge, gave it to me, and ran away as quickly as she had come. I was sorry that she went so quickly, and yet glad, for otherwise I would never have known that it was an act of pure kindness uninvited by any thoughts of pennies that might follow.

From Stratford-on-Avon our route lay north for a few miles, back to Warwick, where a few hours were happily spent at Warwick Castle, a representative at once of ancient and modern splendor. The Earl charges an entrance fee of a shilling to the uninvited guests who care to visit his castle and grounds. A communicative gate-keeper informed us, in answer to our question, that between two and three hundred servants and attendants were ordinarily employed about the castle and park, but that many more were called in on special occasions, such as the recent visit of the Prince of Wales. "And how large is the family that is served by these two or three hundred?" we asked. "Two kids and their parents," replied the ancient servitor. If beauty of architecture and of natural surroundings could ever make a loyal American wish to be an earl for the sake of living in a castle, Warwick Castle is the place to inspire that unpatriotic wish.

It would be as impossible as it is undesirable to give a consecutive account of the English weather from day to day. The record could not be even approximately correct unless it were given from hour to hour. As a rule, each day contains a mixture of sunshine and rain. The variable factor is merely the proportion between the two. Moreover, English showers are usually small affairs, in space as well as in time. You see a black cloud about the size of a man's hand off your starboard bow, to speak nautically, and coming straight toward you. It is perfectly evident that there will soon be rain somewhere near, but it does not follow that you will get it. It may miss you by a couple of hundred yards; or you may dash forward and cross its path in front of it. In any case it will probably be over in half an hour and the roads will be in condition to ride as soon as the rain has stopped. Hence it was that we were not greatly disturbed when it began to rain on us at Warwick Castle. We simply went indoors and looked at the Van Dyke portraits, Queen Anne furniture and ancient armour for awhile and then rode on in sunshine to Rugby and Lutterworth.

Lutterworth, the home and parish of John Wiclif during the last nine years of his life, is well worth a visit. The town is nothing more than a thousand other English towns, but the parish church is one of the most interesting to be found anywhere. If the claims of the curate are correct, part of the present structure is nine hundred years old. The identical pulpit is in use from which Wiclif preached evangelical Christianity five centuries ago and, in fact, if we may believe those now in charge, the whole building is substantially as it was in Wiclif's time. Among the relics of undoubted genuineness is the great carved oak communion table used by Wiclif. It was made to stand out in the center of the aisle instead of against the wall as an altar according to the Roman fashion then and now current. This usage, it will be remembered, was one for which Wiclif was called to account by his ecclesiastical superiors. Anti-hierarchical notions seem to have been established in the very building, for there is a fresco of the Last Judgment, two centuries earlier than Wiclif, in which the most conspicuous among the damned are a bishop with his mitre, a priest with his robe and a king with his crown.

Leaving Lutterworth, we returned to Rugby, visited the celebrated school and saw part of a cricket match, and then went, as many of England's greatest men have done, from Rugby to Oxford, stopping on the way at Banbury, as perhaps some of them have done also, to make an evening meal on the Banbury cakes and hot cross buns which have been known by name since our nursery days. They are very good, especially with milk, but are rather heavy when taken in quantities of more than eight at a sitting. Of Oxford we can say only that it is a place which it is a joy to reach, a delight to remain in, and an agony to leave. Two days was a time all too short to devote to it, but the exigencies of the journey allowed us no more; so we rode on, through Henley, the scene of the great boat races a few days hence; Eton, where we saw with much amusement the school-boys in their peculiar costume, short Eton jackets and high silk hats; Windsor, the home of the Queen, a vast castle, but not half so attractive as Warwick; Stoke Poges, the "country churchyard" of Gray's Elegy, and so to London.

A Morning Walk in Geneva.

Early one morning I was watching the bathing swans from the Pont des Bergues, at Geneva when a gentleman, evidently a clergyman, accosted me with: "Bonjour monsieur." His French betrayed the foreigner, his manner suggested the American. Replying to his courteous salutation, I added: "From Iowa; what is your state?"

"Why, I'm from Iowa, too," he exclaimed.

The reverend gentleman was not long in turning the conversation on historic subjects. "I just wanted to come out here awhile and imagine myself standing on the old bridge which once spanned the Rhone at this point and which Cæsar destroyed to prevent the crossing of the Helvetii, as he tells us in his commentaries on the wars in Gaul."

"Yes, that's a great pleasure if one has the power of abstraction highly enough developed. It requires a great deal of imagination to transform this wholly modern scene before us into that of some two thousand years and more ago, when the barbarians and Romans stood face to face on these shores."

"Quite true," he responded; "they say, too, that the old bridge of that time was probably a little farther down stream."

By means of a causeway built in the current and connected with the middle of the Pont des Bergues, we crossed over to Rousseau's Island, a favorite spot of the great author. In the midst of a cluster of trees is the sitting statue of this illustrious citizen of Geneva, whose "Emile" and "Social Contract" were officially burned before the city hall in 1762 by the hangman's hand.

A few minutes later we were walking along the Mont Blanc Quay, in view of the majestic range of the same name. The most beautiful site in the city, it boasts of the finest monument in Switzerland. It is an imitation of the Scaligeri mausoleum in Verona. It is sixty feet high and was formerly crowned with an equestrian statue in bronze. This has been removed on account of its weight and now stands on the spacious terrace. We were loud in our praises of the structure. A German, who chanced to be near and who was probably inclined toward socialism saw the matter from another point of view.

"But, do the gentlemen not find it a little strange that a man like the Duke of Brunswick known in Germany as the Diamantenherzog von Braunschweig—should have the finest memorial in the Swiss Republic?"

"We know nothing against him. The books issued by the office of Public Inquiry only say that he died here in 1873, leaving his fortune to the city, of which five million francs have been used to build the new opera house."

"True enough, it would not be politic for a city to publish the truth about its benefactors. But the Duke of Brunswick was not a Swiss, nor even a republican, nor a man above reproach, that he should be celebrated in marble, that, too, in Geneva. I find it very ironical, a curious freak of fate. The duke was a German despot, his rebellious subjects drove him from the ducal throne in 1830 because they could not endure the profligacy of his life, the tyranny and incompetency of his administration. After that he lived mostly in Paris and figured in many scandals."

A Swiss: "Our city has always been the asylum for political refugees. If they see fit to make it their legatee, it is not our place to examine too closely into their lives or their politics."

"No, to be sure," answered the German, rather hotly. "The Swiss have never seen fit to 'examine' where money was at stake. For three hundred years your noblest families and your city councils were the hirelings of French and Italian princes; whole armies of Swiss rushed from their republican home to fight under the flags of despotic kings against their subjects struggling for liberty. The Swiss went as mercenaries—for gold. They had no other motive. And in the defence of the Tuileries in 1792 more than 800 Swiss fell."

"But they were brave," interrupted the Swiss.

"Which does not alter my statement, that Switzerland has always been obedient to mercenary motives, and"——

Leaving the two to settle their dispute as best they could, we proceeded down the Rhone, crossed by the Island Tower and entered the old city by German Street, at the foot of which is an appropriate shaft and fountain commemorating the final repulse of the Counts of Savoy on the night of the 12th of December, 1602. It was a surprise, but the citizens defended their walls and gained a decisive victory, celebrated to this day as one of the important events in the city's history under the name of la Fete de l' Escalade. It is the Fourth of July for the Genevese.

Paasing through Grand Street where Rousseau was born, we entered the Rue Calvin. It was here at numbers 11 and 13 that the great Reformer spent the years from 1541 to 1564. It is a great disappointment to find the laboratories of the Board of Health quartered in this property. One recalls the hours spent in the homes of Martin Luther, Schiller and Goethe—especially that of the latter, which has become the Goethe Meseum—and the ineffectual impressions carried away. But Calvin wished it so; one feels like complaining of his humility.

"Where is the tomb of Calvin?" was asked the janitor. He directed us to an ancient, no longer used, but well kept cemetery near the Rhone. In an obscure spot beneath a tall pine we found a little head-stone marked "J. C." There is no mound, for they do not know the exact place where he rests.

"He desired to be forgotten," said my companion, reflectively. "They seem to have carried out his wishes literally. What a contrast" he continued, "between John Calvin and the Duke of Brunswick. The one lived in severity and imposed it on others; but he was noble, whatever one may justly say against his philosophy of church and state; both are all too somber. The world contained nothing for him but moral verities. In dying he wished to be forgotten. He rests far remote from the gay life of modern Geneva, so strikingly in contrast with the Geneva of the Reformer's days. The other seems to have born with a crown in his cradle, to have lived a life of pleasure. In dying he gives his fortune to the city, he orders a mausoleum and even stipulates the style of it. He rests in a temple-like structure, in the very midst of Geneva's splendor. Thousands pass his tomb daily. The guide-books of the city devote pages to its description, though they do not mention with a single word the place where John Calvin rests."

Chicago Letter.

The fourth educational conference of the Disciples of Christ recently met in Chicago. The attendance was not large, but the papers were of a very high order and the spirit of the discussions was fine. Hiram, Drake, Butler and Christian (Canton, Mo.,) Colleges were well represented. During the early part of the conference a vigorous discussion arose over the following question: "Should the Consideration of Education be Admitted to the National Missionary Convention, or be Discussed Entirely in Special Meetings?" The attitude of the conference towards the secretaries of our missionary boards was sympathetic rather than critical. The concensus of judgment was that the relation of education to missions was so vital, and so thoroughly recognized by the heroic workers in the foreign field and the wise leaders at home, that our great brotherhood would demand, and the missionary secretaries would cheerfully arrange to give, ample time to the discussion of educational interests just as soon as the work of the educational board deserved such time and attention. The Chicago Letter-writer has insisted for years, and still insists, that there is no greater problem before the Disciples of Christ in this closing decade of the nineteenth century than their educational problem. The interests of our colleges should not only have a large place in our national gatherings, but in all of our state and district and county conventions. I do not advocate pleas for money in these assemblies, but addresses by Christ-filled men, prayerfully prepared, with the definite aim of giving information concerning and creating enthusiasm in the interest of all our educational enterprises, especially our Christian colleges.

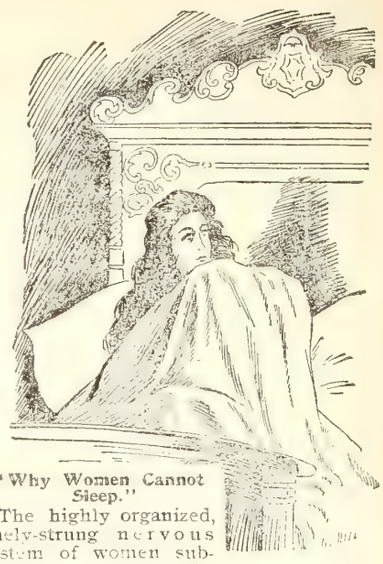
Not only among the Disciples of Christ, but the public in general, seem to be taking a renewed interest in questions of education. The board of education in Chicago has been deeply stirred over the election of a new superintendent. E. Benjamin Andrews, the president of Brown University, who was so prominently before the public last year on account of his stand for the freedom of the teacher, has been elected superintendent of public instruction at a salary of seven thousand dollars per annum. The former superintendent, Mr. Lane, was made assistant at a salary of either four or five thousand dollars.

The speech of Hon. William L. Wilson, now president of Washington and Lee University, at the July convocation of the University of Chicago, was on "The Founders of States and the Founders of Colleges." In this address he maintained that a culture, high, broad and deep was essential to the perpetuity of our freedom and our government. Washington was the patron of the university of which Mr. Wilson is now president; Jefferson was the father of the University of Virginia; Franklin laid the corner-stone of the University of Pennsylvania, and every "North Carolina name that was signed to the Federal Constitution in 1787 reappeared in 1789 among the charter trustees of the university of that state." The drift of the address may be summed up in Mr. Wilson's quotation from a great American statesman: "Liberty is a reward reserved for the intelligent, the patriotic, the virtuous and the deserving." Dear reader, if you are a father or a mother with children to educate, remember that "virtue" as well as "intelligence" is essential to a true education, and choose a Christian college for a Christian training. And my brother preacher, since the only true education is the Christian education, will you not see to it that the boys and girls in your congregation who are ready for college are adequately informed concerning Hiram, Butler, Kentucky and our other worthy institutions? Work up an address on our educational interests during your vacation, and see how many students you can send our colleges next fall.

Perhaps nothing would contribute more to the advancement of all our educational interests at this stage of our progress than the employment of an educational secretary by our educational board, whose sole business would be to enlist our brotherhood in the cause of Christian education. Such a man must be broad in his sympathies and deeply in earnest himself. He must be cultured and consecrated, spiritual and scholarly, brimful of business and bubbling over with enthusiasm, tactful and tenacious, persistent and patient, a man who can preach twenty-three years for one church, if need be; who thinks more of his work than of his wages, and who realizes that there are more people in the world than there are in his parish. If the services of our ideal secretary cannot be secured for lack of funds, let our educational board do the next best thing, viz., co-operate with one or more of our colleges, or with the C. W. B. M., in having a financial secretary who will act as field secretary for the board part of the time. The C. W. B. M. has been fortunate enough to secure the services of a capable and womanly woman to represent the interests of the Bible chairs. Butler College has a noble man representing her financial interests. Let us rise above all local prejudices and trust such unselfish workers, if their services can be secured for part of the time, to represent our general educational interests. There are hundreds of noble men and women among our million members who would not only willingly, but would gladly give and give liberally to our colleges, our Bible schools and Bible chairs if the proper person were to bring our educational needs to their attention. But I believe it possible to support the right man for all his time in this great work if we will only arouse from our lethargy and realize that the great Captain of our salvation is calling us to go, "teaching them to observe all things" he has commanded, as well as to "make Christians of all nations."

"Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait."



CHARLES A. YOUNG.

What is Death; How Destroyed.

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—I am not a critic, neither am I called upon to stand guard over the orthodoxy of contributions to the columns of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I would like, however, by your permission, to notice a statement or two in an article under the above heading, by W. H. Thomas, in your issue of June 23rd. It is one thing to say what the Scriptures say, and let controversy end there, and quite another thing to say what one believes, and then say the Scriptures show it! This latter method of teaching has brought the religious world into much controversy, and to the belief of many strange things.

The first statement I call in question is that Pauls shows that "the resurrection from the dead means the immediate passing of the spirit from the old material body to one that is incorruptible—one that is of a better nature and suited to our higher spiritual state." The fifteenth chapter of the first Corinthian letter is the writer's supposed basis for this statement. Verily, ideas, like individuals, partake of their environment.

Bro. Thomas says the resurrection is "the immediate passing of the spirit from the old material to one that is incorruptible." Paul's statement of the matter is, "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." It seems to me there is a discord here. Thomas talks about the spirit; Paul talks about the body. Thomas talks about the spirit changing from one body to another. Paul talks about the body being changed from one condition to another. Thomas' resurection is a transition; Paul's resurection is a transformation. Thomas' resurrection is of that which never dies; Paul's resurrection is of that which has died.

"Why Women Cannot Sleep."

The highly organized, finely-strung nervous system of women subjects them to terrors of nervous apprehension which no man can ever appreciate.

The peace of mind, the mental poise and calmness under difficulties, which is necessary for happy womanhood is only possible when the sensitive feminine organism is in a perfectly healthy condition. If there be any weakness or derangement in this respect no remedy in the world so completely restores womanly health, nervous vigor and capability as the wonderful "Favorite Prescription" invented by Dr. R. V. Pierce, chief consulting physician of the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute of Buffalo, N. Y. It purifies, heals and strengthens; insures functional regularity; provides physical reinforcement and sustaining power at periods of special weakness and depression.

It is the only medicine which makes the coming of baby safe and comparatively easy. In a personal letter to Dr. Pierce, Mrs. Marguerite Collin, of Cutler, Algoma Co., Ont., says:

"I was a sufferer and was cured by Dr. Pierce's wonderful medicine. When I commenced the medicine I could neither eat nor sleep. My hands and feet were constantly cold; I had a wasting, troublesome drain for three months, and my monthly periods were never regular. I took Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and it cured me. I feel well. I thank the World's Dispensary Medical Association."

The Scriptures are plain in telling us it is that which is sown in dishonor that is raised in in glory; it is that which is sown in weakness that is raised in power; it is that which is sown in corruption that is raised in incorruption. And if these things are said concerning the spirit, then, as we follow Paul in his further statement of this same matter, we ought to hear him say, "It is sown a natural spirit, it is raised a spiritual spirit," for he would tell us, "There is a natural spirit, and there is a spiritual spirit." We would certainly think this a strange kind of spirit! We sometimes find great difficulty in fitting the plain statements of Scripture to our peculiar ideas. I should think Bro. Thomas would find it so in this case. I am inclined to credit Paul with saying what he meant to say, and also in meaning what he said. And when he says the natural body is raised a spiritual body, I confess my inclination to believe it will be that way.

Resurrection presupposes death, and only that which dies can be resurrected. The separation of thh spirit from the body, the end of earthly life, we call death. Thus using the term, we speak of the death of the body, but never of the death of the spirit. If death is a prerequisite to resurrection, and the spirit never dies, how can Bro. Thomas speak of the transition of the spirit and call it the resurrection? In his theology there is no resurrection. The use of the term is a misfit.

Again he asks, "Are we not justified in saying that much of the skepticism about the resurrection of the dead comes from the false idea that the resurrection means the returning of the spirit to the old material body?" Answering from the limit of my own general information I would say, I think not. I am not aware that such is a general idea. Perhaps Bro. Thomas did not fairly state himself. The resurrection and the reoccupancy of the resurrected body are not one and the same thing. That there will be a reunion of the body and the spirit is a generally accepted idea; but the reuniting of the body and the spirit I never heard called the resurrection. And besides, those who believe in the reunion of the resurrected body and the redeemed spirit believe as Paul states: "It is raised a spiritual body. That it is not now the "old natural" body, but that the body which was once natural is now spiritual. If any, even many, believe that the body is raised the "old material" body they do not believe Paul's statement of the case. Even the ingenuity of the question gives no strength to the theory of transitional resurrection. The flight of the spirit to realms immortal leaves the subject of the resurrection behind. The reunion of the spirit and the body depends upon the resurrection of the body. A. L. ORCUTT.

Our Trade with China.

The increase of the importation of American manufactures and productions into China is shown by the official statements of the "Report on the Trade of China and Abstract of Statistics" for the year 1897, which has just reached the Bureau of Statistics. This official report of the returns of trade, published by the order of the Inspector General of Customs, of China, gives the value of articles imported into and exported from China from 1890 to 1897, and the quantities and values of certain important articles imported during 1896 and 1897. This statement of imports form various parts of the world shows that the United States is making gains in her invasion of the markets of China, especially in cotton goods, metals and kerosene oil, though in the latter article Russia and Sumatra are proving active if not dangerous rivals.

The total value of the imports from the United States into China have, according to the figures presented by this report, increased more than 300 per cent. since 1890, the increase in importations during that time being but little more than 50 per cent. In cotton goods the record which the United States manufacturers and exporters made in 1897, was especially striking. In cotton drills, jeans and sheetings, importations from the United States increased materially, while those from all other countries fell off. Importations of English sheetings, for instance, fell from 1,019,-991 pieces in 1896 to 389,569 piecies in 1897, those from India fell from 156,709 pieces to 23,700 pieces, while American sheetings increased from 2,251,600 pieces in 1896 to 2,418,-971 in 1897. English cotton drills fell from 132,372 pieces in 1896 to 76,202 pieces in 1897, Indian cotton drills fell from 39,775 pieces to 11,243 pieces in 1897; Dutch from 34,334 pieces in 1895 to 25,862 pieses in 1897; Japanese from 9,-133 pieces in 1896 to 1,250 pieces In 1897; while American drills increased from 1,228,759 pieces in 1896 to 1,531,347 pieces in 1897. In jeans American importations increased from 52,450 pieces in 1896 to 63,076 pieces in 1887. The total importations of cotton goods fell in 1897 considerably below those of 1896 while, as shown by the above figures, the importations of cotton goods from the United States increased in every case.

Curiously, the chief increase in inportations throughout the entire list is in articles which the United States supplies, while there is a reduction in nearly all other articles. The chief imports into China from the United States are cotton goods, cigars and cigarettes, flour ginseng, machinery, medicines, kerosene oil and timber. In practically all of these articles there was in 1897 an increase in importations, while in the larger proportion of the other articles imported a decrease is shown. Of kerosene oil, for instance, the importations from the United States in 1897 were 48,212,505 gallons against 33,520,649 gallons in 1896, an increase of nearly 50 per cent. Importations of timber increased from 1,182,494 haikwan taels in value to 1,321,081; machinery, from 2,064,441 taels to 2,716,737; medicines, from 106,451 taels to 135,339; ginseng, which is almost exclusively from the United States, increased from 1,619,527 taels in value to 2,149,-183, raw cotton from 1,307,975 taels to 2,260,191; window glass, from 343,128 taels to 466,017 and coal, from 3,539,804 taels to 3,692,669.

American producers and exporters must, however, realize that in at least one particular their competition is sharp and increasing. This relates to kerosene oil, of which our exportrations in the year just ending amounted to 855,-000,000 and of which a large proportion goes to China and other Asiatic countries. The report in question shows that while the importations of American kerosene increased in 1897 nearly 50 per cent., that those of Sumatra increased nearly 200 per cent., while in Russian oil there was also a marked increase, showing that in this important item of our exports there is sharp and growing competition in a large and important field.

That there has been a steady and marked growth in the importations into China of goods from the United States is apparent from the detailed figures of this report, while an examination of those relating to the imports from other countries shows that the imports from the United States have increased much more rapidly than those from any other country.

The following table shows the imports into China from the leading countries of the world in 1897 compared with the year 1890. It will be seen that the imports from the United States increased more than 300 per cent. and that the growth was much more rapid than that of other countries. It should be borne in mind, also, that the direct importations from the United States into Chinese ports do not by any means include all American goods entering China, as most of the articles entering Hongkong pass from that port into China, and the reports of our own Bureau of Statistics show that the exports of the United States to Hongkong have, during the past ten years, nearly equaled our direct exports to China.

SORE HANDS

CURED BY CUTICURA

My sore hands commenced with a burning on my fingers. When I rubbed them you could see little white pimples, and I felt like twisting them out of their sockets. I had high fever and cold chills, nights I had to walk the floor until I fell asleep. My hands peeled like an onion, the finger nails got loose, the water ran out, and there the burning fire was. My hands puffed up worse than a toad, the water ran through the bandage on to the floor. I went to a doctor for a year. I got CUTICURA RESOLVENT and CUTICURA SOAP. The nails hardened [illegible] off, and my hands are now cured.

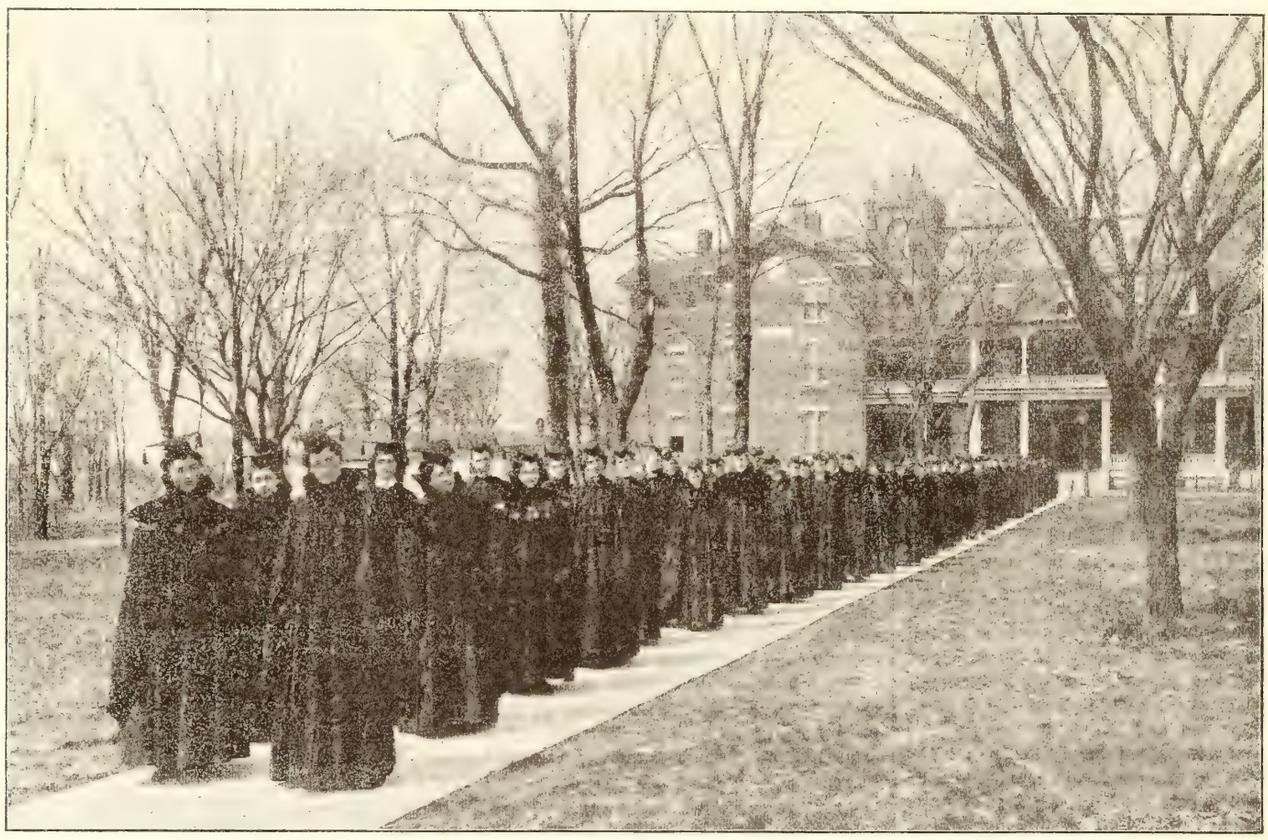
A Message to Men of Means.

Among our Savior's personal disciples were the rich men, Joseph of Aramathea and Nicodemus. He also loved the rich young ruler who, however, so far as we know, never became his disciple (Mark 10:22). It was not impossible, therefore, for a rich man to be a disciple of Christ, although he regarded it very difficult, saying how hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God (Mark 10:23). He regarded riches as deceitful, (Matt. 13:22); as leading men to trust them, rather than the living God (1 Tim. 6:17); as leading men to become oppressive (Jas. 2:6); as exposing the soul to special temptations, snares, lusts, and finally to destruction and perdition (2 Tim. 6:9). So he taught the rich to give to the poor (Mark 10:21), and to be rich toward God (Luke 12:21), and not to trust in riches. For the world's good and for the salvation of the rich, the Father sent them this message (2 Tim. 6:18-19): "That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate, laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life."

1. God recognized the prominent place of money, both in the Jewish and Christian dispensations. Achan immortalized himself by his covetousness (Josh. 7:1), the rich fool for his stinginess (Luke 12:21), Ananias and his wife for lying about their means (Acts 5:3) and Barnabas for his liberality (Acts 4:36-37). God claims the world's wealth as his own (Hag. 2:8): "The silver is mine and the gold is mine, saith the Lord of hosts." The power to get wealth is from him (Deut. 8:18): "For it is he that giveth the power to get wealth."



2. A portion, at least, of our possessions is under tribute to the kingdom of God. The Jew was said to rob God if he brought not the tithe into the storehouse (Mal. 3:8). "Freely ye have received, freely give." Let every one of you lay by him in store," are some of the instructions to us (1 Cor. 16:2).

The Lord has delivered talents and pounds to his disciples to be used and returned to him with the increase (Matt. 25:14). The time to use the Lord's gifts is now. Like servants of old, it was my lot recently to be sent to some of the Lord's children to whom he had given much goods, to receive some fruit of their riches for a most important improvement of the King's business. It is true I was not beaten, nor stoned, nor cast out as evil, and by many my mission was gladly heard and met a liberal response, to whom I am personally grateful. But others turned coldly and sent me away empty.

3. We be brethren, partners with each other and with God. The Father hath done marvelous things for his children and ha honored them with great trusts and wide opportunities. Each disciple has his proper gift, all not the same gifts. One can preach, another make money, others do other things, yet we are all one in Christ. Paul said, "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel." This is no more true of the preacher than of the business man, who should say, "Woe is in me if I give not freely of my means to promote the kingdom." He whose talent is to earn money, if uses it for the benefit of the kingdom is yielding, I believe, as valuable and faithful a service as he who can preach the gospel and does it faithfully. I wish our men of wealth would appreciate this fact and enter heartily into all the great enterprises of the church. We have here in Illinois hundreds of men who have been blessed with means and who have been blessed by the ministry that have gone out from Eureka College. A great burden rested upon the college. Everybody was cordially invited to its fiftieth anniversary last June. It was a day of wonderful moment to the great cause that we love. Some eleven thousand dollars were wanted to clear the college of debt. Had there been present a hundred men with from twenty to five hundred thousand, how easy it would have been to have distributed the burden that fell so heavily upon a few. Many of you have furnished no help to clear the college of debt; can you not now join with the trustees in building up a great college? If you would like to enter into fellowship in so great a work, drop Pres. Hardin a card and he will be glad to give you full information.

Dear brethren, ought you not to be at our great meetings? Our state convention is here the first week in August. The condition, needs and opportunities before the churches in Illinois will be spread out before the public. There will probably be no call for money, but will you not be present, get the situation and enter into whatever service you can, and be one of us heartily. We have a number of splendid business men now, upon whom we can always count, but the number ought to be multiplied greatly. The Lord hath need of thee. May the Lord help us all to work while it is day!

Faithfully your brother,

Kansas Notes.

Kansas Churches of Christ never had one taken from their ranks whom they more saldly missed than her own Mrs. Hellen E. Moses. Our churches were not so familiar with any other name and face. Kansas missions never had a truer friend. By pen and prayer and voice she plead for the plan that made Kansas missionary plans unique. When called upon to help in Bible chair work, we could make no greater contribution than she. As her pastor I miss her counsel and devotion, but rejoice that the Bible chair work has found one whose sympathies for it are sure to win friends for it. The First Church feels that the C. W. B. M. has made no mistake in calling her to that important work. We heartily commend her and her cause to our brethren everywhere. Hear her plea. Sister Ora McPherson takes her place in our state board office and is proving her efficiency for the place and is making many friends. She with Bro. R. P. McPherson and Bro. O. L. Cook is doing splendid work for our state board. Bro. Cook is a workman as our field superintendent, of whom we are not ashamed. All say, "He is just the man for the place."

The First Church is moving nicely without any revival or evangelistic efforts, there having been at our regular Sunday services 35 additions from June 19 to July 17.

Bro. Mallory is doing efficient work as pastor of the East Side Church, and having additions nearly every Sunday. D. D. Boyle has been holding an arbor meeting for him for two weeks, with good attendance and two additions.

Just having returned from attendonce at the great Endeavor Convention at Nashville, I feel like seconding the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST's motion to inaugurate a "Quiet Hour" service at our own National Convention, at Chattanooga. Keep it going.

Our brethren who spoke at Nashville proved themselves masters of the platform, and of they were heard with delight. They were workmen of whom we need not be ashamed.

Young People's Department of the C. W. B. M.

There was a gratifying growth in the number of societies that made offerings to the Young People's Department of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and in the amount of the contributions during the quarter ending with June. Yet there should be remittances from each of our seventy-one Intermediates and 1,486 Junior Societies, and 301 Mission Bands every quarter. The work of this quarter and that of corresponding quarter last year is as follows:

	1897.	1898.
Junior Societies contributing	321	404
Mission Bands contributing	162	166
Intermediate Societies contrib.	8	25
Number of other offerings	45	82
Amount contributed	$2,533.44	$3,562.06

Last year the offerings made by the Young Ladies' Auxiliaries and Mission Circles were included in the report; this year they are omitted.

Why a Christian Colony?

THE REASONS WHY I CAME TO ESTABLISH THE CHRISTIAN COLONY ON RAINY RIVER, ONTARIO.

On the 25th of March I sent a letter to the Christian Publishing Company inquiring their charges for the insertion of one or two columns of matter in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on the Christian Colony in Ontario. I received a letter from J. H. Garrison dated March 29th, 1898, stating, "If it is a real estate enterprise, in which the parties managing it are expecting to make some legitimate profit out of it, we would feel justified in making a reasonable charge for such an article. If, however, it is primarily a missionary enterprise, undertaken for the good of the cause and the mutual benefit of those who enter into the Colony, I would be willing to insert the article without charge and for the good of the work."

I have written many articles regarding the Christian Colony for other papers, but I do not believe I have written one giving the reasons for its establishment. I have been so pressed with this work that I have not had time to accept the editor's kind invitation till the present. I have just returned home from visiting the Colony and will now attempt to give the reasons, or in fact, two or three of the principal reasons for its establishment.

Two years ago I asked leave of absence from the church at Bowmanville, where I had been laboring for nearly four years, to attend the General Convention at Springfield, Illinois. Since entering upon the work in the Dominion of Canada I have felt the want of association with those grand men who attend these conventions. I was much impressed with the spiritual character of this convention compared with the last one I had the privilege of attending. But imagine my surprise. I was the only representative from Canada. My name stood alone. There were representatives from China, India, Japan, men who represented Africa, in fact every nation was mentioned, and the various needs of the field discussed. I felt like a heathen among Christians. My adopted country was not worthy of recognition. In fact I grew indignant. Why this should happen I did not know. We contributed to all missionary enterprises. I felt that this great convention should manifest an interest in the evangelization of Canada. On my journey home to the northward my heart ached for this vast unknown region the broadest and the fairest, while at the same time the most available missionary field to be found in all the world. At the Indianapolis convention last year, I understand that my report was read. We asked for a representation upon the program of future conventions. I judge this request will be granted. A short time after this I wrote an article, "Canada as a Mission Field," which was published in the Christian Standard.

Another reason for the establishment of the Christian Colony: About this time I read Bro. Clay's article on Colonization in Idaho. He referred to land that could be purchased for twenty-five to fifty dollars per acre, that if it was underbrushed and irrigated it would make excellent homes for poor people. The idea struck me in this way, that if poor men had money to purchase land at twenty-five to fifty dollars per acre they could secure land nearer home at that price without traveling to the far West. I thought of Canada's vast millions of agricultural land free to all. I did not know where these lands were. I had not made a study of the free grant lands at that time. I sent to the Crown Land's Department at Toronto. I interviewed the government. I moved as on the track of destiny. I wrote several articles. I wished to get hold of something practical. Charity and feeble legislation had failed to ameliorate the material and spiritual condition of man. Christianity must free a man, but to be a Christian he must be free. No man is free unless he has a home of his own, and can assert that prerogative which is the inalienable right of man.

The best Christian men of the United States noted my articles. They could not believe that right here in Ontario 160 acres of free land couuld be obtained with plenty of wood, good water, no stones, good markets, no irrigation, no destructive droughts, and in the same latitude of all the great nations of Europe, Great Britain and Ireland, Norway and Sweden, Prussia, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, nearly all of Russia, nearly the entire German Empire and the northern part of France. Letters came from every quarter of the North American Continent. Probably no inquiry did me more good than that received from A. P. Cobb, of San Antonio, Texas. He said, "I have visited California and Texas, and even Old Mexico, looking for cheap land for a Colony such as you mention. I found land in California and Texas held at ruinous prices, while life in Old Mexico is not life, but mere existence." I asked Bro. Cobb to join me in an exploration. He came from his home two thousand miles from the Southwest, I came fifteen hundred from the East, and we met on the headwaters of Rainy River, Ontario. We were delighted with the prospect. Bro. Cobb at once purchased a fine farm fronting the river of 335 acres, also taking a free grant of 160, and purchasing the remainder of the half section at one dollar per acre.

This trip of exploration was severe upon both of us as it was taken on the first of February. It was at the risk of life. I arrived at Rat Portage on the Canadian Pacific Railway. there I had to take a trip which required six days over the ice of the Lake of the Woods and Rainy River, traveling the entire distance of two hundred miles in an open sleigh, sleeping in Indian houses and enduring the cold from day light till dark. But the work was accomplished. I then confidentially informed the people that I had land to offer them free, without money and without price. I have secured the co-operation of the Dominion and the Ontario Governments. I first asked for a township of this fine land, requested that the survey be made in order to be ready for the people on the first of May. It was done. On the first boat which left Rat Portage after the opening of navigation was found fifty happy home seekers from every quarter of the United States. They even came from California. While this land is free, it is earnestly desired that every one remember that the victory is only to those who will fight to possess it. There will be trials characteristic of the pioneer life. No one should come expecting an easy time. It means hard work and trials.

With such men as A. P. Cobb and family, Geo. W. Loman and family, of the Indian Nation, A. M. Sweany, of Oregon, G. W. Fullerton, of Nova Scotia, J. Carey Smith, of Indiana and many others of like religious character we expect to form a center from which shall radiate the everlasting gospel of Christ till Canada shall be bettered because of the advent of these noble men. These men are all helpers. Men who never owned a foot of land now say, "My home," "My land."

We have laid out a town and have named it Christiana. Nearly forty acres of lots have been sold. The Provincial Government has forty men employed cutting out a road to our town. A sawmill, business enterprises, will at once go in. Before cold weather arrives will have a place of worship erected. The Church of Christ on Rainy River, when it was less than twelve hours old, took up a collection for missions. This marvelous movement has attracted the attention of both governments. I was called before the premier of the Dominion at Ottawa a short time ago to give an account of this region and work. I prove by the fact that there are forty men at work cutting roads, and that they have placed in our hands fully nine hundred thousand acres of this fine agricultural land to be given to all who will come and avail themselves of it.

This is destined to be one of the great missionary enterprises of the century. Leading newspapers of the United States are asking for the latest developments. Just a word in conclusion in regard to the system of work. "How shall we reach the people?" I do it this way. I ask interested parties to send me twelve or fifteen cents in postage and I will send them literature which will give them the desired information regarding land and rates. This is business. I only wish persons to write who wish to help the work on, or who wish homes. My time is entirely devoted to this work, and as the responsibility is great, do not write for mere curiosity's sake. Be considerate. Take hold of this work and help some poor young man in your community, help a son or son-in-law. Give him a lift. You would like to see him a tower of strength for his family and the church. Now I feel that it is my duty to tell you about this. By availing yourself of it, it will make you independent, and place you in a condition to enjoy your religion, and to help humanity. Make helping others the thought of your life.

R. A. BURRISS.

Missions in the "White North."

Lieut. Peary, speaking of the natives of the Arctic, says: "Poor things, why don't we send some missionaries to them and convert and civilize them?" Then in answer he says: "God willing, never either."

His reason is not far to seek. He speaks of the depraved habits of the whalers who frequent those regions, and prays that such a fate may never overtake his "faithful little tribe."

Is it not a little remarkable that this great explorer should fail to distinguish between the vice that clings like a parasite to society and the virtue of Christ's religion? These nations, he says, "properly speaking, have no religion." At best they have but a dim recognition of good and evil spirits. To the elevating, progressive influence of Christianity the lieutenant to-day owes his knowledge and liberty, yet he is averse to allowing others the same blessings. The difference between the lieutenant and his tribe is that he was born and reared under Christian influence, and they were not. Not such a great difference, after all.

Pure and undefiled religion has never yet been guilty of holding back a nation, a tribe or an individual. True, the same ship that carries out Bibles and preachers may carry rum and rum dealers, but no wise person will blame Christianity for this.

In spite of the rum and attendant evils, Christian nations are the most progressive and the most elevated.

"These nations," he adds further, "have no marriage ceremony. The wife is as much a piece of personal property which may be sold, exchanged, loaned or borrowed, as a sledge or canoe." This is a very sad commentary on their moral condition—no religion and no marriage obligations, yet he is not willing that religion should disturb them. The thing they lack is the religion of the Bible; the light they need is the light of revelation. Why should any man be unwilling that these blessings should be conferred? A higher authority said: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." What else will make them free? What?

The Seventh Christian Church Bible-school, Indianapolis, Ind., is attempting to raise money for the enlargement of their church building by a commission of "White Cloud Soap." Circular letters are being sent to every Bible school in the State giving the terms of sale, plan, etc. This is not a case of "soft soaping" business, but of an honest legitimate effort by large sales of this particular brand of soap to greatly assist in raising the funds needed for the work. R. W. Clymer is the pastor of the Seventh Christian Church, Indianapolis, Ind., and A. B. Gould the superintendent of the Bible-school.

Indiana Notes.

Bro. Ashley S. Johnson, of Kimberlin Heights, Tenn., has been with us a few days and preached for me twice. His sermons were most highly appreciated by all who heard him.

Two of our boys from Union City are now in attendance at this school. They speak of it in the very highest terms of praise.

Bro. Johnson is doing a great work, and I am more and more convinced that we do not fully appreciate what he is doing for many a poor young preacher.

Last Sunday evening we held "union patriotic" services in the Christian Church. The other churches were invited, the M. E. minister, the Presbyterian, and the U. B. preachers, were all there, and each made a short address. Three church choirs were called upon and furnished the music for the services. Everything passed off pleasantly and profitably. Although the weather was warm, yet the house was well filled. I recommend this to be tried in the various cities and towns. I am quite sure it will do much good.

The following were some of the subjects we discussed, giving eight minutes to each:

"Should the Christian Citizen Participate in Politics?"

"Mammon-Worship and its everywhere prevalent Fruits."

"Sunday Observance Vital to National Preservation."

"A Debauched Public Conscience."

Solos, duets and choruses aided in completing the program.

I am now preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons on great missionaries. These sermons are stirring quite an interest and giving an impetus to "summer weariness." I recommend it as an excellent tonic for the tired and jaded soul. A. M. HOOTMAN.

Ministerial Relief.

On account of my long and painful illness, acting on the advice of my physicians, I am obliged to lay down the burdens of Ministerial Relief. This step is taken in much sorrow, but not without hope that while the workman may be obliged to surrender, they work will go on. The Trustees have engaged Bro. D. R. Lucas, of Indianapolis, to take up this work. Bro. Lucas will prepare articles for our papers, and deliver addresses at our conventions, in behalf of this holy ministry.

Howard Cale, of Indianapolis, who is president of the board of trustees, will attend to all business matters, and until further notice, all correspondence and all contributions of money should be addressed to him at 120 E. Market St., Indianapolis.

I have much joy in many holy memories of my service in this blessed ministry. The friends of Ministerial Relief can in no better way contribute to my permanent recovery than by the general support of the cause in which I came so near laying down my life.

On account of the falling off in receipts, the board was compelled to make a reduction of 20 per cent. on the July allowances. This was very unfortunate. The only way to prevent a much larger reduction on the September allowances, is by prompt and generous offerings.

Yours fraternally,

A. M. ATKINSON.

Wabash, Ind.

From The North End of Boone.

Our work prospers during the summer months. We have raised several hundred dollars for debt and repairs. All the missionary offerings have been remembered, and we have gone beyond former records in every instance. Many representative brethren have addressed us in behalf of important interests. Prof. Jones, of Fulton, for the Orphan School; Chancellor Lockhart for Christian University, Canton; G. A. Hoffman for the Missouri Bible College; C. C. Smith for Home Missions; John Sergis, of Des Moines, on Persia as a Mission field; Mrs. Alice Williams, of Cameron, for the state C. W. B. M. (not a brother, but as able as any); and others have spoken for us to the delight of all. Brethren who have known this field would be surprised if they would drop in some Sunday and hear our choir rendering one of the finest anthems; or, to hear in the announcements of three Endeavor Society meetings for one day, and this supplemented by two other society meetings and a modern teachers' meeting the following week. Instead of no organ, two; Children's Day concert taking place of regular sermon at night, pledges for Foreign Missions taken publicly, etc., etc. Shades of the apostles!

I have just returned from the Lectureship and Ministerial Association at Carrollton. I have not enjoyed any like treats more. The water got deep at times, but every now and then a paper or reviewer would give us water through which we could wade "flat footed," and now and than a "riffle" for the little fellows to paddle in. The Ministerial Association is assuming proportions. Prof. Clinton Lockhart makes a scholarly and dignified president. The affable and energetic secretary, C. C. Hill, has done more than any one else to perfect the organization. Bro. Hill deserves the high esteem in which he is held, and the Missouri brotherhood has still better things, I doubt not, for him. H. A. DENTON.

Centralia, Mo.

Cincinnati and Vicinity.

Vernon Stauffer is the faithful and successful minister at the Eastern Avenue Church. Reports submitted at the recent annual meeting indicate the best year in the history of the church.

E. W. Symmonds continues to make good reports from the work at Camp Washington. Bro. S. is doing a good work, and at no little sacrifice to himself.

The new mission at Fairmount, under the care and direction of J. S. Laurence, is flourishing. Bro. Wilson, district evangelist, is to hold them a meeting soon. This means a new congregation and a new house in the near future. Our churches in the city have been meeting in one place for a few Sunday evenings, and the arrangement has proven to be both delightful and helpful.

The Board of City Evangelization is arranging to hold an institute on city work in this city from the 1st to the 12th of next November. The purpose of the institute is to study city life and plans of church work, under the leadership and direction of some of the men of experience and who have been successful in dealing with some of the problems of city work. The following are some of the subjects that will be considered: House to House Canvass, Rescue Missions, Work Among Men, Street and Factory Preaching, Awakening and Sustaining the Evangelistic Spirit, Planting Missions, etc.

These subjects will be presented by such men as C. L. Thurgood, of Pittsburg; W. B. Taylor, of Chicago; F. G. Tyrrell, of St. Louis. The question throughout will be, not so much what can you say, but what can you do? The need of the hour is the spirit of service.

When Mr. Gladstone came down with what proved to be his last illness, the short message that was flashed over the wires, "Mr. Gladstone has stopped work," is full of meaning and reveals the secret of his greatness. The working out in one's life of the convictions of a pure, strong heart, is what makes one great with God and men.

The greater America will require a change of vision. Some who have seen only America will find it necessary now to extend their vision. Others who have been talking about "a larger outlook" will find it necessary to learn the difference between a larger outlook and simply a long outlook. One may have a very extended outlook and not see very much either, because one does not see widely.

California Notes and News.

California has two conventions each year. Not that she has so many Christians, but that her magnificent distances necessitate the division of the State into Northern and Southern Districts. The Southern Convention met on July the 6th, at Long Beach, the most beautiful of the many beautiful seaside watering places in California. The Northern Convention holds its session at Garfield Park, beginning July the 25th, and continuing until August the 8th. The convention program will be enriched by consecrated and able talent. Mrs. Persis L. Christian will sweeten, soften and inspire the convention as few women can. Mrs. Princess Long, the sweet singer of the Pacific, will lead the song service. No woman ever sang so sweetly our sacred songs.

Benj. L. Smith and A. McLean and George W. Sweeney will deliver the great sermons and addresses, which will make these conventions memorable in the history of the state.

WESTERN CONVENTION.

There is some agitation of a Western Convention looking toward organized, systematic and effective evangelization of the great West. Such a convention has in it possibilities worthy the consideration the churches of the Pacific slope.

Among the gratifying results of the past year's work will be the excellent reports of the Berkeley Bible Seminary and Curtener Seminary, and the enlargement of the Pacific Christian. H. D. McAneny has recently been chosen to take the presidency of Curtener Seminary. This choice is very pleasing to the friends of Curtener. Prof. McAneny has made himself indispensable to the welfare of the churches of California. He is a man whom all the coast loves and whose business ability and Christian consecration are having a very large influence for good.

Prof. S. M. Jefferson, Dean of Berkeley Bible Seminary, is very highly regarded by his students. He is laying a splendid foundation for the Seminary.

Bro. Geo. W. Sweeney, former pastor of the Oakland Church, and wife, are visiting at that place, which is really their permanent home, though they have been living for the past two or three years in Chicago, on account of Sister Sweeney's health. Bro. Sweeney has been preaching pretty generally throughout the state to large and enthusiastic audiences.

He is a favorite preacher with many of the churches of the coast. He will preach and lecture at both of our conventions. After the State meetings he will return to Chicago, which will be his home for the next few years.

Bro. Thos. B. Butler is now the much-beloved pastor of the First Church at Oakland. The church is united and prosperous under his ministry.

The Central Church of Oakland, after Bro. Davis resigned, called R. H. Sawyer to the pastorate. After three months' ministry he resigned to accept the call to Watsonville.

Bro. J. C. Day has resigned at Woodland and returned to Colorado. He was much beloved by the good people of Woodland, who very much regretted his resignation.

I have just returned to Iowa after five years' work in the West. It seems good to be once more in the shadow of Drake University.

Missouri C. W. B. M.

Missouri made a fine record the second quarter; but the contributions of the third quarter were not as large as usual. The fourth quarter closes with September, and State Convention meets September 26-29. All contributions, dues and pledges should be received by Sister White, in Indianapolis, or Sister Johnson, in Chillicothe, by Sep. 21st, at the very latest; so that reports can be made out and sent to me, and I can have a tabulated report printed before I start to Nevada, on the 26th of September. Sisters, keep these facts in mind, and collect and report promptly.

Seven of the forty-five persons who pleged life-memberships this year, have paid in full. All are expected to make at least one payment before Sep. 21st. If those who can conveniently do so would pay $25 each, in one payment, between now and Sep. 21st, it would be a great favor to the cause. Twenty life-memberships, paid in full, would equal the $500 annuity gift that one sister gave the C. W. B. M. last year. All contributions made on the annuity plan bear interest, and this interest is paid to the doner so long as he lives. Thus a safe investment is made and the income secured.

Sister S. H. Gillium, the energetic manager of the Chillicothe district, and the wife of the pastor of the Hamilton Church, organized an auxiliary at Kingston, recently. We hope that all managers will be able to report new auxiliaries at the Nevada meeting.

By invitation of the sisters of the First Church, Kansas City, auxiliary, of which Mrs. Thos. Hoffman is president and Mrs. Bixby Willis is secretary, your state secretary had a part in their public C. W. B. M. service, the first Sunday in July. In the evening of the same day she attended the services of the Independence auxiliary. Brethren Richardson and Vernon are firm friends of our organization. Bro. Procter has encouraged the work in Missouri since the beginning.

Sister and Brother Felix Allison are paying for a membership in memory of their sister, Sylvia Caton, who died last winter. This is indeed a sweet memorial.

Our Sister Abbott, who has been ill so long, is growing gradually worse. The auxiliary sisters will remember her in their prayers, and extend to Bro. Abbott and his daughter, Miss Maud, their heartfelt sympathies.

J. W. Zachary's meeting in the Christian Church at Nashville resulted in 22 baptisms, and his meeting at Center Point, Ark., which closed Sunday night, resulted in 21 accessions to the Christian faith; 15 of these were baptized.

NEBRASKA.

Bethany, July 1.—Three by confession and five by letter since Jan. 1, at Peru; 20 in all since I began work there in October. Eight of these were added in a meeting held by Bro. A. W. Davis, of Falls City, in October. Two others were immersed who went with the Congregationalists.—O. C. ATWATER.

KANSAS.

Cherokee, July 16.—We had three additions at our last meeting. We had one addition at our last meeting at Monmouth. The outlook is encouraging all along the line. The 30 young converts (we had at our revival) with the rest of the church at Weir City are doing fine.—J. P. HANER.

ILLINOIS.

Waverly, July 20, 1898.—Four added here Sunday.—EUGENE T. MARTIN.

Watseke, July 20.—Two baptisms here Sunday evening. Eleven pastors from the county and adjacent territory attended the regular monthly ministerial meeting in the church parlor Monday, and on the following day most of them picnicked at a pleasant point on the Iroquois River, near this city.—B. S. FERRALL.

NORTH DAKOTA.

Ellendale, July 18.—W. A. Foster's meeting here closed with five additions.—T. L. NOBLITT.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

Purcell.—We had two delightful services on yesterday with two additions to the church: one by confession and one by letter.—HENRY A. MAJOR.

MINNESOTA.

Austin.—Have returned to this city, from a meeting at Redwood Falls, in which nine were added to the church; eight baptisms. This is a city of 7,000; church one year old; I expect to stay until a house is erected. The state board believes in doing permanent work. Bro. V. J. Rose organized here one year ago. The board will keep me here until they are housed. A preacher who could not work with such a band of men as compose the Minnesota board ought to quit preaching. The work in this state is great and resources limited. I have more work than four men can do. Minnesota needs the primitive gospel. Push Home Missions to the front that our land may be evangelized.—A. B. MOORE, State Evangelist.

Plainview, July 19th.—Nine added to this church since I last reported; six by confession and baptism; all branches of church prospering.—T. E. UTTERBACK.

KENTUCKY.

Lexington, July 15th.—Last Sunday night we closed a meeting at Grassy Creek Church, Pendleton county, which lasted over three weeks and resulted in 64 additions to the church. Bro. E. S. Baker, of the College of the Bible rendered valuable assistance in singing and personal work.—ROBERT STEWART.

MISSOURI.

Sturgeon, July 21.—67 additions to date.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Belleview, July 18.—Am beginning a meeting here at my old home—the first meeting ever held by a Christian preacher in Belleview. I am so thankful for this privilege and we are working and praying for spiritual blessings.—A. M. HARRALL.

We have organized a small congregation at Cherry Box and built a new house not yet finished.—MARY E. MCCULLY.

Galena, July 18.—Have just closed a one week's meetieg at this place, assisted by Bro. S. S. McGill, of Lebanon. Bro. McGill is a very able man and gave us the pure gospel. Two confessed Christ and were baptized. The Galena church has employed me to preach for them a year. The church has had no pastor for sometime.—G. W. HAMILTON.

Preachers Should Tell their People.

Every preacher should tell his people, and especially the young, all about the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses. Full information may be had gratis, by dropping a card to the Bethany C. E. Company, 798 Republic Street, Cleveland, O. Begin at once to plan for systematic reading among the people of your church.

There will be a tent meeting held at Fulton, Ill., a mission point in the first district, beginning Aug. 13th, lasting one week and longer if interest warrants. Disciples in adjoining territory are earnestly invited to attend. Lodging free. Meals 50 cents per day. By order of First District Board.

Lessons in Soul Winning

By E. H. KELLAR.

Dr. Warren Randolph, Secretary International Lesson Committee, says:

"Seldom have I seen so much which ought to be thought about and studied packed into a book of this size. If in all our Sunday-schools the prayerful study of these pages could be added to the study of the regular Scripture lesson (and nothing should interfere with that) it could scarcely fail of producing that kind of 'evolution' devoutly to be hoped for—the evolution of Christian workers out of Christian disciples."

Literature.

"THE HOME BEYOND," by Miss Marguerite Eatherton. Word and Works Pub. Co., St. Louis, Mo., publishers. Price 50 cents.

This little book, elegantly written, printed and bound, is a beautiful exhortation to faithfulness in the Christian's life and hope. The author has a strong hold upon the unseen, by faith, and presents many cheering thoughts about "The Home Beyond."

"THE TWO PARABLES," by Charles R. Brown. Fleming H. Revell, Chicago and New York, publishers. Price $1.25.

Those who enjoy practical lessons will appreciate this book of sermons from the two great parables of Christ. They are not dry analytical examinations of the parable, but a readjustment, and we may also say a closer adjustment, of their lessons to every-day affairs of this life. The book abounds in terse, striking sentences that affect the reader in a most pleasant and profitable way.

"W. E. GLADSTONE," by Walter Jerrold. Fleming H. Revell, Chicago and New York, publishers. Price, cloth, 75 cents; 168 pages.

This is a convenient book for the busy man and the young. It sketches the rise of this great man in easy stages from pinnacle to pinnacle unto the heights of his fame as a Christian statesman. It is a very satisfactory outline of one of the world's greatest men.

"ACROSS THE GULF," by Mrs. N. M. Vandervoort. Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo., publishers. Price $1.00; 268 pages.

This fascinating story, located at Rome in the beginning of Christianity, brings out many of the facts of the gospel and its earlier historical surroundings, conflicts and victories. This story was first printed serially in Our Young Folks, and created an immediate demand for its publication. It is an interesting and profitable book, especially for young people.

"EUCHOLOGION," or Book of Common Prayer, issued by the Church Service Society of the Church of Scotland. Fleming H. Revell, Chicago and New York, publishers. Price $1.00; 156 pages.

The above book is especially valuable for its suggestive prayers, forms of service and exercise. It may also be used practically in the congregation. It contains a large number of prayers suitable for all seasons and occasions.

"STEPPING STONES TO LITERATURE," by Sarah Louise Arnold and Chas. B. Gilbert. Silver Burdett & Co., Chicago, New York and Boston, publishers.

The above book is one of a series of books designed to meet the higher wants of the schoolroom. It contains only the best literature and is much better adapted to the modern graded school. The authors believe that if these Readers are used wisely, according to the plan suggested, they will not only help to make better readers of the children of the schools, but will also aid in a wise correlation of studies, will cultivate taste, stimulate a love of good literature and, through literature, bring within reach of the children the choicest treasures of the world.

THE EVANGELISTIC LIBRARY, by Ashley S. Johnson, consisting of six books in paper covers, a pamphlet and ten tracts, having had a total circulation of 150,000 copies of the books at a very low price, undoubtedly has done good. The books cover the whole ground of religious discussion; the best part being "The Life of Trust" and "How to Read and Remember the Bible."

The pamphlet is a graphic story of the gradual raising of $40,000 for the School of the Evangelists and the care of one hundred young men growing into the ministry by daily toil on the school farm at Kimberlin Heights, Tenn. The enterprise at Kimberlin Heights is a magnificent labor of love to prepare young men to preach the gospel in the hills and mountains of adjacent states. The Evangelistic Library in the hands of the common people is sure to do great good. Address A. S. Johnson, Kimberlin Heights, Tenn.

Freedom's Jubilee.

What sounds are those that greet our ears, like voices swelling loud?
What means this concourse gathered here, like some fast-driving cloud?
What shouts are those, and wild acclaims, that cleave the summer air?
Hark'k! Hark! Lift up your eyes! The flag we love is there!

* * * * * * *

On many a long and weary march those silver stars have gazed;
O'er many a hard-fought battle field those crimson stripes have blazed;
And many a triumph has been won beneath its colors bright,
By war-scarred veterans who fought for freedom and the right!
Then fling abroad that glorious flag! Set all its splendors free!
Fling out the stripes! Fling out the stars! 'Tis freedom's jubilee!

And ah, those silver stars have gazed on many a peaceful scene,
While shrined as sacred relics hung war's erstwhile weapons keen!
The bugle's voice that called to arms in shrill and martial strain,
Since then has sung the song of peace o'er many a fruitful plain;
The ruddy camp-fire shines no more on civil strife to-day,
But lights in friendly bivouac now, comrades in Blue and Gray!
Then fling abroad our country's flag! Waft it o'er land and sea!
Fling out the stripes! Fling out the stars! 'Tis freedom's jubilee!

O flag, proud flag of liberty! Though war's dark visage looms
To cast once more upon our land its terrors and its glooms,
Thy silver stars and crimson stripes shall float from freedom's dome
While beats one heart beneath thy folds to claim this land as home!
The spirits of our gallant sires have never passed away;
The blood that fired their loyal hearts throbs in our veins to-day!
Then float in majesty on high! Float over land and sea!
Fling out thy siripes! Fling out thy stars! 'Tis freedom's jubilee!

Text Stories—VIII.

INDEX TO CHARACTER.

BY ALICE CURTICE MOYER.

Whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting of the hair, and wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel, but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price.—1 Peter 3:3, 4.

We again bring to your notice our young friends, Ethel and May, whose acquaintance you made in our last Text Story. Also May's mother, who never lost an opportunity for bringing out some good thought or truth for the benefit of her daughter and her daughter's friend. It might be well to say a word here to mothers. The wise mother is the one who shares the friendships of her children; who welcomes into the friendly home atmosphere her children's friends. Aside from the fact that it gives her an opportunity to decide whom she would have her children associate with, it adds to the happiness of the son or the daughter to have his or her friend looked upon as also the friend of the family. We all know what a sweet experience it is to have a near and dear friend, whom we can trust, even with our thoughts; one who understands us and sympathizes with us; who rejoices when we rejoice and comforts us when we sorrow; who helps us to bear our burdens, thereby making them lighter. How we love such a friend. It may be a sister or brother; father or mother; husband or wife. And again, it may be one to whom we are not at all related, save by the ties of sympathy and fellowships which exist ever, between kindred souls. The heart hungers for friends and our children are going to form friendsips, with or without our help in the selection. Then how necessary that we exercise our wiser judgment and help them in their choice of companions.

But to return to our story: Ethel and May are again in the parlor of May's home, and are again watching from the window the passers-by—as girls dearly love to do—and conversing in their usual friendliness, when Ethel, catching sight of a familiar figure, exclaims:

"Look, May! There is Lucy Merritt, looking as untidy as usual."

"It does seem to me," replied May, "that she should at least have some care of her appearance on the street. It is bad enough to go to school in such fashion."

"My daughter," remonstrated the mother gently, "are you not indulging in unkind criticism?"

"I have been too well taught by you, mother, dear, for that," replied May. "I do not mean to criticise Lucy, that is, unkindly, but we cannot help noticing her untidiness, and it seems unpardonable because it is unnecessary. If her circumstances made it impossible for her to take any thought of her personal appearance, she would have our deepest sympathy, but there is really no excuse for her. And the strange part of it is, that Lucy's mother encourages her in it, saying that it is apt to make girls vain to think of dress; and that it is sinful to give so much thought to one's personal appearance. Of course, we all know that it is wrong to give one's whole thought to dress, but it also seems to me wrong to utterly neglect it."

"You are right, my daughter; it is wrong. To thinking people, this outward neglect seems almost like at least a hint of neglect within. If Lucy's mother could but understand this, surely she would not allow her daughter to say by her personal appearance, 'I am just as careless in my thoughts and motives as I am in my dress.' No mother is making a mistake to teach her child a proper regard for his or her personal appearance; rather, she is wronging the child if she does not so teach."

"You should see Lucy at school, mother, with her unkept hair, her soiled collars and her half-laced shoes. And she is just the same way about her lessons. Her exercises are never complimented for neatness or exactness, and I have sometimes wondered if it has not all come from the fact that she has been allowed to be so careless in other things."

"No doubt it is. Her mother has, without realizing, of course, the harm it may cause, allowed her to form the habit of carelessness—than which there are few more deplorable—and very probably it will cling to her through life.

"As to matters of dress, I am very sorry to say that there are some people who seem to think that the apostle meant to teach utter disregard for personal appearance when he said, 'Whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting of the hair,' etc., but I cannot believe that he meant to advocate any such thing. I am sure that the women whom Peter had in mind were of the class who live but to make frames of themselves whereupon to display their ornaments—vain butterflies who adorn themselves with these 'outward adornings,' with but little thought for aught else. Women who live for such ignoble purpose almost deserve the contempt with which they are usually regarded, but it is the Christian's duty to endeavor to lift them to a higher plane than this mere butterfly existence, and to inspire them with a desire to fill their lives with something better than mere frivolity. A butterfly is short-lived, and nobody erects a monument to its memory.

"However, on the other hand, if a woman possesses those virtues which are in the sight of God of great price, there certainly is no reason, if her circumstances permit, why she should not wear jewels and fine fabrics. I have never been able to see wherein the wearing of these is inconsistent with religion, and I do not believe that God is going to disapprove if he sees that they are only the covering of a spirit surpassing in beauty and loveliness.

"Indeed, taste in dress may be often accepted as a sort of index to character. This, of course, is not an infallible rule, for circumstances do not always allow a freedom in the matter of dress, still it cannot be denied that we are apt to measure the mental or spiritual trend of people—especially of women—by their dress; not by the richness of quality of the apparel, but by that intangible something called taste, or a sense of the fitness of things. Everybody acknowledges that a neat print is more attractive than the richest of velvets and finest of satins, if gaudy, ill-fitting and overtrimmed. However, this is all merely suggestive—containing, of course, a certain degree of truth, but I would not like to say that it is a rule to be always relied upon.

"But while on this subject of insight to character, my dears, I want to call your attention to an index that can be relied upon—one that furnishes a sure insight to to the 'hidden man of the heart'—the face. In it we have a sure guide. This cannot be said, particularly, of the young face which is but an unwritten page, but of the face that bears the stamp of years. If young people could understand how truly their faces will tell of the lives they have lived, surely they would be careful as to what they write thereon. It is a fact that we all dread to grow old; and especially do women bemoan the appearance of the first sign of age. But I wish, my girls, to make you understand now, that you need not grow old—whether you do or do not, is a question you may decide for yourselves. Years may come and go, but they need not make us old; indeed, each should leave us more beautiful than before. Can we not call to mind women of our acquaintance who, though their years may be many, are yet not old? And it is because of the diary that the spirit has written on their faces. Each line tells a story of sacrifice, of silent heroism, and is so stamped with God's approval that we do not think of them as lines of age; rather, they seem like silent monitors urging us to a higher and better life.

Such a face is a sure index to a successful life—the sort of success that cannot be measured by houses and lands, fame or station, but which is, in the sight of God, the most successful and acceptable. For after all, a truly successful life is nothing more nor less than living as well as we know how, and of doing, always the very best we can and all the good we can. An eminent writer truly says: 'The life of the humblest woman in the land, if well lived, is as successful as is the woman who, with greater opportunities, is enabled to make the results of her work reach farther.'

"Let us, therefore, take heed what we write on this journal of ours. Our face at twenty-five is the face God has given us, but our face at fifty is the one we have made for ourselves. Let us see to it that it be a face to claim the admiration and love of all honest hearts. That it be a face that tells of victories over self, glorified by the beauty and purity of the inner man of the heart, stamped with the majesty of God's thoughths. In short, a face that cannot grow old, for it is radiant with the beauty and grace of inner adorning."

St. Louis, Mo.

"Mother'n Me's Partners."

A sturdy little girl it was, trudging bravely by with a pail of water. So many times it had passed our gate that morning that curiosity prompted us to further acquaintance.

"You are a busy little girl to-day?"

"Yes'm."

The round face under the broad hat was turned toward us. It was freckled, flushed and perspiring, but cheery withal. "Yes'm, it takes heaps of water to do washin."

"And do you bring it all from the brook down there?"

"Oh, we have it in the cistern mostly, only it's been such a dry time lately."

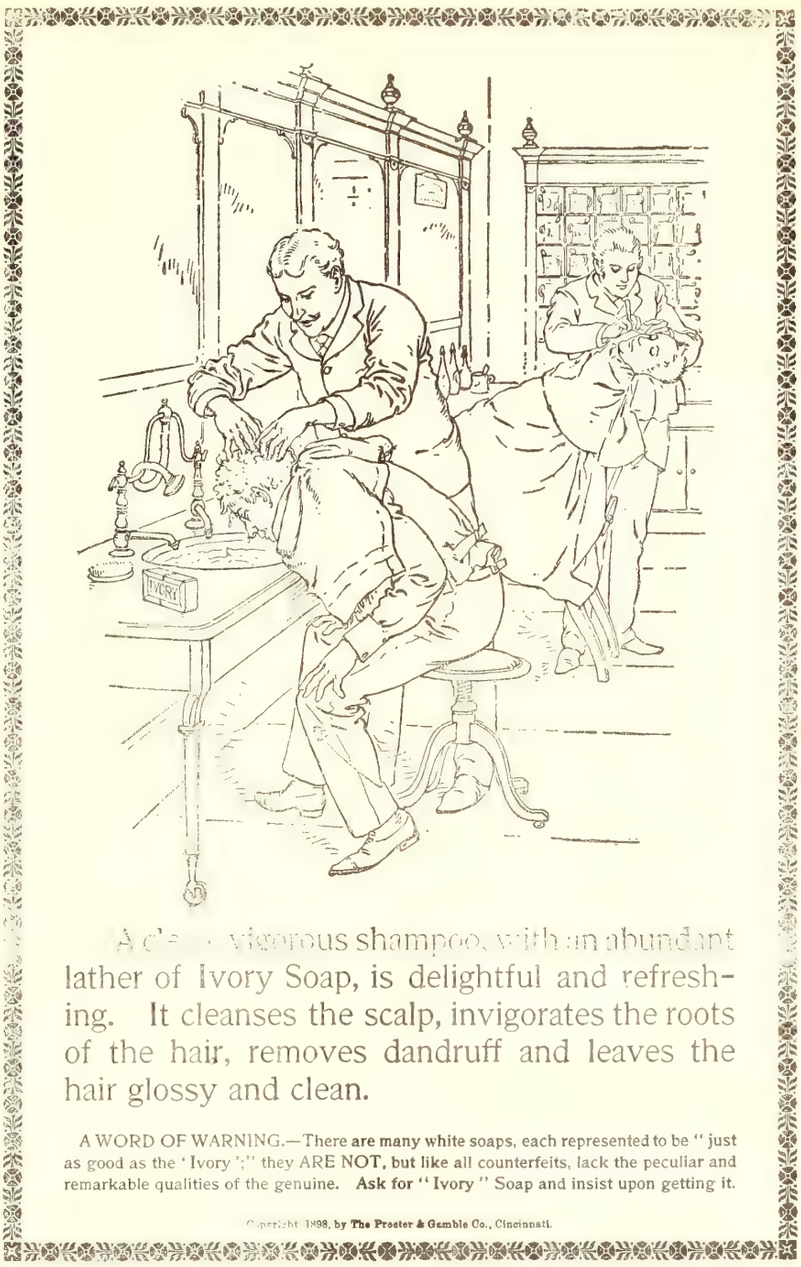
"And there is nobody else to carry the water?"

"Nobody but mother, an' she is washin.' "

"Well, you are a good girl to help her."

It was not a well-considered compliment and the little water-carrier did not consider it one at all; for there was a look of surprise in her gray eyes, and an almost indignant tone in her voice as she answered:

"Why, of course, I help her. I always help her to do things all the time; she hasn't anybody else. Mother'n me's partners."



Little girl, are you and mother partners? Do you help her all you can?—Little Worker.

A Dull Student.

Once upon a time—so the story goes, according to the Youth's Companion—an old priest said to his young companion: "I am going away, little priest, and I leave the temple in your charge. No matter who comes, don't lend them anything."

Not long after the old man left, an old woman came to worship. She prostrated herself before the idols, and prayed and prayed until it rained. Then she said to the boy: "Your master knows me well, for I come often to worship. Won't you lend me his umbrella?"

"No," was the prompt reply. "I cannot lend anybody anything."

A c'e- vigorous shampoo, with an abundant lather of Ivory Soap, is delightful and refreshing. It cleanses the scalp, invigorates the roots of the hair, removes dandruff and leaves the hair glossy and clean.

A WORD OF WARNING.—There are many white soaps, each represented to be "just as good as the 'Ivory';" they ARE NOT, but like all counterfeits, lack the peculiar and remarkable qualities of the genuine. Ask for "Ivory" Soap and insist upon getting it.

Copyright 1898, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

Upon the master's return the faithful boy related his experience; but instead of praise he received stern reproof.

"O, you stupid boy! Do you know no better than that? Why, you have driven away one of my best worshipers! You will spoil my business. You should have been polite. You should say: 'Won't you please step in and have a chair? I will steep you fresh tea and bring you little cakes. Make yourself as comfortable as possible; but I am very sorry to say my master was out in a storm one day, and it blew and it blew, and it took the skin right off his umbrella, and strewed the bones all around, and so we have none.' Say that, and she could not be angry."

"All right, sir; I'll say it next time."

Not long after this the master went away again, and there came a man who said: "Little priest, I have been high up on the mountains, and gathered a big load of kindling wood. It is too heavy. I cannot get it home. Will you let me take your master's horse?"

"Come in, sir," said the little man, "and make yourself very comfortable. I will bring you cakes and steep you fresh tea; but I am very sorry to say the old horse was out in a storm, and it blew and it blew, and it took the skin right off and blew the bones away, and we haven't any."

The man gazed in astonishment upon the boy, and turned away in disgust.

When the master returned the boy related all that had happened, and received a round scolding. "O, you small idiot! You grow worse and worse. Don't tell the same story every time. Have some sense—make your story fit. You should have said, 'I am very sorry to say the old horse was out in the field, and stumbed in a hole and sprained his leg and went lame, and we turned him out to grass, and we haven't any.' "

"All right, sir; I will say it the next time."

Again the boy was left in charge, and there came a man who said: "Your master is my dear old friend. I should like to see him."

"Come in, sir: take a seat, sir. I will bring you new cakes and steep you fresh tea. Please be as comfortable as possible sir. I am very sorry to say my master was out in the field and stumbled in a hole and went lame, and we have turned him out to grass, and we havn't any."

A Song of Water.

MRS. ALICE ROBINSON.

I will sing of pure cold water
As it flows from founts and springs,
Darkling in the depths of wildwoods,
Sparkling in the courts of kings.
Darkling water, sparkling water,
From Columbia's mighty flood
To the wondrous, mystic river
Flowing by the throne of God.

Sparkling water, darkling water,
Dips the oar and glides the boat
Where the shores are dark with willows
And the water lilies float.
O, cold water, pure cold water,
Israel's savior thou dost seem,
As they faint in Sinai's desert
Close by Marah's bitter stream.

Flashing water, splashing water,
Brimming cup for Fever's lips.
To the hidden thread of silver
Where the dainty wild bird dips.
Sparkling water, pure cold water,
O, the world owes much to thee,
From the sacred flood of Jordan
To thy waves, blue Galilee!

Not All a Dream.

E. O. SHARPE.

After an all-night vigil in the sick room and a weary pilgrimage of pastoral visiting I retired early to get a good long sleep, and on account of my exhaustion I did not sleep well, but dreamed troublous dreams. A strange chain of events passed through my throbbing mind as I slept, and yet all seemed so real that I am constrained to set it down here. I dreamed that while seated in my home with my children around me, there came a sharp knock at the door. On opening, there stood a young man of my acquaintance, then acting as deputy sheriff. He said, "I have a warrant for your arrest." This came upon me and my family like an electric shock. We besought him to tell us with what crime I was charged. He did not know, but I must go with him forthwith to the court, then in session. On the way thither I besought his help to escape if I was to be made the victim of injustice. He promised to have a swift horse at the court-house door and to facilitate my flight if it became necessary.

On entering the court room I beheld the judge on the bench—a stranger to me—and twelve men in the jury-box,—all chosen before my arrival. I mentally filed this as No. 1 for a bill of exceptions.

The trial began by placing me, the accused, on the witness stand, in spite of my protests against this injustice as well as against a packed jury, but all in vain. No affidavit was read, no charges preferred. Everything was in the greatest disorder. It seemed that every one in the court room (a large crowd was present) was permitted to ask me questions. One pert young miss asked me what I had to eat the day before, and I proudly told her "turkey with dressing and cranberry sauce." This was pressed no further, and I was glad of it, for I did have turkey, though the bird had belonged to the Presbyterian minister and had been misdelivered. This latter fact I was not aware of, however, till the turkey was in ruins. I thought an anonymous friend had sent it.

Next, an old gray-bearded gentleman, well-known as a socialistic and financial reformer took me in hand and catechised me about my preaching awhile and finally wound up by asking if I thought I was able to earn my enormous salary of $1,500 per year. I answered modestly that I was able to earn a million dollars a year if I could get it. This gave him such a shock he retired from the attorney's chair. Another person whom I did not very well know and had rarely seen at church then took the witness stand, and on examination-in-chief testified that my preaching was often irreverent, that certain anecdotes and illustrations were unbecoming so solemn an occasion and place as a sermon. In short I was sometimes irreligious and even sacrilegious in my remarks, and deserved severe reprobation for my offense.

In cross-examination I was my own attorney and asked the witness to define religion since he (or she—I do not remember the sex, but it does not matter) had characterized my preaching as irreligious. Opposing counsel objected on the ground that my demand for a definition was irrelevant. Objection not sustained. Witness could not define religion. Did not know what it was, but he (or she) thought my funny illustrations were quite out of place, as they made people "laugh in meetin'." Witness did not laugh, but was horrified. Witness admitted that he (or she) did not often laugh. Did not know in what stage of the moon he (or she) was born, and could not see that that had anything to do with his (or her) missing sense of humor.

This ended the testimony, and there was a dreadful confusion, as the whole crowd tried to get up at once to make a prosecuting speech. Each one had a different fault to find in me, and what some regarded as vices others thought were virtues, so not being able to choose one of their number to speak for all, the judge commanded order and when quiet was restored he informed me I might speak for myself. I have not a very distinct recollection of all my harangue, but I called the whole trial a farce and an outrage unparalleled in the annals of jurisprudence. I said to the judge: "If your honor had a vestige of judicial equity in your head or heart you would have driven these hyenas from the judgment seat as did Gallio of old." I was just going to blast the jury with my lightning when I saw that eleven were sound asleep and the foreman had his already prepared verdict in his hand. I turned from that base crew with scorn and paid my respects to the pert young lady who had peered into my bill of fare. I think I called her a gadfly, fit for nothing but to pester her superiors. I said she would never die, as there was not enough to her to furnish a funeral. She would evaporate and go off in thin mist and would never be missed either.

While I was dealing out these delicate compliments I saw that almost every one was choking with laughter. Then I knew it was a moot court and mock trial, and they were having sport at my expense. I gave one howl of general execration and broke for the door. There stood the deputy's horse (or some one's) and I jumped on his back and rode him up and down the streets of M—— yelling like a wild Indian. Then I awoke as tired as when I went to bed. I knew it was all a dream, but I made up my mind that hereafter when criticised I would regard it as only a mock trial.

This was my dream, and yet it is "not all a dream."

The Book of Books.

The fundamental truths of the Bible, and many of its narratives, were more or less known among all heathen nations, ancient or modern. This proves that they formed their systems of religion from that revealed by God. Let us see.

The Chinese declare that man was made of the dust of the earth.

The Indians agree with the Bible in saying that the first man, whom they call Adam, was placed with his wife in an earthly paradise.

The Persians say that man and woman ought to have lived happily, but the serpent tempted them.

The Iroquois, like the Bible, tell us of the woman who suffered herself to be tempted at the foot of a tree; of the anger of God, of his driving her out, etc.

The Chaldeans, one of the most ancient nations, tell us, like the Bible, that God announced to mankind that he would destroy them by a deluge; that he commanded a man to build a ship, and save himself and his children.

The Americans, before they were discovered by Columbus, believed some of the facts related in the Bible, because they spoke to Columbus of a universal deluge.

Since we find among all nations a belief of certain facts, not so obscured but that we can recognize in them the wreck, as it may be called, of Scripture narratives and doctrines, we conclude that the religion of the Bible is the source whence all others have sprung; that is to say, it is the one religion, and consequently divine. While there are many religions, there ought to be but one. God would have had it thus; man will not. A. R. ADAMS.

Mammoth Cave is a labyrinth of winding paths two hundred miles in length, in different stories, one below another. On every side there are dangers and pitfalls; here the Bottomless Pit, there the Mælstrom, here Scylla and there Charybdis, there "the black hole" and the Dead Sea. The darkness is absolute; it can almost be felt. No one can find his way without a guide. If left behind it is not safe to move. A friend once got behind and was alone in the dark, and the twenty minutes seemed an eternity. Some of our party lingered behind, and then we heard them calling to us that they had lost their way. We could see their lights and hear their voices, but they did not know the way to us. After we had gone some little distance into its depths, we came to a hall called the "Church." Here one of the guides mounted a high rock and called our attention to a short sermon he wished to preach. The sermon was, "Keep close to your guide." And we soon found that the only safety was in giving careful heed to the guide's sermon. And we found, too, that the best place was near the guide, where we could hear most plainly his descriptions and stories connected with the places. Jesus is our guide. He never leads us into bad places or wrong doings. Sometimes he guides in strange ways, but always the best ways in the end.—Christian Leader.

How Cavalry Horses are Prepared for War.

A war-horse is broken to be steady under fire by tying ropes to his legs. While the animal is down on the ground the officer takes a pistol and fires it close to his ear. Then in rapid order he fires the weapon over his back, under his neck, betweed his legs, anywhere that an opening presents itself during the horse's futile struggles. Not until he sinks back exhausted, all a-tremble, and showing the whites of his eyes, does the pistol practice cease. After two or three lessons of this kind it is considered safe to mount him with a bridle furnished with a curb bit. Up to this time the horse has never felt a curb. The light snaffle is still retained, and the curb bridle is only given a gentle pressure at first, just enough to let him know that it is there. Gradually the strength of the pull is increased, and with this safeguard the horse is taught to stand fire from his rider's pistol or carbine.

In carbine practice the horse must be thoroughly broken, as both hands are required in using this weapon, whereas with the pistol the rider may retain the bridle with one hand.

Then comes sabre practice, and that is another trial to the horse. Again is he thrown to the ground, and when the bright blade of the sabre, with quick thrusts flashing before his eyes and cutting the air in close proximity to his ears, appears to him, he is again terror-stricken.—Our Dumb Animals.

Keep the Mind Clean.

Mentally, man is a house of many chambers. This house is always full of guests, who make it their inn and stopping-place, but he himself is the one who makes the conditions that attract the guests to his mental house. If he is careless and neglectful of rightly ordering his mental habitation, and remains in sensual sleep, leaving the doors and windows open to every one who wishes to enter, dirt and disease will abide in his house, vagrants and tramps will make it their stopping-place, and he will be sensible of this by the vicious ideas and mental and physical miseries that continually plague him and urge him still further on the road to ruin.

One whose mind is filled with ugly, impure thoughts is not master of his own mental house; he is the sport of demons, who use him for their own evil purposes; and, as actions are the natural sequences of thoughts, his physical body is subject to their tyrannical commands.

This is no fancy sketch. Each one can, from his own individual experience, know that it is true, if he will but look within himself. The lust, the greed, the selfishness, the destructiveness, hatred, etc., that so many exhibit, comes from slovenliness in caring for the mind. The mind has not been kept pure and clean, but has been allowed to become filthy, and has attracted that which is evil and destructive. The individual must get control of himself by cleaning up his mind, putting out all thoughts that are not harmonious, pure and true. Until this is done he is a slave; he cannot attain spiritual freedom and happiness. — The World's Advance-Thought.

A Railroad Cat.

Thousands of people have heard of the railroad dog, which travels so extensively over the country and really seems to know as much about trains and time-tables as a railroad conductor does, but there is a cat in Colorado which, although not as famous as the dog in question, is certainly as remarkable in its fondness of railroad riding.

It was the pet of the wife of the engineer of a frieght locomotive, and now it accompanies the engineer on every trip that he makes. When the train has to make a long wait at a station, the cat goes off in search of mice, always returning when the whistle sounds, and at some of the junctions where numerous trains meet it is quite a pet.

When the engine is running, the cat sits in the cab or on the coal, and as its fur is jet black its beauty is not greatly impaired by its grimy surroundings.

Pussy must have traveled many thousands of miles, for it has been doing duty for several years, and has never been known to miss a trip.—Ohio Chronicle.

THE PASSING OF ELIJAH.*

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

There are three striking figures in the history of divine revelation, figures which from certain angles overshadow all others. They are Moses, Elijah and Jesus. Of the two former it will not do to say that they are the greatest of Old Testament men. Moses, indeed, may well be assigned to a leading place. But Elijah will hardly compare in his prophetic ministry with any of the more conspicuous leaders of religious thought who appeared from the days of Amos to the close of the exile. Yet he represents the midway point of the Old Testament history as does no one else. He led a distinct movement in the progress of righteousness. About him, as about Moses and Jesus, a cycle of miracle gathers. He was the bold champion of Jehovah in a period of national apostasy: and the promise of one who should come in the spirit and power of Elijah to prepare the way for the Messiah was cherished through the closing years of the Jewish era, and was realized in the person and work of John the Baptist. Perhaps for these reasons Elijah stood with Moses on the Mount of Transfiguration to represent the authority of the prophetic age, fading before the splendors of the risen Sun of Righteousness.

The work of Elijah and his servant and successor, Elisha, occupies large space in the prophetic narrative of Kings. Of the forty-seven chapters of the two books of Kings nineteen are devoted to the careers of these two remarkable men.

It has already been noted how the education of Elijah proceeded, even while he was going forward with his prophetic work. He had the native elements which were needed, but they required discipline. At the brook Cherith he was taught patience and reliance upon God. At Zarephath he was taught humility, by being placed in circumstances most distasteful to a proud and aggressive spirit—as the guest of a poor widow, dependent upon her care for the very necessaries of life. A third lesson was that experience which followed the test at Carmel. The slaughter of the heathen prophets had, as Elijah supposed, solved forever the question of Israel's fidelity to Jehovah. But very soon the whole fabric seemed in danger of ruin. Elijah's life was in danger, and he gave up in despair. The lesson is taught him at Horeb that righteousness never wins in one contest alone, nor by the ruder weapons on which men depend. It is rather by the quiet, persistent methods of the preacher of the truth, by the "still small voice" speaking through chosen men to the nation that the work must be done. The later years of Elijah's life seem to have been spent in the work of training men for this task. The bands of prophets, who in earlier centuries represented the wilder and less restrained type of patriotism and religion, were not dispised by Samuel, but were used by him in that national reformation which prepared the way for David's reign. These bands of men played conspicuous parts in the work of Elijah, and especially of Elisha. They afforded a means of reaching the remoter parts of the nation which the great prophets could use to good purpose, and they formed the centers or schools where the prophetic teachings of the past were treasured, and from which they went forth to enrich the living generation. That these prophetic guides exibited grotesque elements is only what might be expected. The greater prophets had much to contend with in the rude and barbarous patriotism of these less inspired men. Their spirit was often far less humane than that of their great teachers (cf. 1 Kings 20:35-43 with 2 Kings 6:19-23), though even the latter reflected at times the harshness and severity characteristic of the age and of their fierce zeal for Jehovah (1 Kings 18:40).

But the end of Elijah's career drew on. Elisha had been with him as his servant and companion since the day when the man of God had cast his mantle over him as he followed his twelve yoke of oxen. It was now necessary that the task of [illegible] should be left in the hands of younger men. The divine entrusts [illegible] duties his work [illegible] his work." Moreover the [illegible] the work could be done [illegible] by a man of Elisha's type. There are periods when only a figure of gi[illegible] suffices to meet the demands of the [illegible] when hard blows are to be struck, and the Elijah spirit of unconquerable energy is needed. But far more frequent are the times when the world needs the quieter men of Elisha's type, who build up where rebuilding [illegible] been smitten into fragments.

And Elisha h[illegible] guidance and discipline of the heroic prophet. The words of the latter had been repellent at the first: "Go back again (1 Kings 19:20), for what have I to do with thee?" but they were just such words as encourage an earnest nature to persevere, inviting still to service while they repel, and with such energetic words Elijah announced his final journey. At Gilgal the old man said, "Tarry here, for the Lord hath sent me to Bethel," but the tone filled Elisha with the certainty of the approaching separation. He would not stay, nor would Elijah have had him stay. As he had tested him at the first, he still tests him. His voice says "stay," but his heart says "come." Elisha needed the impress of the final scene to fix his soul in its mission to Israel, and he went with his master. Nor would he leave him at Bethel or at Jerico, for the mystery of separation was upon the man of God, and even the young man of the prophetic schools in the towns through which they passed caught the meaning of the journey, whispered it to Elisha, and some of them followed to the cliffs above Jordan to see what would transpire. The younger man had clung steadfastly to the side of his teacher, and presently his reward came. He saw Jordan cleft for passage by the touch of that mantle which he had once felt for an instant on his shoulders, when all his soul went out to that mysterious man who had faced the leagued powers of false worship in Israel, and then came the moment when he heard the question, "What shall I do for thee?" His soul was in the work to which he had been called, but he needed the wisdom, the courage, the strength of Elijah. "Let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me." He desired the portion of the firstborn, not of silver and gold, but that precious thing which Elijah alone could bestow. Again the enigmatical word in reply. Elijah's speech was always full of dark sayings. "It is a hard thing. But if thou see me when I go, it shall be so. If not, then it cannot be." If the young man could stay and face that terror of the rushing storm in which the prophet was swept away, he might well face the future with Elijah's spirit, having looked upon the awful power of God.

It was their last hour together, and they went on solemnly speaking of the past and future. "And it came to pass as they still went on and talked, that behold there appeared a chariot of fire and horses of fire, which parted them both asunder; and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven." Such are the simple, sublime words which record all that later years could learn of the last movements of this strong prophet of the Lord. From the East he had come like a sudden warning voice. Into the East he disappeared from the sight of the group of prophets, and the one man who had ventured to look into the mystery of his departue saw him swept away in a whirlwind and flame.

What was there left, now that Elijah was gone? The lonely man rent his garments, and cried, "My Father, my Father! the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof." Elijah had been defence and strength to the kingdom. More than battlements, armies and navies to a nation are the forces that make for righteousness, the voices that speak for God.

But Elisha was not alone. Elijah was gone, but his spirit abode in the new prophet. The mantle struck confusion to the waters of Jordan as before, and when he returned to the tasks left him, the young man who saw the glory shining on his face said in awe-struck whispers to each other, "The spirit of Elijah doth rest on Elisha!"

SUGGESTIONS FOR TEACHING.

Sometimes men are tried by the obstacles that are set before them. Compare Elisha with Ruth as an example of constancy. Nature is the handmaid of God, and responds to the will of those who have his power. It is ours to ask for a double portion, a firstborn son's share of the divine Spirit. Some blessings only come as we have courage to face the dangers which surround them. The truest defenses of a people are good men and women. Strong men are taken away, but those who remain must take up their work and carry it on. God's work never fails because his servants fall in their place.

THE PRIMARY UNION.

Primary Unions are supplying a need to primary workers, which is highly practical and beneficial. The members are earnest, honest workers. Not all are trained kindergarteners or educated psychologists, yet each has a place which he may nobly fill. Members may inspire others to become enthusiastic primary workers; those in the work to seek improvement, and still others to form new unions.

I. Importance of the work.

We have only to go to the words and life of Christ to realize its importance. By reading and searching the Word we shall find the pattern Christ has given.

When the disciples asked Jesus, "Who is greatest in the kingdom of heaven?" "Jesus called a little child unto him, and set him in the midst of them, and said, Verily I say unto you, except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Whosoever, therefore, shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven."

Jesus also said, "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such such is the kingdom of God," and again, "Feed my lambs." We would not offend them, we would not forbid them to come, we would not give them a stone when they ask for bread, yet unless we search the Scriptures how can we know what our own duty and our whole duty may be?

Time is one of our most valuable possessions, youth is ours but once, the way it is spent is vital and the influence brought to bear upon us then can never be eliminated from our characters. Childhood is the climax of opportunity. The importance of the work may then be briefly stated.

1. Jesus has authorized it.

2. Strength of mature life largely depends upon the growth and training of the early years of childhood.

3. The influence the child of to-day will have upon the child of to-morrow.

When Gladstone was asked why he took off his hat to boys he didn't know, he said, "Because I may be speaking to the future Prime Minister of England." Primary teachers are not educating prime ministers or presidents, but greater, Christians.

II. Methods of work.

Looking again to Christ for our example we find his method to be largely through object-lessons, and those of the simplest order. He always used something known, upon which to lead to the unknown.

Another method we find is by story. When he wanted to teach the young lawyer who was his neighbor he told the story of the Good Samaritan.

We must study our children. There is a difference between child-study and study of children. The former consists of influences drawn from observations of or experiements upon many children; but hand-to-hand, heart-to-heart study of the particular child under our special care is quite a different matter.

The surroundings of the children while in Sunday-school should be most helpful and beautiful; the best pictures should hang upon the walls. Judgment must be used in selecting the objects not so many as to bewilder. The teacher ought to be filled with her lessons in a many-sided way, yet it is best to give but one thought. If we can teach how to live the lesson, we have done more than to present many thoughts and leave the mind confused.

Where it is possible, have a sub-divided class with efficient and sufficient teachers, and let them be the best. The exercises should be entirely separate, especially fitted for little children. They may include Bible verses, twenty-third psalm, Commandments, Beatitudes, books of Bible, motion exercises, birthday offerings, followed by dedicatory prayer.

The little book, "Sunny Songs for Sweetest Singers," contains much that is useful. It is published by Neal Brothers, Marion, Ind., for ten cents a copy or for five cents if fifty copies are ordered.

III. Helps afforded by primary unions.

As I know personally of the inestimable good accomplished by our Buffalo Union I will name some of the chief points.

It was established in 1892. Sunday-school workers felt the need of such an organization. Women met in the Y. M. C. A. Hall. However, only seven signed the constitution. It is generally the plan to have a paid teacher, but this one union decided not to have; as the work done by members under the criticism of sister workers is valuable, the experiences gained is beneficial. Yet this arrangement kept some from joining at first. Last year there was an average attendance of thirty; this year it has been sixty.

Besides the regular officers there are a librarian and an assistant librarian, with nine standing committees — membership, music, publication, child-study, symbolic, finance, social, stand-table, flowers.

We meet every Tuesday at three forty-five in a chapel of a down-town church. The International lessons are followed. Besides the lesson there are special features each week. First Tuesday, business; second Tuesday, new songs; third Tuesday, motion exercise and general information; fourth Tuesday, child-study; fifth Tuesday (when it occurs), informal social.

We have learned of the relation of the Sunday-school teacher to the child, and of the child as a threefold unity, child of nature, child of humanity and child of God.

All lessons that come from the union are most practical; we have learned that teaching must be to meet every-day needs. The Bible must become a living, practical book, fitted to the every-day life of the child. Religion can ignore nothing that touches his life, so that we must consider thoughtfully his home surroundings, health, mind and character.

TOPIC FOR AUGUST 7.

LESSONS FROM THE LIFE OF ELIJAH.

(1 Kings 18:20–39.)

Is there any lesson for a modern Western world in that wild, weird, terrible oriental figure? That man of the mountains, hairy in body and in garments, with matted beard, with leathern girdle, desert-nourished, like John of the wilderness—what is there in him for our civilized age? Much every way, for men are the same the world over and in every age. Human nature is human nature, and we shall find gentle, tender and kindly human qualities in this wild figure of a distant age.

Indeed, this very diversity of characteristics is perhaps the most striking lesson for us in his life. He combines such contradictory elements—as in fact does all human nature—that he leads us to hope for some saving traits hidden away under our own conscious imperfections. Thus we find in him a courage to defy kings and captains, to stand alone against a multitude of people and false leaders, strangely mingled with a cowardly shrinking that ran from the threat of a woman. True, she was a terrible woman, but the Elijah of the juniper and the cave is none the less a despairing, complaining coward, and God at once renders his verdict by appointing the prophet's successor. We find also in him a competence for political managament that could influence kings and peoples, united with an incompetence to manage his personal affairs that made him dependent on widows and ravens for support. This is not an unusual spectacle in public men. We find, further, that his stern character—perhaps there is not a sterner, more awe-inspiring person portrayed in all the Scriptures—is softened by a tenderness that could cry to the Lord over the dead body of a little child, and could inspire in his solitary follower, Elisha, a love so great as to find utterance in no other word but "Father." What a diversified character it is! How it makes us hope that somewhere, hidden away under the cowardice, incompetence and coldness of our natures there are yet undeveloped viens of courage, competence and kindness!

A marked characteristic of the great prophet's life which it seems is sadly needed in our changeable, vacilating, mercurial age, is his firmness of purpose. His absolute loyalty to his high calling, his unswerving fidelity to God—the divine name being a part of his own name—are fixed as the polar star. Even when in discouragement he flees into the wilderness, he never for a moment loses his loyalty to Jehovah. When a whole nation follows a false track, he walks with a handful, and so far as he knows, he walks even alone, in the true one. Like Daniel, Elijah was one who dared to have a purpose firm and dared to make it known, dared to be in the visible minority which, counting God, was an invisible majority. Sometimes, even to-day, men and women are compelled to stand loyally alone.

Decision of character was another of his traits, which they say we Americans need to cultivate. He halted not long between two opinions; he pitched his tent in the valley of indecision; the choice between God and Baal was for him quickly made. One of our American generals said the other day, when General Toral was hesitating whether or not to surrender Santiago, "the general who hesitates is doomed." And is this not true of every one else? He who hesitates in indecision never accomplishes anything. A true general would almost better make a wrong choice quickly than no choice at all; for a great leader is not one who makes no mistakes, but one who organizes victory out of many mistakes. Decide, then, lukewarm Laodiceans, neither cold nor hot, fit only to be spewed out of the mouth; be one thing or another; either for Jehovah or for Baal—how many of us try to serve God and mammon!

Finally, Elijah's trust in God is a characteristic worthy of our cultivation. "In God we trust" is our national motto, written on the coins we finger—are we true to it? To be sure, Elijah's faith was not unwavering. That is, indeed, something of a consolation to us. To find that, as James says, he was a man subject to like passions as we are, and subject to the same stormy waverings of faith, is the touch of frailty that makes the whole world kin, the sign of humanity that makes him real. Yet for the most part his faith in God was fixed, for sustenance, for strength, for encouragement and the seal of approbation. Is not God in the world as truly as in Elijah's day? Is he, like Baal, in a journey, or pursuing, talking, or peradventure sleeping? Is he not still in the affairs of men and nations? Shall we not still trust him and consign our times unto him? "My faith looks up to Thee" cannot be too often sung; "Lead, kindly light, amid the encircling gloom;" "Nearer my God to Thee"—all the hymns of faith that men of faith have uttered ought to be our frequent song. The realization that God is still in the world, and the consciousness of his presence—there can be no greater need for an age busy with things, materials.

BUTTON.

Col. Winfield Button died at Abingdon, Ill., July 6, 1898, at the ripe age of 90. He was born in Barren Co., Ky. Was married three times. By his first wife he had four children. Of these Mrs. J. B. Scheitlin alone survives him as do also three grandsons, four great-grandchildren and his last wife. In 1852 he moved to Illinois to take his family from the pro-slavery surroundings of his Kentucky home. Under the preaching of Elder Newton Mulkey, a cotemporary of the Campbells, he became a follower of Christ, maintaining his faith till the end. He was a man of earnest convictions, firmness of purpose and decision of character, exerting an influence for good wherever he lived.

J. B. SCHEITLIN.

CAKE.

Erastus B. Cake was born near Salem, Columbiana County, O., Jan. 23rd, 1837. He died at his home in Decatur, Ill., May 23rd, 1898. His death was quite unexpected, being preceded by a very few days of serious illness, though he had been in delicate health for several months. His early years revealed the strong qualities of his later manhood in his self-preparation for teaching that he might enter college. He was while quite young a classical graduate of Bethany College. He studied law and was admitted to the bar. He soon, however, turned his heart to preaching the gospel. At the beginning of the war he went as chaplain of an Ohio regiment, serving them two years. On his return home he was married to Miss Jennie Errett, a niece of Isaac Errett. To them were born seven children, four sons and three daughters, all of whom are living and the strong comfort of their mother. During his ministry, Bro. Cake preached at Salem and Mt. Vernon O. In 1869 he went to Mexico, Mo,, and was state Sunday-school evangelist for three years. He was pastor at Marysville, at Clarksville and at Nevada, Mo. In 1892 he came to Decatur, Ill., preaching here for two years. He then became pastor of the church at Maysville, Ky., for three years. Since that time his home has been at Decatur, Ill., where he had the esteem and admiration of a very large circle of intimate friends. The same tender respect and high regard is betowed upon the bereaved wife and her children. Erastus B. Cake's long period of public life was unmarred by any stain. He was recognized by all who knew him as a pure man, brave and fearlessly true to his convictions without regard to the consequences to himself. His family life was ideal: calling out love in perennial tenderness from his wife and enthusiastic and reverent devotion from his children. His religious life was marked by his philanthrophy and by his love for his Father in heaven and for Jesus Christ his Savior and the Savior of the world. Funeral services were held at the residence May 25th, by the writer, assisted by Rev. W. C. Miller, of the Congregational Church.

MARION STEVENSON.

COSNER.

Mrs. Sarah Kate Cosner, of Forest Ave. Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., died in this city July 8, 1898. She was here in delicate health on a visit to her mother and son. Was born in Woodview, O., Sept. 6, 1851, and married R. A. Cosner in Fredericktown, O., in 1869. Her age was 47. The writer spoke at her funeral last Sunday. Though a stranger, her history bore evidence of a godly life. Friends did not mourn as those that have no hope.

J. H. BAUSERMAN.

Ogden, Utah, July 12, 1898.

HARRISON.

Carlysle Harrison Murrah was born in Russell Co., Ky., May 24, 1833. In Kentucky he grew to manhood. On May 10, 1857, he was married to Melinda C. Vigus, who survives him. He lived in the states of Kentucky, Illinois, Missouri, Nebraska and Kansas. Always and everywhere he was active and zealous in the cause of the Savior whom he confessed in early manhood, being a deacon or elder in nearly all the churches where he made his home. He held fast the profession of his faith without wavering and the rejoicing of the hope steadfast unto the end. On the 15th of this month he was suddenly seized with a congestive chill, which in a few hours terminated his earth-life.

"He sleeps in Jesus, blessed sleep
From which none ever wake to weep."

He leaves a widow, one son and one daughter, the daughter being the wife of the writer. His mourning family rejoice in the knowledge that they will meet again "beyond the river."

HULL.

Our dear Sister, Nancy Hull, wife of the late Wm. Hull, passed away on the 12th inst., of dropsy and heart failure, and was tenderly laid to rest at Bethany. She and her late husband were each the other's companion and sympathizer in their afflictions prior to his death. They talked freely together of their hopes. Each ministered to the other in the absence of other help. Sad indeed was the separation when he was taken. She did not murmer, and though she dearly loved her children and friends, she longed to depart. Sermon text: Mark 14:8—"She hath done what she could."

MAVITY.

Thomas W. Mavity, died at his father's in West Lebanon, Ind., June 20, 1898. He was born in Montcalm county, Mich., April 4, 1866. He obeyed the gospel under the pastorate of our beloved E. L. Frazier, at Franklin, Ind., at the age of 14 years. He entered Eureka College in 1887, where he graduated in 1890. He attended college a short time in Butler University. In September, 1891, he was married to Miss Nettie Musick in Eureka, one of the noblest and most faithful helpers I have ever seen, in the ministry, but who died May 20, 1896, a victim of consumption. They were the parents of two daughters, Maurine and Grace, who are left under the tender care of their mother's parents in Eureka. Bro. Mavity was a most excellent young man, an able minister and a faithful pastor. He preached for the churches of New Carlisle, Ind., Washington and Onarga, Ill., resigning at the last place some 10 months before his death. He helped me much while a student here and went forth to be a blessing to many. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

TOWNE.

Hazel, the youngest daughter of Frank P. and Cora M. Towne, was born at Harristown, Ill., July 2, 1891, and died at Peoria, Ill, July 11, 1898. Aged seven years and nine days. Death came for this little child in a form most terrible and awful. Accompanied by her sister and mother, little Hazel came on a visit to the writer's family, and on Monday, July 11, she with other children were playing with some matches, when her clothing caught fire and she was so seriously burned that she died that night. These parents whose hearts lie crushed, bleeding and broken under the wreckage of their brightest hopes, best joys, and purest love, have our tenderest love and sympathy. May the dear Lord bless and comfort them. The funeral was conducted by the writer at Harristown, July 13, 1898.

HOOD'S PILLS are the only pills to take with Hood's Sarsaparilla. Easy and yet efficient.

The New England Conservatory of Music in Boston holds the same position in musical education that Harvard or Yale maintains in the liberal arts. The magnificent equipment of this great institution provides every advantage which will aid in the development of musical study from the mere rudiments of notation and hand culture to the writing and performing of oratorios and symphonies. Its wonderful influence on music in America is easily understood when it is known that more than 70,000 pupils have already received the benefit of study within its walls. To graduate from it means certain and remunerative employment as teachers or artists. Its Director, Mr. George W. Chadwick, is America's leading composer and conductor.

The Religious World.

All pastors of churches, officers or members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Christian Endeavorers, Young Men's Christian Associations, Good Templars, Sons of Temperance and all other Christian and temperance workers are earnestly urged to copy out the following petition at the head of a large sheet of paper, secure as many signatures as possible and send it in at once to President McKinley, that the great evils of the canteen system may be abolished before the war has proceeded further. The President has been appealed to on the subject, and it is known that he is disposed to consider favorably all protests and petitions regarding it:

A PETITION.

To the President of the United States:

Whereas, the so-called army canteen system, professedly designed to keep our soldiers from the temptations of saloons outside of camp, has in fact resulted in bringing the saloon temptation directly within the camp, exposing thereto many thousands of young men carefully nurtured in temperance principlss in Christian homes and churches;

Whereas, the amount of liquor consumed (the sales often averaging from $100 to $200 a day to the canteen) threatens seriously to injure the military efficiency of our troops and to cause wide-spread demoralization on the return of those troops to peaceful life; and

Whereas, leading army surgeons declare the use of alcoholic liquors of any kind to be extremely dangerous to the health and stamina of our soldiers campaigning in a tropical climate like that of Cuba;

We, the undersigned, do hereby respectfully petition that you will, to the extent of your authority as commander-in-chief of the army, forbid the sale of intoxicating liquors at all post and camp exchanges, or elsewhere within the lines of the armies of the United States.

The American Bible Society has received the annual report of its La Plata Agency, which includes Uruguay, Paraguay, Argentine Republic, Bolivia, South Brazil, Chili, Peru and Ecuador—a field which is over two-thirds the area of the United States. Two years after the American Bible Society was organized it printed the New Testament in Spanish, and in subsequent years many volumes were sent to various parts of South America. In 1864 Mr. Andrew M. Milne became the agent of the La Plata field, and is still there. The Scriptures have been circulated in ten languages.

The Eastern field embraces Argentina, Uruguay and Paraguay, and the Western Chili, Peru, and Ecuador. Bolivia lies between, accessible from both sides, yet with difficulty from either. Altogether they comprise an area of not far from 3,000,000 square miles, and have a population of not far from 15,000,000.

While Brazil takes fifty years to triple its population, Argentina increases at the ratio of four to one in forty-two years. Argentina is divided into fourteen states and nine territories, after the model of the United States. There are some twenty-seven normal schools for teachers and 3,700 public schools, with more than 330,000 scholars. All the religious toleration that can be desired is enjoyed. In Buenos Ayres, the Federal Capital, which has now a population of over three quarters of a million, the society has three colporteurs.

Uruguay has but 72,000 square miles of area, and is by far the smallest of the South American Republics. It has a population of 787,000, of whom one-fourth reside in Montevideo, the capital. In point of development, industry and products this country is much on a par with the province of Buenos Ayres.

During the twenty years from 1868 to 1888, when Montevideo was the headquarters of the La Plata Agency, the whole country was thoroughly canvassed. The society has had three representatives in different parts of Uruguay.

Paraguay has been called "the Garden of South America." Inclucing the unpopulated Chaco, on the west side of the Paraguay River, which may be estimated at two-fifths of the whole, it has an area of 145,000 square miles. To-day it is said to have a population of 600,000, and is rapidly increasing. Of late years it has had great accessions from immigration. The society has a depository of books in Asuncion del Paraguay in charge of Dr. Craver, a Methodist missionary, who took the oversight of Senor Bodago in the somewhat meager distribution that he was able to effect during the early part of last year.

Since 1883 fifteen men have made eighteen visits to Bolivia at the expense of the American Bible Society. Ten of these started from the Atlantic Coast and traversed to the Pacific, the others enter ing it from the Pacific Coast. With the exception of the city of Santa Cruz, all the chief mining districts have also been visited repeatedly. The chief mining districts have also been thoroughly canvassed. Indeed, tons of Bibles have been circulated in Bolivia, and each successive canvass brings to light some result of the former visits.

The time is near at hand when something should be done to give the Quichua Indians, of whom there are at least 3,000,000, the gospel in a form which they can understand when read to them, for thus far none of them have been taught to read, notwithstanding the oft-repeated calls of government on the state church, to set the friars to instruct the Indians.

The circulation of the Bible in Chili during the past year was 5,295 volumes.

Peru's urgent need is said to be the gospel, which the American Bible Society has proffered on its acceptance since seventy years ago.

FACTS AND FACTORS.

The Chicago Record reports the milk supply 5,000 cans short per day.

The Spanish Government sent $50,000 to Admiral Cervera and his fellow-prisoners at Annapolis last week,

---

Prof. E. Benjamin Andrews, president of Brown University, has accepted the position of superintendent of Chicago's public schools.

The Steamer Roanoke arrived at Seattle, Wash., July 19th from Klondike with 240 passengers and $2,000,000 in gold. Also the schooner Samoa, same date, with 36 passengers and $400,000 in gold dust.

Ten thousand rifles and 10,000,000 rounds of ammunition were surrendered to Gen. Shafter at the fall of Santiago.

Four paintings, valued at $21,000, were lost in the wreck of the La Bourgogne.,

---

In the surrender of Santiago the captured outnumbered the captors.

The third expedition of troops from San Francisco to Manila, 4,000 strong, arrived at Honolulu, July 6th, being nine days out.

Santiago is the headquarters of three mining companies composed of United States citizens, their interests representing altogether about $1,200,000 in addition to steamers used for the transportation of the ore.

Since the beginning of the war the United States Government has bought in St. Louis for the use of the army, 2,032,037 pounds bacon, 46,188 cans corned beef, 2-pound; 2,718,252 pounds flour, 1,887,225 pounds hard bread, 90,420 pounds baking powder, 628,974 pounds beans, 26,928 cans beans, baked; 186,925 pounds rice, 63,000 pounds hominy, 1,307,500 pound potatoes, 186,550 pounds onions, 795,504 cans tomatoes, 386,035 pounds coffee, 64 pounds black tea, 34 pounds green tea, 650,818 pounds sugar, 42,339 gallons vinegar, 174,680 pounds salt, 12,900 pounds pepper, 170,580 pounds soap, 67,910 pounds candles, and 24,240 cans salmon.

A very fine butter is now made from peanuts. It is suitable for table use, for shortening, for gravies and sauces, and it is said to be superior to dairy butter. We already hear of a peanut oil factory at Norfolk, Va., capable of using up five tons of peanuts daily, and the products from five tons of peanuts will amount to 235 gallons of refined oil worth $1 per gallon, 175 gallons crude oil worth 50 cents, 3,680 pounds of flour and meal at two cents, and 3,680 pounds stock feed at 60 cents per 100 pounds, making the total gross receipts $415.90 per day, which, it is estimated, would give a yearly profit on a five-ton factory of $19,725.

Announcements.

Convention in Idaho.

The Idaho Christian Convention will meet in Caldwell, Idaho, on September 20th, 1898. All churches in the state are earnestly requested to send delegates. It is particularly desired that the members and friends scattered through the state should attend the convention. Entertainment will be provided for all who will be in attendance.

Active, aggressive work in the state is proposed, and to that end it is important that the names and addresses of the members, and the religious conditions in the different localities of the state should be known. If it is impossible to attend the convention, it will materially assist in the work if the brethren in places where there is no organized congregation will send in their names and addresses, and whatever information they may desire to give. Come or write to B. F. Clay, Payette, Idaho, or the undersigned. JOHN C. RICE, President.

Special Notice.

The thirtieth annual convention of the Michigan Christian Missionary Association will be held with the church at Saginaw, Aug. 31 to Sept. 4. The complete program will be announced in a short time. One and one-third fare for the round trip will be granted over all the railroads, and the Saginaw church invites all of the brethren in the state who can come. The church will entertain all visitors.

Those who will attend are requested to send their names at once to A. C. Yonng, 1137 S. Warren Ave., Saginaw, Mich. ALEX. MCMILLAN, Cor. Sec.

The McGarvey Institute.

The third annual session of this Institute will be held in Windsor, Mo., Aug. 8-12th. The Windsor congregation is making all preparation to entertain all who come. A most cordial invitation is extended to our ministers and church workers. Send your name to the undersigned and you will be sure of a home and first-class entertainment.

What We Plead For.

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

For the right against the wrong;
For the weak against the strong;
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.
For the truth, 'gainst superstition,
For the faith, against tradition,
For the hope, whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

PLAIN TALKS TO YOUNG MEN ON VITAL ISSUES. By PETER AINSLIE. 16mo, cloth, 60c.

Should be in every Sunday-school and Endeavor library. A good book for parents to give their sons. Treats in a masterly way gambling, cursing and swearing, lying, the theater, dancing, Christian service, etc.

THE LIFE OF JESUS. Edited by DR. FERDINAND PIPER, Professor of Theology in Berlin. Translated from the German by Wm. E. Clarke. 12mo, cloth, 310 pages, $1.00.

This book does not attempt a consecutive story of the Saviour's life, but is a compilation of sermons, by the leading minds of Germany, upon the overshadowing events, thereby comprehending his nature and mission. It is not, therefore, the product of one mind, but of many minds.

ACROSS THE GULF. By MRS. N. M. VANDERVOORT. 12mo, cloth, $1.00.

A wonderfully interesting and instructive story of the time of Christ.

The reading of "Across the Gulf" will awaken thought, strengthen faith, and stimulate the life of the reader to nobler service.—N. S. HAYNES.

The author is careful in her quotations of Scripture, and the harmony of Gospel narrative is happily preserved. The story centers about the ideal Christ, the author's aim being to lead the reader to reject all teaching that is morality only, and instead be drawn to the simple, yet pure and abiding faith and service in and for the Master.—Christian Leader, Cincinnati, O.

STUDIES IN ACTS; or, The New Testament Book of Beginnings. By W. J. LHAMON, M. A. Introduction by A. McLean, Corresponding Secretary of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Large 12mo, cloth, 416 pages, $1.25.

This book is not a commentary; it is not a collection of sermons; but it is a volume of essays, in which the author seizes upon the most critical and interesting portions of the Book of Acts, the strategic forces, and mountain peaks of its history. These he treats with a charm of style, a vigor of thought and mastery of material that have called forth the hearty praise of many readers, though the book is but recently from the press. 116 pages at the end of the volume are devoted to Notes and Comments. A few are by the author, but for the most part they are selections from first-class authorities, and are exceedingly helpful upon many difficult and important passages.

JESUS AS A TEACHER, AND THE MAKING OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By B. A. HINSDALE. 330 pages, 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

Contents: Jesus as a Teacher. An Introductory View. The Education of Jesus. His Insight into Mind and Character. His Relation to Tradition and Legalism. How Jesus Used the Scriptures. His Historical Antecedents. His Institutions. His Authority. His Use of Accommodation. His Methods of Teaching. His Recognition of Apperception. His Use of the Developing Method. His Recognition of Moral Perspective. How He Handled Cases. His Severity. Jesus and the Child. His Theory of Teaching. The Making of the New Testament.—Object and Point of View Stated. The Ministry of Jesus. The Preaching of the Apostles. The Epistles. The Gospels. The Evangelical Tradition. Some Characteristics of the Documents. The Canon in its First Stage. The Canon in its Second Stage. Further History of the Canon.

Professor B. A. Hinsdale, of the University of Michigan, is recognized throughout the country as one of the ablest teachers of teachers. His writings command the respect of every educator. He has recently published a volume entitled "Jesus as a Teacher, and the Making of the New Testament." Although the association of Prof. Hinsdale is with a denomination other than the Congregational, yet he is a man broad in religious and educational ideas. Therefore, everyone, whatever may be his ecclesiastical relations will find suggestions and helpfulness in this volume.—The Advance, Chicago, Ills.

ORGANIC EVOLUTION CONSIDERED. By ALFRED FAIRHURST, A. M., Professor of Natural Science in Kentucky University. 12mo, cloth, 386 pages, $1.50.

This is a very thorough and scholarly discussion of Organic Evolution by one who has had many years experience as a teacher of science.

Prof. Fairhurst has occupied the chair of Natural Science in the University of Kentucky for many years. He has not, like many college professors, contented himself with the daily routine of his work, but has been a diligent student of the several branches which he teaches, constantly extending his knowledge of them, and steadily increasing his skill in the laboratory. This book is the first result in printed form of these faithful scientific studies. It proves the author to be familiar with the writings of all the masters of the theory of organic evolution, and to so have studied them that he understands them well, and knows their weak points. At these points he has attacked their positions and arguments, and has successfully refuted them. His arguments are brief, crisp and satisfying. He understands the art of direct attack, which puts his opponent to flight without keeping his reader in suspense. It seems to me that any candid person who reads the book must close it with the conviction that the hypothesis of the origin of organic species by the process of evolution is not only an unproved hypothesis, as its ablest advocates admit, but one that is essentially false. In addition to what the author says on the subject of evolution, he furnishes the unscientific reader with a large amount of information about matter in its various forms and about organized beings that is both interesting and valuable. For this reason, as well as for its value as a refutation of the hypothesis which it chiefly combats, the book should have a wide circulation among intelligent people everywhere.—J. W. MCGARVEY, Lexington, Ky.

CURRENT EVENTS.

For the time being, reports of battles and of military operations are overshadowed by the talk of peace. It has already become apparent that if war has its problems, the cessation of war and the making of a permanent peace, involves problems still more difficult. Spain has seen at last what should have been apparent to her from the beginning of the war, that further resistance to the United States forces is hopeless, and is certain to involve further losses and has sued for peace. Negotiations have been opened through the French Minister at Washington, M. Campon, who has had charge of Spanish interests at the capital since the departure of the Spanish Minister. The negotiations will be conducted directly with the United States and not through any foreign power. This fact itself is an indication that Spain is in earnest in her desire for peace. President McKinley and his Cabinet have had the matter under consideration since the receipt of Spain's communication on Tuesday of last week. It is understood on all sides that the independence of Cuba is to be acknowledged and the island of Porto Rico ceded to the United States, and that at least coaling stations are to be ceded to the United States in the Ladrone, Caroline and the Philippine Islands. The unsolved problem, and one that involves the most delicate and difficult features, is the disposition of the Philippines. It is understood that the President and the majority of his Cabinet are not disposed to retain the permanent control of the Philippines, if suitable guarantees can be furnished for the future government of these islands. It is not known at this writing what reply the President has submitted to Spain, but it is not probable that the negotiations will be concluded immediately. Meanwhile military operations are continued in Porto Rico, although we understand that the expedition of Commodore Watson to Spain awaits the results of peace negotiations.

The disposition to be made of the Philippine Islands involves more far-reaching results than appear on the surface. It is not simply a question as to whether the United States Government wishes to extend its territory. It is not a question, primarily, of the commercial importance to the United States of the possession of these islands. There is more in the problem than that. In taking possession of the the harbor of Manila, and of the fortifications at Cavite, and probably, by this time, of the city of Manila, the United States assumed certain obligations toward the inhabitants of those islands. It lent encouragement to the insurgents, who, under the leadership of Aguinaldo, have gained important victories, and have gone so far as to declare their independence. The most difficult question at issue is what moral obligation is the United States under to the people of these islands and to the civilized world, to see that a suitable and just form of government is established and maintained there. It is easy enough to say that the United States does not need these islands. It is easy, too, to declare that the attempt to govern these islands would be attended with difficulty, which would undoubtedly be the case. We may admit both of these statements, and yet the question remains, What should be done with the Philippines? Would we be justified in the eyes of the civilized world, and at the bar of our own national conscience, in turning them over again to Spain without satisfactory guarantees that the abuses which have so long cursed these islands will be discontinued? We believe an overwhelming majority of the United States will answer this question in the negative. Then the question arises, What satisfactory guarantees can Spain furnish that she will establish and maintain a government on these islands, or permit the people living there to form and maintain a government that will meet these demands? It is just at this point that the difficulty arises. It will require the greatest wisdom that our statesmen are capable of exercising to find a satisfactory solution of this problem.

The expedition of Gen. Miles to Porto Rico succeeded in effecting a landing on that island at Guaniea, near the city of Ponce, with the co-operation of a number of our war vessels under command of Capt. Higginson. Since then the army and navy, acting in conjunction, have taken possession of the city of Ponce, which has a population of nearly 22,000, being the second city in population and commercial importance in Porto Rico, and having jurisdiction over the district of Ponce, with a population of nearly 50,000. The people of Porto Rico have received the American troops with enthusiasm and hailed them as deliverers. Gen. Miles has issued a proclamation informing the people of the island that the United States forces have come "bearing the banners of freedom, inspired by a noble purpose to seek the enemies of our government and of yours, and to destroy or capture all in armed resistance." It offers to the people of the island the "fostering arms of a great people, whose greatest power is justice and humanity to all living within their fold." It announces that no war is to be made on the people of the country, but that they are to receive protection in person and property, and that it is the purpose of the government to bestow upon them the "immunities and blessings of our enlightened and liberal institutions and government." Gen. Miles does not contemplate any serious opposition in the island until he arrives at San Juan, the capital, where the Spanish troops are concentrating. He reports the country as beautiful, the troops healthful and in good spirits. It is to be hoped that peace negotiations will be concluded in time to prevent the necessity of a battle for the capture of San Juan.

THE ISLAND OF PORTO RICO.

In many respects this war has been an object-lesson to the nations of the world. The rapidity with which an army of 250,000 has been mobilized and put into the field, has attracted the attention of the world. The high degree of courage manifested by our soldiers and sailors and their officers, has won the admiration of all men. Especially has the efficiency of our navy astonished the nations of Europe, which recognize in the United States now, as they did not before, one of the great naval powers of the world. The kindness displayed by our army and navy toward Spanish prisoners, and toward the starving people of Cuba, has been not the least important of the lessons which the United States has given to the world during the present conflict. Our army entered the conquered city of Santiago, not with torch and sword, but with food for the hungry, clothes for the naked, and medicine for the sick. And now that Spain has shown a disposition to make peace, the readiness with which the government responds to Spain's proposal, and the reasonable terms which we are sure will be offered to Spain, will show to the world that this government is as generous and magnanimous as it is brave. There is no desire on the part of this government to humiliate Spain unnecessarily, or to exact from her hard and unreasonable conditions of peace. If the great object for which the war was inaugurated can be secured, and if our obligaton toward the peoples whose interests have been affected by the war may be rightfully discharged, Spain may be allowed to have further time to show that she has profited by her experience in the present conflict. She will be a duller student of current history than we take her to be if she does not learn some lessons from this war and the causes which led to it, which will prove of great benefit to her future development. That this may be so, is the sincere wish of every American.

The rejoicing, the bell-ringing, the whistle-sounding, the shouting, the street parades and bonfires with which Honolulu and the Hawaiian Islands received the news of their annexation to the United States, is in striking contrast with the desire of the people of Cuba, Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, to throw off their allegiance to Spain. The cause for this difference is to be found in the character of the two governments and their methods of administration. Spain seems to have regarded her island possessions as so many sources of revenue for paying her bills and supporting certain favorite officials in idleness. The question with her has been, How much will they stand? The United States seeks to give the largest measure of liberty and self-government to the states and territories within its domain, and to insure to them all equal rights and protection. There is a community of interests which makes the prosperity of every state and territory of the Union beneficial to the general government and to every other state. Not how much, but how little, can we receive in the way of taxation to meet the demands of a just government, is the question. This is why the stars and stripes awaken hope among all the oppressed of earth.

Senator Cushman K. Davis delivered an address at St. Paul on July 27th, at the laying of the corner stone of the new capitol building of Minnesota, which has attracted wide attention, both on account of the position of Senator Davis, as Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and on account of the subject he discussed. Referring to the problem of the Philippines he said that the United States must choose between alternatives. It "must become an efficient element in the the Asiatic situation, or it must entirely abstain from any participation in it, return to its own shores and cover the smallest possible share of its commercial advantages and prepare for its defense against the same aggressions which have reduced China to her present condition." Continuing his discussion of the disposition of the Philippines he said:

"It is not necessary to elaborate on the interests of the United States in the present and prospective situation. The maritime, commercial and political genius of the American people will not permit their government to be indifferent to them. It will not suffer the United States to be made the China of the west. The great question remains and comprehends the commercial and all other subjects: What action by the United States do its peace and safety require to insure to it the rightful and most advantageous results of these new international relations and adjustments? . . . It is not long since the war between Japan and China ended by depriving the latter power of her fleet, by compelling her to pay an enormous indemnity and provisionally to cede to her a portion of her territory of the greatest military and naval importance, of which Japan was in her turn deprived by the duress of Russia and Germany, only to see Russia substantially acquire the same territory and Germany make a compensatory seizure near by.

"Next to China the Pacific possessions of the United States are the most inviting objects of attack. Under existing conditions their defense would be difficult. Had Spain triumphed at Manila as decisively as did the United States her navy could have seized Honolulu and have operated from there upon the entire coast of the United States from Mexico to the Yukon. An overpowering European force in the Asiatic waters could do the same thing; so could Japan."

Referring to the Anglo-American Alliance, Senator Davis, in the speech referred to above, made a notable deliverance, the substance of which is embraced in the following quotation:

"The unpleasant relations which have existed between the United States and England for so many years were caused by a traditional aversion, which was aggravated by certain events of our civil war and by many minor irritating controversies, the worst feature of which is the fact that few of them have ever been settled. But through all this it has been felt by the people of both countries that a tie binds them together, however much they may irritate each other by straining it. Aversion and even specific centroversies between peoples so related are often composed by the force of events with which their connection seems merely ideal and sympathetic. Such pacifying forces are so subtle and impalpable that they can often be perceived long before they can be described. The difficulty of indication exists in the present instance, but, notwithstanding, it is very plain that a change of sentiment, or expression and of the general contour of the relations between the two nations has taken place. The conviction heretofore only imperfectly felt, and only partially, infrequently and fitfully acknowledged, is now clearly operative, and is openly and spontaneously expressed, that the 125,000,000 who speak the English language, who have established representative governments and maintained personal liberty in every portion of the world; whose conceptions of faith, literature, morals, education, popular government and individual freedom are cognate at all times and everywhere; whose civilization, though developed, is not decadent, but is still progressive; who have heretofore taken no step backward in an expansion of influence and empire without comparison in history, are amicably approaching each other under the pressure of a great human evolution." It was not until very recently that Great Britain and the United States looked each other in the face with any sign of recognition of their political relationship. It is well for them, for civilization, for national independence and for personal freedom that they have begun to do so."

Otto Von Bismarck, the former Chancellor of the German Empire, died at Friedrichsruhe, on the evening of July 30th. While unwell for sometime he had not been confined to his bed more than ten days, and as late as Thursday previous to his death he was wheeled to the dinner table and with his family celebrated the 51st anniversary of his wedding. His death removes from Europe and the world another historic, and in many respects, great and remarkable character. Bismarck first came into prominence as a statesman in 1848 as the representative of Prussia at the congress of the confederacy in Frankfort-on-the-Main, where he obtained concessions for Prussia which Austria alone had enjoyed. In 1858 he was sent as an Ambassador to Russia. In 1862 he was recalled from Russia and sent as Ambassador to the Court of France. Ten years later he was recalled from France and made Minister of State and president of the Ministry. Germany was in desperate straits at this time and the Emperor made choice of Bismarck to steer the ship of state out of its troubles. From his entry into this office he made history rapidly, for Prussia and France felt the power of his iron will. His great work was the consolidation of the German Empire. But the new, young, ambitious Emperor of Germany rather abruptly stopped his increasing political power and career. There had come to be a great deal of friction between the young Emperor and Prince Bismarck, on which account he resigned; but he was dismissed with great honor by the Emperor. Not only the crowned heads of Europe felt the power of Prince Bismarck's influence as a statesman and a diplomat, but the head of the Roman Catholic Church as well. Some rigorous laws were enacted against the Roman Catholic Church, bearing upon the examination and appointment of the clergy under the supervision of the state, the closing of cloisters, the banishment of Jesuits from Germany, and the state supervision of Catholic schools. His opposition to the Church of Rome, in fact, partook, as many thought, of the nature of persecution—in the arrest of ecclesiastics and the confiscation of their property. But withal he showed himself to be a man of iron will and giant intellect and has immortalized his name in history. Next to Gladstone he was probably the most widely known and influential statesman of Europe, but a man of quite different spirit and temperament.

The latest word from Spain on President McKinley's peace terms, as we go to press, is to the effect that a division of sentiment in the Spanish Cabinet is said to exist. After two somewhat lengthy sittings of the Spanish Cabinet it was concluded to telegraph to M. Cambon at Washington for further explanation of some difficult points in regard to the evacuation of Porto Rico, the terms of the Cuban debt and the Philippine Islands. The demands of President McKinley, which seemed to stagger the Spanish Government, and which Senor Sagasta denominated as "severe," are reported to be "that Spain assume the municipal debt of Cuba and Porto Rico; that Spain pay indemnity to American citizens for damages suffered at the hands of the Spanish forces and authorities in Cuba." Spain is willing to concede the surrender of Cuba and Porto Rico, and to give the United States a coaling station in the Philippines, but is extremely opposed to the loss of Manila and the control of those Islands. But we shall know soon whether Spain wants peace on our terms, or to change the war from shot and shell to a war of words simply.

"HOW ABOUT IT?"

Under the above title we publish elsewhere in this issue a rather unusual communication. We do not know the exact religious status of the writer, nor how far his zeal for a deeper spiritual life may be vitiated by harmful fanaticism or erroneous views of Christian life. The communication, however, suggests some things that may be said with profit to our readers.

We should judge, in the first place, that this writer has been unfortunate in the kind of religious teaching he has received, if the emphasis has been laid wholly upon "works," and if he has not been made to understand that baptism, so far from being "the main spring of it all," is entirely useless unless it be the sincere expressions of the soul's faith and desire for a better life. The brother has, of course, misunderstood the trend of the preaching he has listened to, for no intelligent preacher among us ignores, or fails to teach, that salvation is of grace through faith. The fact, however, that any member in any of our churches has received this impression from the preaching he has heard, ought to suggest to preachers the importance of a change of emphasis, perhaps, but certainly the necessity of taking more pains to be understood and to avoid misapprehension. The great leaders among us, from Alexander Campbell to the present time, have understood and have taught, that without the power and the grace of God no sinner can be saved, and that there is nothing in forms and ceremonies, of themselves, to help the soul into better life; that they are only important as acts of self-surrender to Jesus Christ, whose blood alone cleanses from sin.

One of the commonplace truths taught among us from the beginning is that there is a higher and deeper spiritual life possible to us than any of us have attained to, and that it is our duty and our highest privilege to strive continually to attain to this life. It is to be regretted, however, that sufficient emphasis has not been laid by many of our preachers upon the necessity of seeking after a deeper spiritual life, and of setting forth the means by which such a life may be realized. We are now entering upon a period in our religious development when more attention is being given to this vital subject than before. There is everywhere manifest in all our churches a desire on the part of the best members for a deeper spiritual life. Would that this desire was universal, and that all our preachers and teachers would seek first a deeper religious experience themselves, and then lead their flocks into the same green pastures and beside the still, flowing waters of the peace which passeth understanding.

There is coming to be a clearer apprehension of the relation of the Holy Spirit to this spiritual life after which Christian hearts are longing. We are seeing more clearly that Christ sent the Holy Spirit to the church to carry on the work in the hearts and lives of his people, to fit them for service here and for the presence of God hereafter. We believe there is a more distinct desire and petition for the Holy Spirit and the fruit thereof, but we can enjoy the fruit of the Holy Spirit only by having the Spirit Himself. This fact is more generally recognized and the sooner it is universally recognized and accepted, the better it will be for the spiritual development of the churches.

This growth in the spiritual life, which must be in harmony with the teaching of Christ and the apostles, is not to be confounded with certain fanatical and unscriptural schools of perfectionists, that ignore the teaching of the Holy Spirit in the Scriptures, and that run into hurtful extremes which lead to disastrous consequences. If one avoids these fanatical errors, and sees to it that his utterances are in harmony with the Scriptures, and indulges in no vain boasting of his spiritual attainments, he will find no occasion to change his ecclesiastical affiliations in order to make all the spiritual progress that is possible to him. If he becomes a "firebrand" it is generally his own fault. If one manifests the fruit of the Spirit in his life, love, gentleness, meekness, patience, temperance, etc., he will not give offense to his brethren, but, on the contrary, they will be stimulated by his example to strive after a better and deeper spiritual life.

Our answer, then, to this brother's question, "How about it?" is, Open your heart to all the richest gifts of God and live the truest and most spiritual life possible to you, behaving yourself with meekness and patience toward your brethren and remaining where you are, seeking by your life to be an example to others. So shall you best fulfill the end of your Christian life. There was once a good man in Israel who came to believe that he was the only true worshiper of God among his brethren, and the Lord appointed his successor at once. There are many times seven thousand among us whose aspirations after a true religious life are as deep and genuine as those of our correspondent. If he be in advance of others, let him strengthen his brethren, but in meekness.

THE POSSESSION AND USE OF PROPERTY.

The Son of Man, during his personal ministry, spoke frequently and clearly on property and its use. The same statement may be made concerning his apostles. They did not hesitate to speak of wealth and what to do with it.

The possession of property was not denounced as sinful—neither by Jesus nor by his chosen embassadors. There is not even an intimation that the mere possession of worldly goods—even to the point of great wealth—is in itself sinful. We read in the Bible, for instance, that "Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver and in gold." And when certain freebooters captured Lot, Abraham's kinsman, the Patriarch "armed his trained servants, born in his house, three hundred and eighteen, and pursued them into Dan" and "brought back all the goods, and also brought again his brother Lot and his goods and the women also and the people."

Abraham was rich, Isaac was rich, Jacob was rich. Their descendants now possess enormous wealth. "As rich as a Jew." The obituary of David in the Holy Bible, reads as follows: "He died in a good old age, full of days, riches and honor." The possession of wealth, in this case, is no more condemned than is the possession of "days" and "honor." David was full of "days," full of "riches," full of "honor." And it is said of his son Solomon that he "passed all the beings of the earth in riches." He also "made silver and gold in Jerusalem as plenteous as stones." There is not space in this paper to write the names of the men of wealth who receive honorable mention in the Holy Scripture. They are spoken of—many of them—as "saints." They were not entirely free from sin. They did what they ought not to have done; they neglected to do what they ought to have done. Their sins are named, described, denounced. For them they suffered. But there is not an intimation that in the possession of wealth they sinned, Jesus spoke of them, but not to condemn on this account.

Paul's knowledge of the gospel came by special revelation. He was not taught by man. This he expressly affirms in an interesting autobiographical passage in his epistle to the Galatians. The Lord Jesus instructed Paul. In his doctrine he correctly represented his Master. It is the opinion of some students that Saul of Tarsus was a gentleman of ample means. He said much about money—its use and abuse. In his instruction to Timothy, the young preacher, he has this to say:

"Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up in store for themselves a foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life."

It is the duty of the Christian minister, according to Paul, instead of denouncing rich men, because they possess wealth, to teach them how to so use their property "that they may lay hold on eternal life."

And this is in perfect harmony with the words of Jesus when he said:

"Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that when ye fail they may receive you into everlasting habitation."

The manner in which this is to be done is explained in the latter part of the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew. In that place Jesus says that giving food to the hungry, clothing the destitute, medicine to the sick, water to the thirsty, attention to the imprisoned, is an acceptable service rendered to him—a service so well-pleasing to him that he will, as a judge, in the last day, say to such persons:

"Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." And he will also say: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

It is by such a use of the mammon of unrighteousness that a place in the everlasting habitation will be secured.

A condition of affairs may exist in which it would be the duty of property owners to sell their possessions and give to the destitute. This is a part of the teaching of Jesus. Such a condition, however, is exceptional. It certainly does not exist in the United States.

The New Testament teaches that our diversities of talent are to be used for the good of our fellow-man. Read Romans, twelfth chapter. "Be not slothful in business," is an admonition in that chapter. Some men have a talent for organizing and conducting business. This is a gift from God, and should be used for his glory. The man who can make money, and will not, is guilty before God. He ought to use that ability for the good of those who are destitute of the talent. This he may do by giving them employment at a living wage.

Poverty and wealth are alike from God. This is the doctrine of the Hebrew Bible, "The Lord maketh poor and maketh rich; he bringeth low and lifteth up." So said Hannah, the mother of Samuel. David said unto Jehovah: "Both riches and honor come of thee." And Agur prayed: "Give me neither poverty nor riches." The Scriptures clearly teach that wealth is a gift from God and is to be used for the good of his creatures.

The man who uses his ability to make money selfishly, sins. He sins against himself. He sins against his fellow-men. He sins against God. He is a steward who has betrayed his trust. He is guilty of treason against God and man. The rich man—mentioned in the sixteenth chapter of Luke—died, and in hell lifted up his eyes, being in torment. Why? He possessed the means to relieve the poor man at his gate, but lived in selfish luxury while poor Lazarus suffered. There is only one place in all this universe for so mean a man as was Dives, and after death he went to it. It is worthy of remark that this is the only man of whom the Scriptures affirm was tormented in hell. The context shows why Jesus told the story of Lazarus and the rich man. In another place the Teacher said, speaking of such persons: "These shall go into everlasting punishment." It is quite probable that Dives was orthodox in his opinions. It is certain that he was heretical in his treatment of Lazarus—and his heresy was "damnable."

The following is from the Hebrew Hymn Book:

"Blessed is he that considereth the poor;
The Lord will deliver him in the day of evil,
The Lord will preserve him and keep him alive,
And he shall be blessed upon the earth;
And deliver thou not him unto the will of his enemies,
The Lord will support him upon the couch of languishing:
Thou makest all his bed in his sickness."

This is the general tone of Old Testament teaching concerning the relation of the rich to the poor, and the consequent obligations and blessings.

Jesus, who was thoroughly saturated with the doctrine of Moses and the Prophets, said to his disciples: "Give alms of such things as ye have." He also condemned ostentation in giving alms. Here is what he said: "When thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth: that thine alms may be in secret: and thy Father which seeth in secret himself shall reward thee openly." And on another occasion he said: "Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down and shaken together and running over, shall men give unto your bosom, for with the same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again."

Nor is this duty—it ought to be regarded as a privilege—limited to the rich and well-to-do.

The Master said: "He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much: and he that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much. If, therefore, ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches?" It is required of men, in every department—not merely in the department of finance—according to ability. Again and again this principle is presented in the Scriptures, "Unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required." This is what Jesus said. And Paul declared that "if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not."

How can a conscience in this duty or privilege be developed?

In the same way in which the conscience on baptism has been developed among us, that is, by the presentation of the Bible teaching on the subject of property and its use, as the doctrine of the New Testament on the duty of baptism has been presented. Let us preach and write about money and its use as we have preached and written about baptism and its blessings. In this way, and in no other, can a conscience be developed concerning the accumulation and use of property.

It is not necessary to say any other things than those that are found in the writings of Moses and the Prophets, of Jesus and the Apostles. When they speak, let us speak. What they say, let us say. What they do not say, let us not say. The blessing of God will surely attend this method. B. B. T.

Hour of Prayer.

STEPS HEAVENWARD.

(Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, August 10.)

Yea, and for this very cause adding on your part all diligence, in your faith supply virtue; and in your virtue knowledge; and in your knowledge temperance; and in your temperance patience; and in your patience godliness; and in your godliness love of the brethren; and in your love of the brethren love. For if these things are yours and abound, they make you not to be idle nor unfruitful unto the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. For he that lacketh these things is blind, seeing only what is near, having forgotten the cleansing from his old sins. Wherefore brethren give the more diligence to make your calling and election sure; for if ye do these things, ye shall never stumble: for thus shall be richly supplied unto you the entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.—2 Peter 1-5-11.

Christian life is a march heavenward. It is not geographical, but moral and spiritual progress. To become a disciple of Christ is to enter upon a heavenly way that leads to fullness and perfection of life. This is heaven. Some of the steps in this ascent heavenward are given by the Apostle Peter in this lesson.

It is important to notice that in order to the taking of these steps, that is, in order to progress in the divine life, there must be added on our part "all diligence." Without this, spiritual growth is impossible. It is just here that a great many of us fail in our spiritual life. We do not "work at it much," as the boy said of his father's religion. Having, however, not only faith, but a desire and purpose to become Christ-like, and diligent attention being given thereto, we are to advance in the following way:

"In your faith supply virtue." That is, in the exercise of your faith acquire virtue or courage. It is in the use of faith, which discerns spiritual realities, that we are to cultivate courage, and we need courage to resist all the evils that beset us in our Christian life. How many of us lack the moral courage to resist evil?

"In your virtue supply knowledge." In the exercise of Christian courage, we are to supply that knowledge that is essential to Christian growth. It is a knowledge that comes from experience in doing the right and resisting the wrong. Christians cannot afford to be ignorant of moral distinctions and of great spiritual realities. It is part of our Christian business to supply knowledge and to be intelligent as to our duties and obligations.

In the use of knowledge temperance must be supplied. This means self-control. Our appetites, our passions, our tempers, our tongues, our ambitions, our thoughts, are all to be kept in control. This is temperance in its widest sense. It is to be supplied in the right use of knowledge. Many fail at this point, and failure here means shipwreck to character.

In this self-control patience is to be supplied. We know what this homely virtue means. We have need for it every day. We meet with a great many things to try our patience, and if we have not in our self-control added this grace, we shall become fretful, irascible, fault-finding and generally unpleasant. Moreover, we will be disposed to cease our Christian efforts in any direction where we ought to hold on and wait for results. What a sterling quality patience is in the home and in the church!

In patience godliness is to be supplied. Surely it requires patience to grow in godliness. Those who imagine that godliness can be attained instantaneously have mistaken its nature. It is our life-business to grow like God, and it can only be done as we patiently meet and overcome the faults and weaknesses of our character.

To godliness is to be added brotherly love, and it is in the exercise of godliness and in the growth in godliness that we come to love the brethren. We come to the love of each other, through love of God. When we come to know God's love for us, and love Him in return, then it is easy to love all those who love Him. Those who fail to love their brethren may well doubt the genuineness of their love to God or godliness.

In brotherly love we are to grow into a larger and more universal love. "God is love." He loves all men. When we become like Him we shall love all men in spite of the unlovableness of many. This is the grace which is eulogized so eloquently in the 13th chapter of First Corinthians. When our lives come to be filled with love, Godward and manward, then the end of the gospel is realized, for this is the crowning virtue of them all.

If these things are ours and we abound in them, then we shall "not be idle nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ." But are there not many idle and unfruitful lives? It is because these things have not been supplied, and he that lacketh them is nearsighted, only being able to see that which is near, and with no power of vision to penetrate to spiritual and eternal things. He is short of memory, too, "having forgotten the cleansing from his old sins."

In view of these facts we do well to heed the exhortation of the apostle to "give the more diligence to make our calling and election sure, for if we do these things we shall never stumble."

In supplying these Christian graces, there

"shall be richly supplied unto you the entrance into the eternal kingdomof our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

This is the consummation of our soul's supreme desire—an abundant entrance into the eternal kingdom. Such a consummation even in prospect should stimulate us to our holiest and highest efforts.

PRAYER.

O, Thou who art the Author of all life and being, we thank Thee that Thou hast revealed unto us the fullness of life through Jesus Christ our Lord. And we thank Thee that through Him Christian growth is made possible, and that by the grace He supplies we may take these steps heavenward, day by day, until we are transformed into His likeness. Forgive our past indifference, our idleness and our unfruitfulness, and help us to be more diligent in supplying those graces through which Thou wilt richly supply to us the entrance into Thy eternal kingdom. And this we ask in Christ's name. Amen.

OR MACATAWA MUSINGS.

Whatever may or may not result from the present war, one thing of no little importance must be reckoned among its results. It may be called the recognition of God's hand in our national history. It is no less than remarkable how universal the feeling seems to be, among all classes of people, that God's providence is over the United States in the present conflict. Sitting at a table in a Chicago restaurant recently with seven or eight business men of the place, the conversation turned on the war, and we were not a little surprised at the prominence which was given to the thought that God's hand was manifest in the remarkable victories that have crowned our armies. One would have expected this in a company of preachers, but among hard-headed business men, he would have looked more for the emphasis to be laid upon the superiority of our battleships, our sailors and our soldiers; but the feeling in this company was that God was using this nation to accomplish His purposes. We find this feeling very prevalent here at the Park, and it crops out continually in the talks at the beach service, and in private conversation. It is to be hoped that this recognition of the divine hand in guiding our national history may lead to practical results. What more natural than, if God is shaping our national destiny, we ought to recognize His will and seek to conform our laws, our institutions and our whole civil and political life, to His will? Indeed, any other course would seem to be presumptious. In any event, there is no question but what we are coming to recognize, more clearly than ever, the truth expressed by the Psalmist many centuries ago:

> "For the kingdom is the Lord's,
> And he is the Ruler over the nation."
> —(Psalm 22:28).

How quiet the lake and the woods this evening hour! The whisper of rustling leaves and the low murmur of the lapping wavelets on the beach, remind us of that "sound of gentle stillness," which Elijah heard in the cave at Horeb. It was in that "gentle stillness" that God spoke to Elijah. There is a message for us from God, no doubt, in the tempest and the earthquake and the devouring fire, but God speaks to us oftener, we think, in moments of reverental stillness, when we are listening for His voice in the chambers of our hearts. We love the grandeur of the storm, and its conflict of the elements fills us with awe; but we love more the quiet calm of the evening or morning hour, when even nature seems to be hushed into adoring silence in the presence of God. We hope our readers will cultivate "the quiet hour" and seek to give a few moments each day to the communion of the soul with its Maker.

To-night the half-grown moon hangs on the western horizon over the lake, wearing a ruddy glow on its usually pale face. As we have been lying in the hammock watching its quiet, majestic movement through the heavens, now eclipsed by passing clouds, and now shining forth with renewed beauty, we thought of it as a fit symbol of the church and its history in the world. We can imagine that one looking upon the moon for the first time, and seeing it eclipsed by the clouds, would feel that the moon was gone, and that he would behold its bright face no more. But a little waiting would show him that while clouds pass away, the moon remains and moves along its appointed orbit. It has often happened that the glory of the church has been obscured by passing clouds of unbelief, of worldliness, of false doctrine, and men have said "The church is being permanently eclipsed and lost to the world." But anon it appears again, growing larger and brighter meanwhile, as does the moon, and shedding its beams upon the paths of men. Like the moon, to-night, the church has not as yet attained its rotundity and perfection; but like the moon, it is growing, and it is destined sometime to attain to full-orbed splendor. As God's hand guides the course of the moon and all the starry hosts, in their courses, so He is guiding the course of the church, until, in the fullness of time, it shall be presented "without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing," before the presence of His glory.

In asking for a collection on last Lord's day evening, from an audience of seven hundred or eight hundred people, sitting upon the sand on the lake shore, for the purpose of carrying on our religious work here at the Park, and particularly our Macatawa Park Assembly, in August, the writer asked why this great company of people had gathered here at this Park rather than at some other place. One prominent reason, he stated, was that Macatawa Park, in addition to its natural beauty and attractiveness, had the reputation of being an orderly, and morally clean place, where moral and religious people felt free to come themselves and bring their families with them, without fear of evil influences. It is to be hoped that this feature of the Park will be maintained in the future, as it no doubt will be, because the population of cottagers, far excels in number the hotel population, and those who own property here, who make it their summer home, are naturally interested in guarding the moral character of the place. Never have our religious services been so largely attended as during the present summer. Bro. Tyrrell, of St. Louis, delighted a large audience last Lord's day with one of his characteristic sermons. The beach meeting in the evening, conducted by Rev. Mr. Grannis, of Grossdale, Ills, was largely attended.

Among the fresh arrivals at the Park are W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, Mo., who joined his family here this morning, and Bro. J. J. Haley, of Cynthiana, Ky., contributing editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, who, with his family, also crossed the lake last night. C. C. Rowlinson and his wife, of Cedar Rapids, Ia., have been here for a week, rowing, fishing and enjoying themselves generally, and might now be mistaken for Cubans, so far as their complexions are concerned. Prof. J. Mad Williams has been spending a few days here visiting Dr. Everest. Of course, he is charmed with the place, and has been looking at some vacant lots, as has also Bro. Rowlinson. Dr. Collins, of Covington, Ky., is here again, stopping at Jennison Park, as usual, and with him is Bro. Platt, of Warsaw, Ind. C. A. Young, wife and daughter, came over Saturday and spent Lord's day at the Park, and were guests at Edgewood-on-the-Lake. And still others are coming. Fortunately we have never known the fishing, and especially black bass fishing, to be so good as it is the present season, and this affords amusement and pastime to those who come for rest.

Questions and Answers.

Please say through the querists column, whether in your judgment, the practice of giving thanks for both the bread and wine, and passing both emblems to the congregation at the same time, is out of harmony with the New Testament practice? H. Guthrie, Okla., May 27, 1898.

We do not see that the method of observing the Lord's Supper above indicated is out of harmony with the spirit and design of the ordinance as instituted by our Lord. It may not conform, and does not, perhaps, precisely, to the method given in the New Testament, but there is no intimation that we are required to conform precisely to the method given in the New Testament. If so we would have to recline around a table, dispense with the use of deacons, use barley loaves and introduce other innovations upon our present custom which would be regarded with disfavor. The main thing is to see symbolized in the emblems the body and blood of Jesus Christ, and to know that it is through his life, surrendered for us, that we live, and thus to partake of them in the same sacrificial spirit manifested by Christ in his life.

I enclose a clipping that a Dunkard brother sends me. Is it a fact that Mr. Campbell made the statement that trine-immersion can be traced to the inspired apostles. Why was the statement changed in later edition of the Campbell and Rice debate to simply immersion? We would be pleased to have you give us some light upon this through the columns of the Christian-Evangelist. G. W. Hall. Oreana, Ill.

It is not true. It does great discredit to the candor and honesty of these Dunkard brethren to be circulating a printer's error as the statement of Mr. Campbell. We have before pointed out the fact that the word "trine" before immersion, occurred in the first edition of the book, and was afterwards corrected. The context, however, shows exactly what Mr. Campbell meant to say, and did say, so that no honest person, seeking for the truth, need ever have misunderstood his meaning. The clipping referred to from a Dunkard paper, contains a certificate from Mr. Spofford, Librarian of Congress, that the title page of the work from which this quotation is made,corresponds with the one in that library, which, of course, signifies nothing, since there is no dispute on this point. Mr. Campbell never made the statement, and if he had done so, it would be incapable of being sustained, and hence would be without authority. If our brethren of the trine-immersion persuasion want te maintain their reputation for being honest and godly people, even though they are not theologians, they should quit circulating this false statement.

1. What do the words "beast" and "false prophet" in Revelation 20:10 signify? and also the present tense of the verb?

2. What is the meaning of the phrase in Revelation 20:13-14. "And death and hades gave up the dead which were in them?" I. G. Williams.

Tower Hill, Ill.

1. We are not a specialist on the Book of Revelation, but we take it that the word "beast," as everywhere in the book stands for an earthly government, a civil power, which in this case is a world-power, because it is arrayed against him whose name is "the Word of God." The "false prophet" would indicate, on the same principle, false religion, or its personification in its leader. The present tense indicates what is stated in the twentieth verse of the previous chapter, that they had been previously overthrown and cast into the lake of fire. It is a truth that all opposing forces, whether in the form of civil government or religious systems, are being overthrown by him who rideth upon the white horse, and who is called faithful and true.

2. The language of this passage means that death and hades, or the unseen world, are to give up their dead for judgment. In other words, the language asserts that both the living and the dead are to be judged.

Current Religious Thought

What the Interior says about "The New America" and our increased responsibilities in the following paragraphs is worthy of careful reading:

The baptism of the New America is in blood, but—we say it reverently—it is in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, of a new consciousness of human brotherhood. The decisive and ruling motive which at the outset we professed, and which with every new victory we again and again protest, is honest and real. The acknowledgment of it is making a profound impression both at home and abroad. That this primary unselfishness of motive is so new in international affairs as not at once to be really understood, especially by people of other countries, is not to be wondered at. A few men in our own country, like Professor Charles Eliot Norton, of Harvard, and Professor Von Holst, of the Chicago University, have indeed betrayed their dense ignorance of the American spirit and spoken foolishly enough. And a writer of the leading article in the July Nineteenth Century, referring to our controversy with Spain, speaks of "this energetic, self-suffering nation setting out at last to be glorious," "to make history," ambitious "to be a world-power," to covet "the grandeur that was Rome's," and broadly hint that the "other powers may yet contrive to lame the wings of American ambition," and so on. But as Senator Hoar—one of the most lofty-minded and considerate statesmen of his time, declared in a very notable speech a few days ago: "There never was a people on earth who, in regard to the great subject of public conduct, were actuated by a finer, by a profounder, sense of duty and a clearer sense of justice than the people of the United States in this generation and at this hour."

With the expansion of territory, which the providential necessities of the war have made inevitable, there are thrown new responsibilities upon the American people; responsibilities which will test the inventive and original statesmanship of the country as almost never before. But more than that, the staying quality in the now aroused moral sense of the country will be tested to the fullest. And here there will be no assurance of any safety, apart from the distinctively Christian organizations and forces of the country. Navies and armies can do no more than open the door, create and secure the new opportunities. What Christian missions and Christian education and a constant Christian leadership have been doing in America itself, and have been doing for the Hawaiian Islands, will have to be done over and over again, for all the island provinces under our benign protectorate, guidance and helping, alike in the western and in the far eastern seas. Beyond a certain point, nothing is more futile, or more utterly unavailing, than are any armies or any navies. The new, the greater, America will have need of these; and will continue to have need of the same kind of heroes of public duty as those whose fame has lately filled the world with the glory of their achievement. But none of these new American provinces can add anything to the real greatness of America without the continual reinforcement of whole armies of Christian heroes along all the lines of the popular education and the civic administration. Claims and opportunities which Spain, to its perpetual dismay and shame before all the world has forfeited, the greater America can only hold and make good by infinitely different means and methods. In Cuba, in Puerto Rico, in the Philippines, in the fullest meaning of the term, there must be "the schoolmaster abroad."

Rev. Joseph H. Bradly, in an article in Christian Work, recently, on "Eaten of Worms," administers the following severe rebuke to Christians by contrasting their low life-plane with their exalted possibilities. He says:

The civilization which exploits itself in material achievements only, is false to the age in which it exists by so much as it exalts mere intellectual and physical greatness above that which is essentially moral and spiritual. This expression may be trite, but the fact itself is none the less forever base, and, too, even though the best of mankind elect to disregard it. This fact prevails where the advantages of power and place, and dress and pleasure, are made the popular idols, even though it be in Christian households or in Christian churches, The consensus of all the wealth and virtue and "religion" on earth cannot impair, nor in any degree change, the divine ordinance.

It is not enough to ask, "Is the world prepared for anything better?" The practical and more direct question is this, "Are the Church of Jesus, and Christian men and women, incapable of grasping the fact of their duty to the world to live up to the Christian standard and true principle that "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth?" The manifestation for which the world is always prepared, and which the church ought to provide, is the supreme glory and greatness of sincere, loving devotion to duty, and the unfailing dominance of innate spiritual principle. There is a heavenly demand for the exhibition of the fact that there is no Christian character nor honor where the everlasting power of moral and spiritual life does not act as constantly and unerringly as the laws of dynamics in chemistry and physics. They do thus act; and their due operation will show the true elevation of the spiritual life above the material. The spiritual life is so actually superior, and we are false witnesses when we do not manifest this fact, and are recreant when we do not strive by every influence in our lives to make it plain that our lives and hopes are lifted beyond the reach of worms.

While all men do not see alike as to our nation's newly acquired territory in the Pacific Ocean, it is well to have the benefit of different views for comparative values, so here is what Hon. Alva Adams has to say, in part, about the Philippine Islands in the Independent of last week:

The victory of Commodore Dewey has tied us to the Philippines by bonds we cannot break. We cannot pass title to any great Power without danger to our relations with other Governments. To give them back to Spain would be a travesty on our humanity; it would be to put fangs back in a serpent we have made harmless. We must keep them; civilization demands it, humanity demands it. True, there may be some risk. Without danger there can be little glory. We boast of the greatness of our country. We regard it as a model—an example in the evolution of man to higher political conditions. Dare we stand behind the ramparts of cowardice when our strong arm can lift up millions, and at the same time add glory and grandeur to our flag? In a community we demand more of an educated man than of the ignorant; more from the man of wealth than from the poor. The responsibility of the individual is measured by his ability and opportunities. This is no less true of nations.

The war with Spain makes the United States a world power. She is no longer a self-centered, provincial country, but an imperial nation.

The thrill of empire—of a great moral purpose, may soon impel our nation to a career more noble than has ever before directed the destinies of a people. For us to pull down the flag when once planted by our ships and soldiers would be a surrender. To permit the Spanish flag to go up again where the Stars and Stripes have floated would be to dishonor the sailors and soldiers who risk their lives to pull down the yellow emblem of brutality and oppression. When the American flag once floats over Spanish territory it should float forever. Our flag will do for the Philippines and Indies what it has done for California, Texas—for every Spanish possession that has come to us. Against these new extensions of territory there come the same protests that met Jefferson when he purchased Louisiana in 1803, against the admission of Texas, as against all Mexican cessions, and against California's and Oregon's admission as States, as against Alaska in 1867, and yet to-day the American people look upon these additions as the proudest triumphs of statesmanship.

CHURCH ORGANIZATION AND GOVERNMENT.*

BY J. E. COBBEY.

I have been asked to give a few thoughts on church organization and church government. I understand that this refers to the local organization popularly known as the church. The more thorough and more exact the business organization, the better the business of the church will be attended to and the more its business interests will prosper. When the business interests of the church are prosperous and well-managed, the church itself is a growing, prosperous church, both morally and spiritually. On the other hand, there is nothing which will so quickly destroy the spirituality of the church as poor business management. Nothing so disheartens a preacher as to have his salary come at irregular times and in irregular amounts long overdue. Nothing destroys the confidence of the world in the Christian religion so quickly as to have the bills for services rendered or material furnished the church organization laid over without action or carried in the pocket of a member until wornout or lost, and only paid after persistent dunning, when from six months to two years past due. Nothing so blunts the Christian's regard for the moral law as unreproved disregard for business rules and laws.

The failure to keep a business promise is, nine times out of ten, itself a breach of the moral law. These little breaches of the moral law, these little crimes, are too frequently but steps toward greater crimes. The incongruity of a church board disciplining a member for failure to do his whole duty, when that board is slack in its management of the business affairs of the church, may be illustrated by the case of

*Paper read before the Thirty-first Annual Convention of the Nebraska Christian Missionary Society at Beatrice, Neb., July 3rd, 1898

Bro. A., who sold the church its winter's wood, amounting to between twenty-five and thirty-five dollars, delivered at different times between October 1st and March 1st.

In April he spoke to Brothers B. and C., two of the seven members of the board, as to his bill, and was assured that it could not be paid until the board met the first Monday in May. On the Tuesday after the first Monday in May he meets Bro. D. and asks if his bill was allowed. Bro. D. says: "I had other matters to attend to that evening and did not go the meeting, but I suppose it was, of course. You should see Bro. E., the secretary." He goes to Bro. E. who informs him that the board failed to meet for want of a quorum, nothing can now be done before the first Monday in June. The first Monday in June the board meets, a bare quorum being present. After considerable talk about the crops, trade, the war and the local news, Bro. B. says: "The wood bill should be allowed," and asks if any one knows how much it is. No one does, but all agree that Bro. C., who is absent, talked with Bro. A. and knows about it, so the matter by common consent goes over until the July meeting. Bros. B., E., F., and G., all of the board present, to clear their skirts of any remissness in duty, each take pains to see Bro. A. and tell him that if Bro. C. had been at the meeting and known the exact amount of the bill it would have been allowed. In July, the board fails of a quorum, the minority who attend, each are careful to inform Bro. A. that if the other members had attended, his bill would have been allowed. In August they meet, and Bro. B. says that eight cords of wood were delivered, while Bro. D. thinks it was nine cords. After long discussion, Bro. D. remembers that Bro. A. gave him a written statement of the account, but it was so long ago that he had mislaid it and forgotten the amount. So it goes over until September, with the understanding that Bro. D. is to get the exact amount of the bill for allowance at that meeting. In September, Bro. D. is on hand with Bro. A.'s bill for nine cords of wood, at three dollars and fifty cents per cord. Bro. B. still insists that there must be a mistake, that there were but eight cords, but as the other members agree that it might have been nine, he gives up on this point, but suggests that as wood has been selling all summer at three dollars per cord, and Bro. A. is a good church member, dealing with the church, he should not ask more. This strikes the board favorably and the matter goes over to October, with Bro. B. delegated to see Bro. A. and try for a reduction. This Bro. B. does more promptly than he usually does church board work. With a picnic smile on his face and a ministerial grasp of the hand he presented the matter to Bro. A., who says that the wood was furnished in the winter and at the winter's price on the market, and of right ought to have been paid for on delivery, but he finally agrees to the reduction because it is the church. In October, Bro. B. is present and the bill is allowed for nine cords of wood at three dollars per cord. But Bro. A.'s troubles have but begun. After four or five trips to the secretary he secures an order on the treasurer. When he presents the order to the treasurer he is informed that there are no funds, that there are other bills older than his, that of right ought to be paid first. Especially, as some of them are owing to those not members. A good, loyal member should at least take his turn. It is also suggested to Bro. A. that he might pay his subscription to the end of the year by crediting it on the bill. To this Bro. A., with some reluctance, consents, because it is the church. But here new troubles commence, as Bro. A. insists that he and his family are paid up to date. The treasurer on the authority of his books says that he is three dollars behind. Bro. A. talks to his family and then to the treasurer. The treasurer brings the matter before the board, who finally, at their January meeting, decide that the treasurer is probably correct, but that Bro. A. had better be allowed the credit, as he and his wife are positive they have paid it. Thus trying to be just and not hurt the treasurer's feelings. Bro. A., who is present with his family at this meeting of the board, asks that the rest of this bill be paid at once. All admit that this should be done, but there are still older bills to be paid, and they suggest that the pledge of himself and family for the year just commencing be credited on the bill again. To this, Bros. E. and F. of the board, object, because it would deprive the church of Bro. A.'s weekly contribution through the entire year. But here Bro. B. comes to the rescue by suggesting that Bro. A. increase his subscription by fifty per cent., thus making it large enough to cancel the bill by the end of the year, and that the bill be considered paid and the subscriptions for the year be considered paid. At first Bro. A. refuses to do this, but the board fills the room with a prayer-meeting atmosphere, and with words of brotherly love and fidelity, prevail upon Sister A. and she advises her husband that as it is the church they are dealing with, it is the best thing to do. The matter is closed up in this way, but many sore spots are left. Bro. A. says little, but feels that the church has treated him about as a highwayman who, with club in hand, called on him to stand and surrender his money. While the members of his family feel that they do not care to have business dealings with the church in any way. How can they have any enthusiasm in church work? How can they ask their friends, strangers to the church, to come in and join? How can they be expected to contribute of their earnings to the support of this organization? How can this church board have the respect of this family or of the community in which they live? What possible use is it for this board to sit in judgment on the case of Bro. M., charged with taking advantage of Bro. L. in a horse trade? Or what right have the board to cite Bro. Y. before them to answer to the charge of fraud, be it ever so plain? Such a board has by its own act deposed itself. No one in the church or out of it has any confidence in its findings. Its judgment finding a brother innocent does not reinstate him in the confidence of the members, nor does its judgment condemning him satisfy his friends that he is guilty. Their advice and admonition to erring members to reform has about as much effect as the advice of a man just convicted of petit larceny would have on an old offender arrested for grand larceny. Who of this board dare reprove Bro. A. if he fails to attend prayer-meeting regularly or to send his children to the Bible-school? But this transaction has had an influence outside of the church. Upon the strength of this sale, Bro. A., as he had a perfect right to do, promised to pay his grocer and butcher, and later his harvest hands, and still later his thrashers and corn-huskers. And each of these in turn he disappointed, and to each he had to explain that the church had failed to keep its promise to him. Though he made no complaint of their action, and from other resources redeemed his promises to pay.

The power of that church for good in that community is impaired, if not wholly destroyed. The people of that community outside of the church are moral and honest, yes, more, they are inclined to be religious, but they dread to connect themselves with an organization where financial dishonor is at a premium; with an organization whose official board at an official meeting officially approves of procrastination, repudiation and forced contributions from its own members, members whose only fault, or only crime, if you please, is that, out of a mistaken idea of respect for the church at large, they will not insist on financial integrity by the local organization in all its dealings. Such a church is tolerated, but neither loved nor respected by the community. Such conduct of its business affairs by its board raises up a barrier between the church and the outside world that is the greatest impediment to the efforts of the preacher and the evangelist. The worst thing is, that this illustration is not too strong. The statements here made are not overdrawn, but are true generally of our church organizations. In the discussion that shall follow this paper, I challenge you to show to the contrary. A want of business integrity, being then a general evil in our church organizations, and an evil so serious as to impair the confidence of the public in the church, what is the remedy? What is our duty? And, incidentally, what is the cause?

GOD'S SUPERINTENDING PROVIDENCE.

T. H. BLENUS.

A persuasion of the superintending providence of God is so incorporated into our very nature, so interwoven with the very principles of our being, that no nation has ever existed that has been able by any teaching or by any circumstance to eradicate the impressions of it. In all countries, savage, civilized, or semi-civilized, altars have been reared, temples have been erected and prayers to God offered, with the firm conviction of the presence of the deity, and with the firm belief that he can hear and answer the petitions of humanity. So universal a sentiment cannot be explained on the supposition of its falsity. A few men have been found who have denied it, and have made desperate attempts to substantiate the irreligious systems which reject it; but it often occurs that when the very men who are sceptical on this point are visited by some sore calamity or overwhelming affliction, their systems, like broken reeds, are abandoned, and they almost involuntarily implore the guidance and protection of the Christian's God. Even a casual review of the history of the world shows us that the special providence of God is universal. In how many and how varied ways has he interposed in the affairs of nations and peoples, so as to compel respect for his rule and divinely-appointed agencies in the development of his will and purpose? How often he displays his providence and power by the means which he employs to produce ultimate results. Sometimes he makes use of the smallest things to produce the greatest consequences; sometimes the instruments used, we would naturally suppose, would produce the contrary effects to those which they actually accomplish in his hands, and at other times using the greatest things to produce consequences which seem but casual to us.

How often do we see him proving his superintendence by bestowing on men what they desired, in a different way, and often in opposite methods to what they had planned and projected. In many instances we have seen the passions of men restrained, and a sudden change effected in their spirits for the preservation of others, or the counsels of the wise made subservient to the very ends they originally opposed. Who will say that such things are not under the controlling hand of God? He must be but little acquainted with history, and have been but a careless observer of the events that have occurred during his life, who has not remarked ten thousand such circumstances, that can only rationally be explained by the acknowledgement of the providence of God. I firmly believe that to the child of God the importance of this truth can hardly be estimated. In the sacred writings the forgetfulness of it is often mentioned as a cause of departure from God, and an occasion of sin. The wicked are represented as violating the divine laws, because they suppose "God hath forgotten; he hideth his face; he will never see it." This is also one great cause of coldness and heartlessness in our religious service. Would our worship be so languid, our prayers so meaningless and so infrequent, our praises so heartless and soulless, and our trust and confidence so feeble if we were deeply impressed with a proper sense of the universality, the watchfulness and the tenderness of God's providence? This subject is very full of comfort and consolation to all the devout children of God. Innumerable fears and anxieties must lay hold upon every considerate mind if the government of the world were left to designing men, or accident, or fate, or to mere human conduct and caprice; but these fears and anxieties vanish, and the troubled heart is at rest when we believe that though we are blind and helpless in ourselves, there is, back of all, infinite wisdom to guide, and omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence to be with us, over us and to defend us. We can then sing with the confidence of a blessed assurance, "The Lord reigneth; let the earth rejoice."

WHAT IS IN A NAME?

JOSEPH H. MAC EL'REY.

The great analyst of psychology said, "there is nothing in a name," and gave his meaning and the proof of his assertion by citing the fact that, "a rose, by any other name, would smell as sweet."

While these, and all similar sayings concerning the rose, and many other things, are true, there are uses to which the rose has been, like other things, applied, which could not be served if the rose and the name were therefrom diverted.

Thus, in the feuds between the Houses of York and Lancaster, the white rose was the badge of the House of York, and the red rose the badge of the House of Lancaster. The forms, colors and other qualities of those respective flowers identified certain principles and sentiments which they better expressed than words. Thus their stories were inside the lines of facts, and opinions were outside their lines—opinion about the facts cannot alter the facts.

There is something in a name, and in an emblem, and in every name. And in many names there are vitally important meanings which could be put out with some that are thereby identified and precious by inserting another word. Are any of the names by which associated parties naming themselves, or named by others, any of the diverse names by which the self-confessing disciples of Jesus have been and are known in history, names of the first and second quality, named here?

This general question seems to be an open one, and in several views of it, an indifferent one. Some desultory views upon it may be of interest to some.

In every case, of course, what is intended by the name is the essential thing in it. This is well-illustrated in the use made of names by the disciples in Corinth. They became sected, cut up, partisanized. Those of them who designated themselves by the name Christ were as partisan as those who adopted the name Paulites, or Apollosites. Their mutual intention and their wrong consisted in adopting any name, no matter what name, to distinguish them from any other members of the body of the disciples of Jesus—the body which should not be broken, rent, cut, severed, sected, bi-sected. The names they selected were honored names by themselves, and it seems, were equally orthodox. But, remarkably, they were not chosen by all the ekklesia. The names were used as party, sect badges. This was for other than selecting pastors. It was actual schismatism. Let this fact thoroughly pervade the mind, and then see where there is any escape for any one who selects a name by which to describe sectism from the sin of schism.

The general idea of a sect is that of a party breaking itself off on being broken off from the congregation of Jesus the Christ, This was not the condition existing in the Corinth Church. Paul found schism committed in the church.

The idea was that schism could not be committed out of the church, because then the party would be neither in, nor of, the church. Schism could be committed only upon, within the body, because what might be done away from a body, could not be done upon a body. Thus, St. Paul was dealing with a wounded body, a diseased body. Healing the wounded body was the idea. Excision of a part might be necessary, but he could not think of attempting the creation of a body of the exscinded part. That was cast away. It was "schism in the communion," which the apostle dreaded, in the place where the only fatal harm could be done. "That ye be perfectly united in the one mind and opinion," was his one heart-wish. It was the final prayer of Jesus. The robe must not be rent.

The freedom of Christ is fellowship with him. Not disagreement from him in dogma or opinion. Much error, many evils, and all schisms, enter and dwell here. The plea for "liberty of opinion," as distinguished from the faith which saves, are generally thought to exist far apart, but how often they are closely allied as the line which has neither breadth nor thickness. How nearer or farther are all the great opposites?

"Moved by the devil," is the criminal formula of Blackstone. "Moved by the Holy Spirit" is the divine formula of the Scripture. How far they diverge in ultimates, but how near they approach in inception! The kingdom of heaven is as the smallest of all seeds. Evil is to him who evil thinks. Good and bad are cumulatives. Opinion is mental conviction, not as clear perhaps, but therefore not less firmly fastened in the mind than if planted there by clear knowledge, and therefore all the more difficult to deal with, because laid securely up in a craggy fastness of "conscientious conviction," too sacred to be yielded up to the disintegrating processes of analysis and the risk of annihilation. "Mere opinion" is more sedulously protected than knowledge. We never hear people say they have a right to their knowledge, but we constantly hear, "I have as much right to my opinions as any one has, and no one shall interfere with them. They may be wrong, but that is my own business. I am as proud and independent in my opinions as any one." Just so. And this proves the power and sweep of mere opinion. Have opinions far wider sway than knowledge, reason, wisdom? Are they seldom based on these foundations? They would then not be opinions, merely, but clear products of knowledge and reason, the wisdom of things known, and not "merely my opinion." The multitudinous products of mere opinion have been most obstructive of human well-being. The proper names for "mere opinions," should have been, obsta, satanos, or their equivalents, as they expressed the hinderers of progress, under whatever names obstinates have ever been named.

Who has not seen the concentration of more solemn, pious-seeming, over-some gnat of "conscientious conviction" of the tweedle-dum or tweedle-dee kind, than would, if substituted to one hour of intelligent common sense examination, have converted the heads of the whole party, and done their piety and consciences more good than ever they received before? The touching of a taboo has a powerful convincing influence toward breaking down the dominion of the idol.

I wish a great multitude of this kind of religiossity would study Judges, chapter 13, Acts 10, Matthew 5:8; and take their wives with them into their debating conferences, and permit them to participate. They would then see how facts and experiences demolish "mere opinions," and how there is no piety in them, and how dangerous it is to mistake prejudice for piety, and obstinacy for orthodoxy. The sectarianisms of Christendom are the living histories of the power of mere opinions, for surely they are not witnesses for the power of the knowledge which their creators and sustainers had and have of the Bible.

Is the Bible so mysterious, enigmatical, ambiguous, that even the picked men, the profoundly learned leaders of the many colored divisions of the "universal church of Christ," as it is now the thing to style sectarianism, cannot discriminate between essentials and non-essentials, and must therefore rend the seamless robe because some essential thing had been lacking in the sect or church from which each sect seceded? Or have the sects all the essentials, and are separated on matters of mere opinion, convenience or some other like trifle? What is the consensus of the combined knowledge (not opinion) of the leaders and sustainers of "denominationalism," putting all the isms in, on the rightness, the wisdom, the godlikeness, of continuing the separated condition of "the church?" Should it continue? Is it based on the dicta of Scripture? Is it based only on mere opinion? What is the plain, clear state of the whole case? Who will sum it up? That is surely an "essential."

ETERNITY IN THE HEART.

JAMES M. CAMPBELL.

"He hath set eternity in their heart." (Ecc. 3:2.)

Man, the child of time, is also the child of eternity. Eternity belongs to him now. He is touched with it; enfolded in it; he is living in it as much as he ever will be. The sense of eternity is set in his heart; being placed there by the hand that made him.

We see this sense of eternity sprouting in the mind of the child. The thoughts of a child are long, long thoughts. Some one has said that to be a child is to belong to the immortals. The look of seriousness which often overspreads the face of childhood comes from the awakening of hopes which reach beyond the stars. But the vision fades. "Shades of the prison-house begin to close around the growing boy;" and the youth who saw a heavenly vision and nourished purposes sublime, becomes a pack-horse laden with earth's merchandise.

At his best moments every man feels that his life is part of eternity. The time spirit which has been strong within him is weakened and "the power of the world to come" is strengthened. The emphasis shifts from the narrowing present to the expanding future and he comes under "the power of an endless life." He feels that this mortal life is too short for the accomplishment of his purposes. He dies with his best work undone. Is he a poet? he dies with his best poems unwritten; is he a musician? he dies with his best songs unsung; is he an artist? he dies with his best pictures unpainted; is he a soldier? he dies with his best battles unfought; is he a man of affairs? he dies with his best undertakings uncompleted. The higher a man's development the stronger his yearnings for larger things; the nobler his achievements, the greater his aspiration. It is a poor, paltry life that has in it no suggestion of the eternal.

In all spiritual experiences there is a timeless element. They imply the possibility of endless progress. There is no limit to the power of thought, no point at which the mind is forced to stop in its upward soaring. In love, there is an ageless element. It is love within his breast which cannot be expressed, which more than anything else intimates eternity to man. Love is eternal. It is impossible for God to destroy it, for God is love. In the same way our social instincts give unmistakable hints of an hereafter. The eternal quality within them points forward to a social immortality of which the family life is the earthly type. The spiritual and the eternal are one. The spiritual life which Christ imparts is eternal life. It is a condition of the soul, and has no reference to time or place. It is an eternal possession, but is also something which is possessed now and here. "He that believeth hath eternal life." With him the ageless life of the spirit has begun.

This sense of eternity in heart makes life prophetic. It brightens or darkens the sky with premonitions of what is coming. It links the present to the future, making life all of one piece. It gives continuity to human existence, making this life and the next, parts of one realm. It makes the present the seed from which the future is evolved. "Things of to-day are deeds which harvest for eternity." Death is but an incident in the life of an immortal being. Deeply implanted in every breast are presentiments of what the future holds in store. Earnests of the heavenly inheritance are already in hand. The fires of hell are already kindled. Eternity is here.

From this sense of eternity which stirs within the heart, spring desires which time can never satisfy. As our earthly summer fades away we instinctively look for a summer that will not fade. We have a deep heart-hunger which cannot be appeased with the things of earth; we have longings for which the world has no adequate objects to offer. The things of time are perishable meat. They leave the spiritual nature unsatisfied. Man cannot live by bread alone; he cannot find his living in the things of earth. The world is a circle and the heart is a triangle, says an old writer, and as you cannot fill a circle with a triangle you cannot fill the heart of man with the world. Man is too great to be satisfied with anything short of of the spiritual or the eternal. Wherefore, then, should we spend money for that which is not bread; when in the eternal life, which is God's gift to men in Jesus Christ, and which is ours for the taking, we may find that which meets to the full the deep sense of the eternal set within the heart?

The Religious World.

On the banks of beautiful Lake Geneva, Wis., is located what is known as the Secretarial Institute and Training School of Young Men's Christian Associations, having as one of its functions a place of meeting and training for Christian service for college association men and for young men engaged as secretaries and physical directors of Young Men's Christian Associations. The success that has come to these two movements from the gatherings at Lake Geneva, has impressed the Association world with the importance of calling together annually the volunteer workers of local Associations for a ten days' conference to better qualify and equip them for the work in which they are engaged. The first of these conferences is now in session and is destined to be an epoch-making event in the history of the Young Men's Christian Association. There are now on the grounds over fifty business men and younger men from nine or more states. The sessions of the conference which take the form of class instruction and lectures, are in the forenoon and evening, the afternoon being free for rest and recreation. The scope of this gathering means the building up of an intelligent and zealous volunteer constituency which will be of value, not only to their societies, but to individual churches themselves.

JEWS IN THE UNITED STATES.

It is estimated that the Jews of the United States number about 1,200,000, although that may be somewhat in excess. Although in common with the great mass of the population they prefer the cities, they are found scattered in every section from Bangor to the Klondike, and their synagogues, which were a novelty a few decades ago, save in places like New York, Philadelphia, Charleston, Savannah and Richmond, can be met everywhere.

Chicago recently witnessed the fiftieth anniversary of its oldest synagogue—the new edifice on Indiana Avenue, with its impressive architecture, tells the story of successful growth. The new temples in Cleveland, Little Rock, Kansas City, St. Louis, Detroit, are eloquent reminders of western progress. San Francisco vies with the eastern coast-cities in the number of its synagogues. The President of the United States was present at the recent corner stone laying for the new Washington Temple, which will be worthy of the capital of our country. In New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati and Baltimore, the synagogues are in broad places, and convey a favorable idea of American Israel. According to Rev. Dr. Carroll's statistics there were in 1897, 570 Jewish congregations in the United States, and 143,000 communicants—the last term is misleading. As a rule, the father alone counts as a member of the synagogue. Besides, in the smaller towns in which there are no regular synagogues, there will be found many Jews, and these are not included in the estimate, while a large proportion of Jewish residents of the chief cities may be unattached to any synagogue, membership being voluntary, not compulsory.—From Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly for August.

Response to our Card.

Recently I inserted a personal card, stating that I had agreed, at the Eureka Jubilee, to be responsible for $200 toward clearing that institution of its $30,000 of indebtedness. This pledge was made at a time when it helped materially toward securing the necessary amount of pledges. In my former card I asked Abingdon College students especially to join with me in rendering this assistance to our alma mater. I did not, however, intend to limit the call to such students. I regret to say that only one of the old Abingdon students, thus far, has responded. Aaron Prince Aten, of Hutchinson, Kan., writes: "You may count on me to assist to the amount of $5 and twice that if necessary to make up what you have pledged." We thank Brother Aten for this kind response and trust that he may be joined by many others. In addition to this, J. H. Allen, of St. Louis, whose hand is in every good work, pledges $50 to assist me in meeting the amount for which I have become responsible. This still leaves a much larger amount than I feel able personally to pay, in view of my pledges to other institutions, and the way is still open for additional pledges from other friends who are willing to help me and help Eureka College in its crisis. As the money is now due and called for, those who respond will peleas send their contributions, along with their promise, that I may pay the amount at once to the treasurer of the college.

Our Budget.

—There is no peace where Christ does not reign.

—The time for the offering for Church Extension is at hand.

—The vigor of our correspondents is not abating under the summer heat.

—We have received a copy of the annual catalogue, of Tazewell College, Tazewell, Va., with announcements for 1898-'99. Tazewell has many strong claims to commend its college to those seeking an education.

—The July number of the Christian Missionary Magazine gives a good report of the Bible-school convention, held at Mexico, Mo., last June, and should be freely distributed throughout the Churches of Christ in Missouri. Address T. A. Abbott, Editor, 712 Commercial Building, St. Louis, Mo.

—The camp canteens should be abolished at once. They are ruining our soldiers in purse, in health and in morals. There is no excuse for them. They are a curse to the army and a blot upon our government. Let them be abolished.

—In this paper will be found a worthy tribute to the life and memory of one of the pioneer preachers of the reformation, Bro. McPherson, of Springfield, written by Bro. Carpenter, of Wabash, Ind.

—Some one has sent us an obituary of Martha Fields Pierce, with no name attached. Will the writer please inform us of his or her name.

—It is said that two-thirds of the mail of the world is addressed in the English language. This shows the kind of people that are to become dominant in the affairs of this world.

—It sounds somewhat amusing to hear some of our exchanges which represent churches whose doctrines and commandments are so largely founded upon the Old Testament, talk about "Back to Christ." They have not yet fully come down on to Christ so how can they go back to him?

—The Chautauqua Letter in this paper came to hand on press day last week and will seem a little out of date in this paper. But as a matter of news as to what is going on at Chautauqua it is still of importance.

—Read the announcement of our Church Extension Board on the opposite page and send for literature and envelopes at once, and let your church have an opportunity to give after proper information.

—The first instalment of the paper on "Church Organization and Government," by J. E. Colby, appears in this paper. If it was not that it would be regarded personal by too many churches, we would recommend that this article be publicly read in all our churches. It goes direct to one of the chief causes of weakness in many churches.

—Chancellor Craig spent last Lord's Day in this city, and complimented this office with a short call on Monday. The Chancellor has been quietly and persistently at work since June, securing subscriptions sufficient to complete the $50,000 needed for the immediate use of Drake University. He has now $43,000, and hopes the full amount will be raised before the fall term opens in September. He reports the summer school prosperous and the outlook good for an advance over last year's success at the University.

—There were two sermons greatly needed at the fall of Santiago. One to the Cubans from text, "ye have need of patience;" and one to the American authorities from the text, "lay hands suddenly on no man." Great allowance will have to be made by General Shafter and his subordinate officials for the Cuban mind and surroundings. We cannot expect them to square things with the usages of good government and refined courtesies at once.

—The Advance, in an editorial on "Congregationalism Stands for Something," says: "It stands for the salvation of men through Jesus Christ, the only thing in religion that is worth standing for." This is very indefinite. Each evangelical, Protestant, religious body stands for the same thing, yet the yare not Congregationalists. If all stood absolutely for this one thing then there would be no sects, and if this is the only thing worth standing for then there is no excuse for sectarianism. Brethren, if our hearts condemn us let us not forget that God is greater that our hearts. We fear that some churches will be without excuse for their exclusiveness at the last day.

—As our exchanges continue to speak words of praise for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, in its new form and dress and contents, we are placed under obligations to them for their kindly expressions of appreciation, and hereby tender our thanks to one and all for the same. We also extend our thanks to the many readers who have written us personally of their high appreciation of the paper, its progressive spirit and continual improvements. It is a great pleasure to us to know that we are not simply delighting the eye and ear of our readers, but furnishing them healthful, invigorating, spiritual food. In view of this fact we have the right to expect our readers, as they will delight to do, to do all in their power to extend the circulation of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, especially under the late, liberal offer of fifty cents for its weekly visits from August first to January first, 1899.

—Every person at all interested in the Bethany C. E. Reading Course and desiring to know more about it and its benefits should send to J. Z. Tyler, Cleveland, Ohio, for the Bethany C. E. Reading Course Bulletin, No. 4. Aside from the information contained in this bulletin, you will find the testimony of a large number of our best writers and thinkers as to the the merits of this method of study for our churches, Bible-schools and Endeavor Societies, which will command your respectful attention.

—As much as we pride ourselves in the glorious achievements of our army and navy we cannot look with any degree of allowance upon the "camp canteen" nor the governmental authority that permits it to exist. It is a thing to be deplored and opposed by every patriotic citizen in behalf of our soldiers and our country and we hail with delight the attempt to have this curse eliminated from our military camp and ranks. Would that there could be such an uprising of the good people of the land against the saloon everywhere! Petitions are being circulated, praying the President of the United States to abolish the "canteen system" and we hope that all our readers will sign and help to circulate one of these petitions, a form of which appeared in our columns last week.

—Bro. J. B. Royal, of Vermont, Ill., we are informed, passed to his reward on the 27th of July and was buried on the 28th. This brother did not dishonor his own nor his Master's name. He was a royal Christian man and was honored of God with a long life. Bro. J. C. Reynolds, his fellow-laborer and companion in Christ, will prepare a tribute to his memory for our columns.

—The four barrels of rich claret which the Guide says was presented to the First Kentucky regiment by Miss Dora Schultz, of this city, and which resulted in "several headaches" shows how even a well-intended act may intrude upon the sacred rights of others and do injury when and where not intended. We do not know that we can even say that this was unwise or indiscreet. With all the record which rich claret has behind, it borders strongly on the verge of crime. The Christian Guide well and truly says: "Not only were there headaches in camp, but many mothers' hearts were made to ache and bleed when the news reached them of their drunken boys. How much better it would have been to have given them a good, refreshing drink or two of lemonade, or better, sent some Bibles with mothers' prayers."

—The convention at Indianapolis recommended the brotherhood to raise our Extension Fund to $250,000 by the close of this century. To reach $250,000 of a permanent fund by the close of 1900 we must raise $35,000 annually. The board asks for $20,000 in the coming September offering. The board has indicated to each church what it should raise to reach this amount. Send to G. W Muckley, Kansas City, Mo., for literature and raise your proportion.

—We take pleasure in calling the favorable attention of our readers to the advertisement of Kentucky University in this and other issues of our paper. It has a full and able faculty, who do faithful work, as its hundreds of prominent and successful alumni, and a large number of students every year testify. It is one of the oldest, best, and leading colleges in the country, and affords ample means to our young men and women to obtain a good, helpful education. The location of this institution of learning and its terms afford rare advantages to all persons seeking an education.

—The placing of the statue of Pere Marquette in the rotunda of the capital at Washington and his face on a postage stamp now in circulation, are not the most harmful acts of the present Congress, and yet they are not consistent with the attitude of our government toward religious bodies, as we see things. Not only does it show the shrewdness of the Roman Catholic Church in advancing its own interests at the expense of the government, and the power of its ecclesiastics over our government to the detriment of Protestant Churches, contrary to the policy of church and state independence, but there seems to have been other men who served their country in such a way as to better deserve to be remembered.

—In this paper the reader will find an apology from Bro. Myrick to Bro. Willett and the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the spirit of an article which appeared in our columns a few weeks ago from his pen. The apology is unreserved and free-hearted, and was, we believe, prompted by the Spirit of Christ. These are brave words and we love the man the more for them. Bro. Myrick is a good writer and has delighted our readers often with the thoughtful productions of his pen. And now that he has apologized for the first appearance of the vindicative, persecuting spirit in his articles, our readers will take greater pleasure than before in reading his productions. Bro. Myrick's frankness in correcting an error is worthy of emulation by others and will be commended by everyone who hath the Spirit of Christ in his heart.

—We will be pardoned for giving this little extract from a personal letter which is appropos to our recent change of form:

I began to read the old Gospel Echo, when published, I think, at Quincy, or perhaps at Macomb, Ill. I have read it through all its changes since, until it has become that splendid cosmopolitan weekly, the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Its growth in breadth, in sweetness, in power, has recently been very marked. Now with your new and better form, scarcely anything is left to desire. May the Master bless you, and spare you long to plead the cause of primitive Christianity.

CHAS. B. NEWNAN.

—The time for the offering for Church Extension, the first Lord's Day in September, is drawing near, and as this is one of the important agencies in advancing the Master's work here on earth, it is time that the churches were preparing for the offering. We ask your attention to the references to that work in this paper, and to what will appear on that subject until after the offering is made. Let this notice, however, be sufficient admonition to all those churches that have not yet begun preparations for the offering, to commence at once. Send to G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo., for literature.

—If General Miles could prohibit the use of strong drinks to the army in Cuba on wise grounds, we do not see why President McKinley should not at once abolish the "camp canteen" for the same reason. Here is General Miles' order to the American army in Cuba:

The army is engaged in active service under climate conditions which it has not before experienced. In order that it may perform its most difficult and laborious duties with the least practicable loss from sickness, the utmost care, consistent with prompt and efficient service, must be exercised by all, especially by officers. The history of other armies has demonstrated that in a hot climate abstinence from the use of intoxicating drink is essential to continued health and efficiency.

—The following paragraph appears in the Christian Oracle at the close of an article entitled, "For a New 'Declaration and Address:'"

We, the members of the Garfield Park Christian Church, do here and now appeal to Christians and Christian Churches everywhere to enlist with us in the program of action above roughly outlined. We invite correspondence with reference to a "Social Christian Conference," to be held either separately or in connection with one of our general gatherings. Kindly send names, addresses and suggestions to our pastor, F. G. Strickland, 270 Monticello Avenue, Chicago.

The article sets forth that, while we have been quite faithful to the doctrines and ordinances of the church, "the time has fully come for a more earnest insistence on the fruits of the gospel." Hence, it recommends an earnest study to comprehend the kingdom of God, and the social conditions of our own time, and that we "protest against the principles now obtained in society (commerce, industry, government and all human relation) which are contrary to the principles taught by Jesus. In other words, we understand the pastor of Garfield Park Christian Church and his congregation to emphasize the need of applied Christianity, in all the relations of life. We have no doubt but that the church of the future is to be sociological as well as theological.

—Our esteemed contemporary, the St. Louis Christian Advocate, speaks out bodly against the appearance of evil in the official ranks of the Methodist Church, South. We give the closing paragraph of an editorial in a recent number of that paper, appealing to the members of the church to refund that government appropriation, in part, at least, before they suffer as did Achan for the golden wedge and the Babylonian garment. Dr. Palmore says:

If we at once rise up and raise the $100,800, and then push the Trojan horse with the entire $288,000 back to Washington, it will do more good than if every preacher in the south should preach 10,000 sermons each on "Candor," "Honesty," and "Truthfulness." If the church, by individual contributions, will raise $100,000, the editor of the St. Louis Christian Advocate will pay the remaining $800. An average of 7 cents from each member of Southern Methodism will raise the $100,000. If one member is willing to give $800, the entire membership ought to average 7 cents and not feel the loss, but realize a thousandfold gain to a cause so dear to Christ and all his followers. What is money or comfort compared with honor, purity and character! This editor had rather leave his office in tears and go out and hire to some farmer and spend the balance of his days following a plow than to occupy the greatest pulpit or tripod of a church under any such stigma or cloud.

—The excellent articles which have been appearing in late numbers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on practical themes are beginning to show effects. Here is a letter in relation to one of them which will explain itself. If you agree with the letter let us know and the paper will be "tracted."

The treatment of "Church Finance" by Bro. Albert Schwartz, in last week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, is so superior and so true to Scriptural lines, I am constrained to suggest that the same be tracted, and that steps be taken for its wide circulation among the churches. If a copy could be placed in the hands of every church member and be carefully read by all, it would seem like there must result very many conversions to the tithing plan for raising church revenues, and a corresponding abandonment of the make-shift, semi-worldly methods of gathering moneys for carrying on the Lord's work. Were I to single out a given sentence from Bro. Schwartz' address, it would be to quote, under the last division of his subject, "Caring for the Needy"—his declaration, "Let the church supply the money . . . and the lodge will fail because we assume our much-neglected work of caring for the needy." Can we not have the tract? W. P. KEELER.

Chicago, July 28, 1898.

PERSONAL MENTION.

E. H. Harrison, pastor of the church at Lake Charles will resign September 1st, and on account of climatic conditions, says that he wants a change. He thinks the climate of Missouri would agree with him. He says that he has had much experience in the ministry, and can furnish good recommendations.

W. F. Haman, pastor Fifth Christian Church, this city, was recently presented with a baptismal suit by his congregation.

From a statement in a local paper of Centralia, Mo., it appears that the summer heat is having no bad effect upon the audiences who attend upon the ministry of Bro. Denton. "He is a student and feeds the flock."

After visiting Yellowstone Park and the Omaha Exposition, Sherman Hill and wife will locate at Mankato, Minn., where he will assume the ministry of the Word for the church there.

A card from E. N. Tucker, pastor of the church at Greenville, Ill., says: "July 21st was a grand day with the church here. We had a mortgage burning. With the work gradually improving we feel very much encouraged with the outlook."

S. B. Moore, pastor of the church at Galesburg, Ill., and President of the Galesburg Christian Endeavor District, is spending his vacation with friends and relatives at North Middletown, Kentucky. The next convention of the Galesburg Endeavor District will be held at Cuba, Ill., Aug. 19-21, for which a good program has been prepared.

The church at Pittsfield, Ill., for which Bro. R. F. Thrapp preaches, last Sunday appropriated $50 to pay the expenses of five delegates to Eureka Encampment.

T. A. Wood expects to hold a meeting at Center School House, near Ohio, Mo., in the near future.

J. F. Sloan closed his ministry for the Central Church at Muncie, Ind., with the month of July, and has removed to Cleveland, O. Address, 502 S. Franklin St., that city.

A. P. Cobb has removed from Emo, Ontario, to Decatur, Ill., where he will answer all calls for meetings. He states that his business interests require his residence at Decatur.

H. W. White's farewell sermon at Redwood Falls, Minn., was published in full in the local paper of that city. He is now at Cando, North Dakota.

Dr. Elliott Irving Osgood, who was married on the 14th inst., to Frances Hertzog, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. O. G. Hertzog, are visiting friends at Macatawa Park for a few days, They expect to go to China in September as missionaries. They are both graduates of Hiram, and are well-fitted for the mission field.

W. T. Moore, Dean of Missouri Bible College, sailed for England on the S. S. Labrador, July 30th, from Montreal, and will return about Sept. 1st.

J. Z. Tyler, Cleveland, Ohio, and Geo. L. Snively, of Jacksonville, Ill., are expected to arrive at Macatawa Park about Aug. 8th for a brief vacation.

A. M. Atkinson and wife, of Wabash, Ind., arrived at Macatawa, July 28th, and will spend the month of August here. He is looking well considering his recent severe illness, but lacks strength yet, which we hope the Macatawa atmosphere. water and diet will supply.

Mrs. Meier, of St. Louis, one of our prominent lady workers, and President of the Orphan Home's Board, of that city, with her son, Duncan, and a party of her St. Louis friends, has arrived at Macatawa Park, and is charmed with the place.

D. S. Henkell, Pomeroy, O., who has practiced law for twenty years, and whose church relations have been until recently with the Lutherans, was ordained recently as a minister among us by Bro. G. M. Weimer, of Huntington, West Va. He desires to engage in missionary or evangelistic work, and "is not seeking a soft place." Address him as above.

A MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Rev. C. H. Smith of Plymouth, Conn., Gives the Experience of Himself and Little Girl in a Trying Season—What He Depends Upon.

The testimonials in favor of Hood's Sarsaparilla come from a class of people whose words are worth considering. Many clergymen testify to the value of this medicine. Read this:

"By a severe attack of diphtheria I lost two of my children. I used Hood's Sarsaparilla as a tonic both for myself and little girl and found it most excellent as a means to restore the impoverished blood to its natural state and as a help to appetite and digestion. I depend upon it when I need a tonic and I find it at once efficacious." REV. C. H. SMITH, Congregational parsonage, Plymouth, Conn.

Z. A. Harris concluded his pastorate of the church at Braceville, O., on the last Lord's Day in June. During his year and a half pastorate at Braceville there were forty additions to the church, all but six of which were by confession of faith, and mostly young people. The church held a rally the last of July, 1897, which was a season of refreshing, and was followed within a week by a series of meetings lasting eight days, which resulted in 13 additions. During all this time Bro. Harris was a student at Hiram College, from which he graduated in June, of the present year. He has now taken up the work at Bluffton, Ind., under the auspices of the State Board, where his labors will be largely evangelistic, and for which he is eminently fitted.

Knox P. Taylor, of Bloomington, Ill., preached at the First Christian Church, this city, on last Sunday morning. The First Church is doing some house-cleaning, repairing and changing in the absence of their pastor, F. O. Fannon.

We understand that Bro. J. G. Waggoner has resigned the pastorate of the church at Eureka, Ill. He went there nearly thirteen years ago, where he has preached ever since, except a year and a half in Buffalo, N. Y. The church is one of the largest and most liberal in the state. There have been more than 1,300 additions during the eleven years of his ministry there. The church is in good order, thoroughly organized and in peace.

Singer A. O. Hunsaker, of Irving, Ill., is singing for G. H. Sims in a tent meeting at Defiance, O.

F. M. Branie is pushing the work at Colchester, Ill. He will hold meeting in September.

Bro. M. Ingels, of Leanna, Kansas, desires to form a partnership with a good singing evangelist, to begin work September 1st. Drop him a line.

English Topics.

THE SMASHING OF DARWINISM.

The theory of evolution has had a very long run, but at last the great reaction has begun. A lecture has recently been delivered in London on the question, "What is Science?" by the Duke of Argyll. In this fine address the Duke returns to those scientific subjects which have always had such a fascination for him. He writes about such topics whenever he chooses with an intellectual vigor which is as rare as it is welcome in the aristocracy. This nobleman stands at the head of our patrician literati, and there are few scholars of plebeian rank who can equal him. The momentous part of the lecture is that in which he boldly and with terrific success attacks the assumptions of Darwinism. Now, it is only of late that there have been signs in the intellectual world of any patience with any thinkers who seem to be rebelling against the conclusions of the high priests of the evolution school. Unfortunately, large numbers of preachers and professors in religious circles have, during the past two decades, been shutting their eyes and opening their mouths and gulping down any and every absurdity enunciated by Darwinists. In England, all the broad churchmen are evolutionists. In Germany, most of the preachers and teachers of all schools are wild Darwinians. In America, the brilliant Henry Ward Beecher surrendered his great intellect at this shrine of an extreme pseudo-science. I well-remember the astonishment and regret with which I read his vivacious, but flippant, sermons on development. Strange to say, French philosophers as a body have never given their adhesion to this degrading theory. That resistance is largely due to the attitude of the greatest of French anthropologists, Quatrefages. It seemed to me some years ago that the argument of Quatrefages was unanswerable. The greatest scientist of our time in Germany, Virchow, has never been an evolutionist. This fact has had great weight in changing the current of conviction in Germany, where the reaction against Darwinism has been some time in process. The heaviest attack yet delivered on the position of the evolutionists is this by the Duke of Argyll. It will surely turn the tide. Even rationalist organs, like the London Daily Chronicle, are paying homage to the Duke's pamphlet. For Darwin himself, the Duke of Argyll, like every well-informed man, has the most profound respect. Indeed, he speaks of Darwin as the greatest naturalist who ever lived, with the possible exceptions of Linnæus and Cuvier. It appears that in the last years of his life, Darwin once called on the Duke, when a discussion took place on adaptation to special function.

MIND AS THE RULING FUNCTION OF THE UNIVERSE.

In this famous discussion the Duke said: "Well, Mr. Darwin, I cannot see any explanation of such facts except the working of mind." On this, Darwin paused for a moment, and then said slowly, "That often comes upon me with overwhelming force; but then at other times"— and he drew his hand across his eyes, as if to indicate that a vision had vanished. Now, it is on this very point that the Duke of Argyll comes into conflict with the ultra-Darwinian school; for him the vision of mind does not vanish; it offers, on the contrary, in his judgment, the only possible solution of the problem of the development of life on our planet. Cautioning his audience, in this lecture just published, against the use of vague terms like "natural selection," in which the idea of selection seems to contradict the idea of mere nature-working, for to select is to exhibit choice, and to entertain choice is to be possessed of intelligence, the Duke leads us through the several strata of which the earth is composed. He finds that there are contained in them the following clues as to the great procession of animal and vegetable life, suggesting how it has been organized and arranged. The first clue is that it had a beginning, that it has been done by steps in time. The second clue is that some forms have remained stationary, such as certain shell-fish in the Mesozoic period, while new forms have simultaneously arisen, thus showing that there was no universal necessity working. The third clue is that crowded and rapid changes have often been compressed within comparatively limited duration. The fourth clue is that the changes have followed a definite order and have "marched toward a definite consummation—namely, the establishment of higher and higher structures in the scale of organization." The final clue is that a law of mental prevision and corresponding provision is so conspicuous and all-pervading throughout the facts, that it impresses itself upon the human mind irresistibly, leading even those who sweep design from their system of thought to use words which are only intelligible on the assumption that the deliberate design of mind acts throughout the whole realm of nature. The problem, be it remembered, is whether the phenomena of nature, as we perceive them, are the products of accident and mechanical necessity or the results of the action of a free and intelligent will. As to the how of this action, the Duke of Argyll looks on the theory of natural selections as being the "most wonderful delusion which has ever imposed itself on the minds of men in the whole history of science." The assumptions of this theory are next analyzed. First, is the assumption that living forms have never been introduced save by common parentage. Now, this assumption is opposed to the very necessity of thought, for the beginning of life on this planet must have been by some other means than by common parentage. The second assumption is that while the origin of life may have been due to common parentage, that process can never have been repeated. But the Duke insists that nature is continually repeating her processes, and that the strong presumption is that she has repeated this one. Such is the argument of the Duke of Argyll against Darwinian hypothesis of natural selection based on chance and mechanical necessity. The blessed word "evolution" is too vague any longer to satisfy keen thinkers, and the reaction is fairly setting in against the most subtle form of infidelity ever known. Much of Darwin's fabric will stand because it is based on the widest observation of the facts of nature ever made. But along with these patient investigations we have a number of scientific hypothesis which have not yet been established, and some ideas which appear almost unthinkable, as students are at last beginning to realize.

THE UPWARD LOOK.

The ablest living preacher in the line of illustrations based on nature is Dr. Hugh Macmillan, whose sermons have in them more ozone, more dewy freshness, more flowery fragrance, more key-notes from the bird orchestra and more sparks from starry fires than are furnished by any other living preacher. In his new volume is an exquisite sermon on "The Oxlip, or the Upward Look." The oxlip is a favorite flower in the borders of our English gardens. It is a hybrid, produced by the union of a primrose and cowslip. The pollen or fertilizing dust of the primrose is carried by an insect to the flower of the cowslip, and that pollen works a great change upon the seed of the cowslip. It causes the young plant that springs from it to present the mingled character of its two parents. Sir George Grove, the well-known author of the "Dictionary of Music," was one day walking with Tennyson in his lovely grounds at Farringford, and the conversation happening to turn upon the changes which plants undergo by the pollen or dust of one being conveyed to the flower of another, Sir George asked Tennyson, "What is the difference between a cowslip and an oxslip?" The poet took his visitor to a corner of the garden where a cluster of cowslips and a cluster of oxlips grew near together. "Now, look," said he, "you see that the cowslip looks downward and the oxlip looks upward." Even in the Christian Church too many of us are like the cowslip, looking down to the dark soil, and like the Philippians to whom Paul wrote that they were "minding earthly things." Others, thank God, have been touched by higher and transforming influences, so that they have caught the "solar look." The Greek word for man in the New Testament is "the upward-looking." The great danger of the people of God is the materialism of the age. It is all the more perilous because it is a cultured and refined materialism. Whenever we see a bust of Julius Cæsar we notice that he is always looking up with that keen eagle glance which distinguished him from all other Romans. In no other great Roman is to be seen that same yearning gaze. Cæsar was looking beyond this world after something that he could never attain here. The gospel he never heard. But he nursed in his great soul that divine discontent which made him the greatest of pagans. All the vast heathen world is beginning to look up. The gospel of grace has sounded forth the call to this whole race, and carnal and cruel materialism hears in that call its death-knell. W. DURBAN.

Wheeling Through England.

IV.

Since this is the record of a bicycle trip, it would be entirely proper to forego any attempt to detail the experiences and impressions produced by a three day's stay in London. London is better seen from the top of an omnibus than from a bicycle, and the wheels were accordingly stabled and our patronage temporarily transferred to the omnibuses. They are appallingly slow as means of transit, but are eminently satisfactory when one desires only a point of observation, in the throng and yet above it. Aside from the prevalence of omnibuses and cabs, the absence of electric and cable cars and the fact that all traffic keeps to the left instead of the right, the most conspicuous feature of any characteristic street seen in London is the vast number of silk hats in sight. The majority of business men, clerks and boys over seventeen wear nothing else (I mean nothing else in the line of hats) and are permitted by custom to wear nothing else. I was told on good authority that the clerks in many business houses were required to wear top-hats, and that on a warm day it is a common sight to see a man wearing a straw hat for comfort and carrying the required tile, to be put on before coming in sight of his place of business.

Our last day in London was the Fourth of July and it was a pleasure to see the American flag, either alone or entwined with the British emblem, flying from many business houses in Oxford Street, Piccadilly and the Strand. Never before, we were told, had the British people celebrated the Fourth of July as they did this year. When my companion and I returned to our lodgings the evening of the third, we found our beds decorated with two large American flags. So we slept that night under the double protection of the Stars and Stripes and the Union Jack, and gave thanks, not only for such ample protection, but for the kindly spirit which prompted this act of international courtesy on the part of our genial landlord. It seemed a sin against all the canons of patriotism to fail to attend the American Ambassador's Fourth of July reception, to which all Americans were invited, but it happened to be impossible for us to be present.

"Say, are you from the States? I'm from Syracuse, New York, and I'm mighty lonesome." This from a stranger who suddenly confronted us as we were walking up Ludgate

Hill the afternoon of the same day, looking for a bicycle mechanic who could put in some repairs on my companion's wheel. The little silk flags protruding from our breast pockets had told the story of our nationality, and the lonesome stranger joined himself to us. "I've been in this country two months," he said, "and I've seen everything in it. I want to go home. The last three weeks I haven't done a thing but go to church to kill time. Why, do you know, up here at St. Paul's they have church five times every day. You haven't got a watch in your pocket, have you? These English cigars——" He had heard the morning news of the failure of the attack on Santiago, but not the afternoon news of the destruction of the Spanish fleet. We gave him that and he seemed to feel better. Then we began to talk bicycle and found in him an expert. He took a disgusted look at the broken chain which my companion carried in his pocket and which bore upon it the marks of one English mechanic's incapacity. "Oh, these British repair fellows. They couldn't mend a puncture decently. The boy that sweeps out an American bicycle store knows more about a wheel than any of them." Thereupon he went down into one pocket and brought up a few links of a chain, into another and brought up a small hammer. In ten minutes the job was done, and well-done. I happened to remark that I had lost my pump and could not find one to fit my American valves. Down into another pocket he goes and comes up with a pump, "Here, take this. It'll fit your tires." That lonesome American was a God-send to us and I think we were a happy find for him, for we sent him around to Col. Hay's reception as our proxy and left him looking a good deal more cheerful than we found him.

Riding a bicycle through the crowded streets of London, say from Charing Cross to London Bridge, is an exhilarating and exciting exercise, and one not to be recommended to persons of a nervous temperament. We did not do it for fun, but because we had entered London from the northwest and wanted to leave toward the southeast. Besides, I wanted to visit the London agency of the Sterling bicycles and tell them what a good wheel they sold. So there was no way out of it but to ride through the city from end to end. The progress is simple enough for the most part. All you have to do is to keep to the left, get in behind some omnibus and let it cleave a path for you, taking care not to run it down if it stops suddenly. Never mind the horses behind you, they will probably be all about you and over you, but if they step on you it is not your fault and the driver is responsible. If the omnibus sets too slow a pace, slide through the two foot space between it and the hackney cab to the right, stoop and go under that horse's nose, give the "'ansom" as wide a berth as possible (for its driver hates you as a cyclist), wriggle through a heterogeneous mass of wheeled traffic, and then drop in behind another omnibus. In justice to London streets it must be said that, while the traffic appears a continuous, crowded and packed procession, it never appears tangled or confused. There is rigid law, rigidly enforced, and if you know the rules you can tell just where every atom of the mass is going and which way each driver will turn. So riding through London is not a desperate game of chance, but is in the highest degree a game of skill, having certain points in common with chess.

The courtesy of our friends at the office of the Christian Commonwealth added greatly to the pleasure and convenience of our three days in London. Leaving London, the route lies through Canterbury to Dover and thence westward along the south coast. The old verger who showed us through Canterbury Cathedral, a stout little man, perpetually out of breath, entertained us with a steady flow of conversation—or monologue—consisting of a medley of questions and observations about the war, information about his wife's relatives who lived in New Jersey, reflections on the virtues and vices of the established church, information about the goverment and international workings of cathederals, with especial reference to the sinecures enjoyed by the canons and the bishops, and a guide-book data about the cathedral. From Canterbury to Dover the road is a series of long hills, back-breaking to climb and neck-breaking to coast, but is worth the labor. We are in a land of noble cliffs along the sea and picturesque moorlands, from which the sea retired a century ago; a land rich in historical associations and relics of the Norman conquests; a land of fashionable and gay watering-places, and, mingled in this sweet profusion, here and there an old dead seaport, such as Rye, deserted by her commerce, deserted by the sea itself, and left far back upon the shore as an embalmed specimen of a seaport town of the eighteenth century. Coming into Portsmouth we are again living in the present, a city full of life and activity, with harbor full of ships and streets full of sailors and soldiers. A naval officer told me yesterday that there are thirty British battleships and cruisers now in Portsmouth harbor, not to mention smaller vessels of war. From Portsmouth we cross to the Isle of Wight, for a perfect day of cycling and sight-seeing. Punctures altered our route and shortened our course somewhat, but did not mar the pleasure of the day. Then back to Portsmouth to spend the Sunday and take a fresh start toward Land's End. W. E. GARRISON.

Our Cause in Oklahoma.

My remarks are applicable to that part of Oklahoma known as the Cherokee Strip or to Kay and Grant counties.

In Kay county we have organized at Newkirk, Ponco City, Blackwell and Bitter Creek near Rock Falls.

We have houses of worship at Ponco City, Blackwell, six miles west of Newkirk, and one now building near Rock Falls. The other congregations worship in school-houses or rented buildings. Within the last year we have built three houses of worship and finished one that was commenced the year before.

As for Grant county, we have congregations or organizations at Pond Creek, Medford, Waketa, Lamont, Orie and at Flint S. H., about ten miles southeast of Caldwell, Kan. Yes, and one at Renfrow, and I believe one or two others of which I have no definite information at present. So far as I know we have houses of worship at Medford and Orie only. We are anxious to organize congregations at Beamen, half way between Hunnewell, Kan., and Blackwell, O. T., on the railroad. Also at Nardin and Dernler, between Medford and Blackwell, on the Hutchinson and Gulf Road.

We have now four railroads in Kay and Grant with a strong probability of a fifth one.

So far as my acquaintance goes, we have seven preachers in these two counties. C. W. Prewitt at Power City, E. Backman and R. H. Walling at Medford, J. W. Hopwood at Pond Creek, —— Graham at Cleardale, Kan., J. J. Broadbent at Rock Falls, (P. O. Clare) and a "half-horse preacher," as Bro. Simms would say, at Vilott. Perhaps I ought to include Bro. Rehorn (W. S.) and Bro. C. H. Hilton (of Perry) in the list, as they bother us a little now and then. The former, I think, organized the church at New Kirk, Kay county, and at Flint S. H., in Grant county, and Bro. H. recently organized the congregation in the southwest corner of Kay. From the number of congregations and preachers mentioned above it may seem like we are strong, but such is not the case. Each of these congregations is comparatively weak. All the preachers mentioned except two are trying to hold down claims in the Strip and to farm a little as occasion will permit, teach in the public schools or even dabble a little in politics; in fact they have done about everything that honest men can do to make a living. Perhaps I ought to say that Bro. Backman has given himself wholly to the ministry of the Word ever since the "opening of the Strip." This good brother has borne the heat and burden of the day, and I suppose has not received to exceed $200 per year until the last year. Although a comparatively young man, he has been very badly afflicted, and I understand is now forbidden to preach by his physician.

What is true of Bro. B. as to dollars is equally true of other preachers, except most of us have gone at something else for a living. For instance, Hopwood and myself have taught. Bro. Broadbent has farmed (and has succeeded) and Bro. Walling served a term in the Territorial Legislature and also has practiced medicine.

Bro. Rehorn has had to fight a contest.

Of course, none of these remarks are applicable to Bro. Prewitt, for he came here only about one year ago, just as we were entering the "financial swim" of 1897.

Of course you have heard that we had an enormous wheat and corn crop last year. The wheat averaging more than 25 bushels per acre and bringing about 75 or 80 cents per bushel on an average, and the corn about 40 bushels at about 20 cents. But you ought to reflect that we had been here three years on less than half rations—hence thousands of dollars went to pay up old scores, thousands more for houses and granaries, thousands more for machinery, wagons, buggies, etc., and some to agents, entertainments, sleight of hand performances, etc., etc., of which we have had a superabundance. For three whole years we had almost absolute rest. But with prosperity they (agents, etc.) came like the locusts of Egypt and filled the land. In another article I will mention some of our present needs and some of our hindrances. H. W. ROBERTSON.

Vilott, O. T., May 4, 1898.

P. S.—In looking over this I notice I failed to mention a congregation of our people near Toukawa, Kay county, for which Bro. Graham preaches. H. W. R.

Jacksonville, Florida.

There are at this writing more than twelve thousand troops encamped in and around Jacksonville. These men came from Wyoming in the north and west to the states south and east. This army corps is under the command of Gen. Lee, who has his headquarters at the Windsor Hotel. When the men went into camp here, it was determined to erect a large gospel tent on the grounds and have nightly services, conducted by the chaplains of the different regiments, assisted by the ministers of the city. It was soon found that this tent was not sufficiently large to in any way accommodate those desiring to attend, and the Y. M. C. A. Association at the north, at once sent several large tents, capable each of seating seven or eight hundred, and each under the charge of a Y. M. C. A. Secretary. This move has relieved the situation, and has continued to call into active assistance both the chaplains attached to the corps and the ministers of the city, and instead of one or two overcrowded places of meeting, there are several large tents now on the ground in which services are being conducted nightly. It was the privilege of the writer to preach in one of these tents last night. The place of meeting was crowded, the walls of the tent were folded, and hundreds sat and stood around on the outside. There were probably more than two thousand present. It was an inspiring sight and filled us with spiritual enthusiasm. I have never spoken to a more interesting audience. The time, the circumstances, the surroundings, the personnel of the audience, the probabilities and the possibilities of the immediate future, all conspired to fill me with a reverential awe and a tremendous feeling of responsibility. Chaplain Stringfellow, of Virginia, an Episcopalian, was present and aided in the services. At the close of my address, hundreds of young men crowded to the platform and expressed their gratitude for the words spoken, and scores of them asked to be remembered at the throne of grace. Quite a large number introduced themselves as members of the Christian Church from a number of different states. The discipline of the camp is very strict, and it is not an easy matter for the men to get permission to visit the city churches, but they are being well looked after, and can have the opportunity of attending divine service on the camp grounds every night of the week if they are inclined to do so. I have had the pleasure of meeting the chaplains of the different regiments here, and have found them all men of ability and fine standing in the religious bodies they represent. They have an abundance of work to do, and some of them are working very hard. Our soldier boys, as a rule, appreciate ministerial calls at the camp, and sometimes when calling on the members of some particular camp and some of whose members I have become acquainted with, pressing invitations are extended from other companies to go and see them also. It is a pleasure to meet and mingle with these dear boys, so many of them coming from Christian homes, and representing excellent families, while others perhaps never before caring about religious matters are impressed by some kindly word or little act of courtesy, and express their appreciation and almost wonder at any concern shown about them.

Our work at the new church is progressing. For the hot season we have very good audiences. Our prayer-meetings are well-attended, and some of our new members are developing good talent, all seem deeply interested, and the utmost peace and harmony reign.

The coming of the soldiers, the excitement incidental to hostilities so near, have combined to keep things stirring more than usual here in summer months. Very few have gone from Jacksonville this summer, owing to circumstances at home demanding their presence, so our city has a very animated appearance and has to-day more the appearance of a summer than a winter resort. Those coming from the north are amazed at the equableness of the climate, and the admirable weather generally. T. H. BLENUS.

Island Cottage.

DEAR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—I greet you to-day from our happy cottage home in the northland. We have no loopholes of retreat, such as Edge-wood-on-the-Lake, where cool breezes fan the brow and hammocks rest the weary brain; but we have the sweetest island home in Hedge-Grass-on-the-Swamp, whence we "View the busy world, and see the stir

Of the great Babel, but do not feel the crowd,
We hear the roar she sends through all her gates,
At a safe distance, when the dying sound
Falls a soft murmur on the uninjured ear."

Except the bull-frog's doleful thrum,
The busy skeeter's lonely hum

The sound of gentle stillness fills our home, and we rest in the holy atmosphere of our humble cottage in Hedge-Grass-on-the-Swamp! Around us on every hand are fields of golden grain, waving in the light of Minnesota's golden sun. In fact, the very swamp where stands our cottage home, one year ago covered with water and ducks, to-day is waving with golden grain. At our east window stands our garden of sweet and luscious vegetables and fruits—potatoes, turnips, beans, peas, tomatoes, radishes, lettuce, corn, melons, pickles, etc., etc., the finest that grow in all the land. Around our house and climbing over our windows, are sweet flowers and vines of every hue, with fragrance sweet as the incense of the Holy Place in Jehovah's temple by the brazen sea. Within is the happy, harmonious and contented family; papa writing, mamma sewing and the children making "music in the air" and filling our souls with the sunshine of love. The morning sun peeps into our chamber at three o'clock, kissing our slumbering cheeks and pouring warm entreaties into our dull ears until he rouses and leads us into the refreshing and purified breezes of day. Nor does he leave us till nearly ten at night. He really sinks to rest at eight o'clock, but O, the beautiful twilight that follows! For near two hours I can sit by the west window and read or write, in the soft light, of the beautiful night.

"Hail, therefore, patrons of health and ease,
And contemplation, heart-consoling joys,
And harmless pleasures, in the thronged abode,
Of multitudes unknown! hail rural life!
Address himself who will to the pursuit
Of honors, or 'molument, or fame,
I shall not add myself to such a chase,
Thwart his attempts, or envy his success.
Some must be great. Great offices will have Great talents: and God gave to every man
The virtue, temper, understanding, taste,
That lifts him into life, and lets him fall
Just in the niche he was ordained to fill."

Minnesota is a land of sky-tinted waters and golden sunshine; a land of fruits and flowers and gentle showers; a land of honest occupation and health-recuperation; a land for quiet meditation, the best in all the nation; of good remuneration in almost every station, except the preacher's ration, and there it beats creation, to see her reputation!!

But this is pioneer work and we understand it, and prepare for it. Hence our truck patch! My father preached forty years in Illinois, and, so far as earthly remuneration was concerned, all he ever received was a pair of buckskin gloves, and they were too small for him!

So young men come to Minnesota and learn how to "endure hardship as good soldiers of Jesus Christ." I have been in this state about seven years and I think there is not now a preacher in the state who was here when I came, unless it be John Truax and William Burgess, and they are superannuated—not dead, but too old to preach regularly. I think we have never had a preacher die in the state! They either move away before they die or grow too old to die! The preacher's life in Minnesota is like a "dream," and "like a stream glides swiftly away," and the fugitive creature refuses to stay! It is now a year since I saw one of the fleeting creatures! The last one I saw, like Elijah, was on his way south! "I only am left," and I am in the top of the juniper tree—monarch of all I survey! Sic transit gloria mundi!! I am glad to know, however, that there are still a few in the state who have not bowed the knee to adversity. I hope to come down from the juniper tree and meet the hardy and sturdy prophets in glad convention at Mankato next month. What a feast we will have! What a joy 'twill be to see a real live preacher once more! If any of my old-time friends in the outside world would like to inhale a breath of Minnesota's health-giving atmosphere, and visit her Minnetonkas, Minneapas, Minnehahas, etc., etc., August 20-30 will be a fine time to come, and Mankato a fine place to begin your peregrinations. Ho, for Mankato, August 23-26.

This is "blue Monday" and I must close. The Lord's work in Olivia moves on apace. Two noble confessions last night and more to follow. This letter is dedicated to preachers who cannot take a vacation. God bless you.

Intelligent Service.

The introduction of the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses was an important move in Christian enterprise. These courses have for the prime object the training of the mind. This has been a neglected field in the church. This should be a matter of regret. Thought precedes achievement. Every work is thought out before it is wrought out. Ian Maclaren says: "What one thinks to-day he will do to-morrow." The world's progress in every realm depends upon thinking men. A question is half solved when the people begin to think. "Beware when the great God turns loose a thinker upon the planet."

There is no more needy field for the full development and use of the total brain-power than in the field of Christian enterprise. It has been said that "In this world a large part of the business of the wise has been to counteract the efforts of the good." And again that "Ignorant and blundering goodness is often as mischievous as well-schooled villainy."

The Christian Endeavor movement has had certain educational features from the beginning. It has looked well to the training of the heart: that it might love him who first loved us; to the hand: that it might be used in Christian service; and to the tongue: that it might speak for the Master. As a result of this training we have zeal, works and utterance. These are all good, and the church would be shorn of much of her power without them.

But zeal without knowledge is often misdirected, and hence dangerous. Israel is an example. Peter is another. Fanaticism and intolerance have been the product in the past of zeal coupled with ignorance. This was when religious bodies were set against each other. Now that they are on more friendly terms it might lead to some unholy alliances through a compromise of the truth.

Works without knowledge are often independent of that from which they ought to spring, and by which they are made efficient, viz., faith. Faith without knowledge is superstition, or a mere acceptance of tradition. A second-hand faith is unstable. Paul said to the Corinthians, "I have not dominion over your faith . . . . for by your faith ye stand" (R. V. Marg.).

Utterance without knowledge may even more fittingly be said to be "sounding brass" or a "clanging cymbal," than tongues without love. There is much difference between having to say something and having something to say. The former may be the product simply of a pledge, the latter results from preparation.

There is need for the opening of a new chapter in Endeavor history, a chapter that will include the training of the head as well as the training of the heart, the hand and the tongue. A trained heart will give right purpose, trained hands will give skill, a trained tongue is sure to make a noise, but a trained head is necessary for direction.

The needs of our own young people along these lines are met in the three Bethany Courses. They furnish information, inspiration and intellectual equipment along fundamental lines.

Missionary information is one of the greatest incentives to missionary enterprise. We need to know what the church has done and is doing outside of the limits of our own narrow sphere. The results of Christianity as manifest in world-wide missions are the greatest evidence of its divine origin, and the surest savor for a waning faith.

As our restoration movement grows older there is the more interest taken in its study as well as the more need for its pursuit. Reminiscence is dry, history is interesting. Distance lends enchantment. There is need for this study because "those have arisen who know not Joseph." They must be informed. The work of the present is peculiar, but in order to best perform it, there must be a thorough knowledge of the past. If the house is to be refurnished, which has been swept and garnished, we must know what evil has been cast out, lest we refurnish with the same and thus make the last state worse than the first. Or to change the figure, we must know if any wheat has been uprooted with the tares, that if so, we may sow again the good seed that in the time of harvest there be no lack.

The time has come to apply our theories. The grain is ripening; we can no longer simply show our model, we must set up a live machine and go to work. To do this we must know its construction, and even be able to make changes, if need be. The work of the future is that of construction. That of the fathers was largely to destroy. At the time of construction is the critical period in any movement. Many a reformer has failed here. Any one can tear down a building, but it requires a carpenter to build one.

The basis far the study both of missions and of the restoration, should be Bible study. If they do not find their sanction here they should have no place in the Christian's curriculum. Bible study then has been wisely placed as one of this important triplet.

Both old and young will be benefitted by a study of these courses. No more important step has been taken among the Disciples within the present decade than the inauguration of this movement. LESLIE W. MORGAN,

Washington, D. C., Letter.

Our city dailies are accustomed, at this season of the year, to set forth Washington's advantages as a summer resort. In spite of this claim it is hot here and everybody who can do so gets away. Many of the churches abandon their Sunday evening service and some the midweek meeting. The three churches of Christ continue all their services through the heated term. Thus we provide spiritual refreshments, not only for our own members, but also for members of the churches whose doors are closed. F. D. Power has found it advantageous to present, during the summer months, the "old Jerusalem gospel" and thus has enlightened many. The Vermont Avenue people are evidently of the opinion that this year their pastor should rest and so offered him a passage to Europe and a well-filled purse. He declined this token of the generous esteem of his people, assigning as his reason his work upon the "Sketches of Our Pioneers," which must be finished by September for the Bethany Reading Circle Course. Bro. Power's engagements for the summer are as follows: Ocean Grove Assembly, the first week in August, sermons at Ohio yearly meetings, Sabina, August 10 and 11; Hebron, August 13 and 14 and Chadron, August 28.

The tent meeting in the southeastern section of Washington did not result as successfully as that in the southwest section, where the Third Church was organized. The tent was badly located and the attendance not large. Much good seed was sown and the formation of a new church there is now nearer consummation than before this evangelistic effort.

The tent owned by our State Society has been pitched in Baltimore upon the lot recently purchased by the Harlem Avenue Church. B. A. Abbott and Peter Ainslie, our preachers in the Monumental City, conducted the services the first week. W. J. Wright joins them to-day. They will have a protracted siege. This new work is to be supported by our Home Board in connection with our state organization. J. W. Moody, a student of the Kimberlin Heights, Tenn., School, will fill Bro. Wright's pulpit at the Southwest Church, during his absence.

S. R. Maxwell, a recent acquisition to our ranks from another religious body, has begun his work in Rockville, Md. He has made a favorable impression and his ministry promises to be a useful one.

The Ninth Street Church is meeting promptly the payments upon the debt incurred for our new house of worship. The weekly offerings have increased at least a third since we entered our new home. A gymnasium has been put in the basement and a class meets there three times a week. We have had four additions by letter and six by confession during the past two months.

Our Washington churches did not send many representatives to the C. E. Convention in Nashville. Those who might have gone, preferred to wait until October and take the trip to the General Convention in Chattanooga. The agent of the Southern Railway agrees to put at our disposal a special coach, or coaches, for the use of the delegates from Baltimore, Washington and points north. The route will be through Asheville, the "Land of the Sky" and along the French Broad River. A stopover will be made at Biltmora and an opportunity afforded for a visit to the magnificent estate of Mr. Vanderbilt.

The recent meeting here of the National Educational Association brought thousands of visitors to our city. Sickness in my family occasioned my absence at this time. So I cannot write fully of the sessions of the convention. Among the preachers who were here I met George Gowen, of Lancaster, Ky., and A. E. Seddon, of Atlanta, Ga.

The brethren in Virginia are accustomed to regard the pastor of the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, as belonging to the whole state. They mapped out a tremendous lot of work for Z. T. Sweeney at their district meetings in July and August. Bro. Sweeney says: "There are some scaly fellows waiting for me up in the northwest." He goes to spend his vacation in the Lake region.

W. H. Book, the "Everywhere Evangelist," has been at work for three months in the valley of Virginia. He has added over 200 souls to the churches. He is now holding meetings in the Piedmont section of Virginia, and in September goes to Mathews County. Book's praises are upon the lips of all the preachers he helps in meetings. He not only converts sinners, but deepens the spiritual life of the members, increases the corps of active workers and strengthens the tie between pastor and people.

The writer wishes to bear testimony to the benefit derived personally and the blessing that came to his congregation from the course of study in the Bethany Reading Circle. The course for the next year is even more attractive, and thousands should take advantage of this opportunity for growth in grace and in the knowledge of the truth.

We considered the EVANGELIST of old as very near the ideal religious journal. It seems as if those in charge were not satisfied with a good paper when a better was possible. May the EVANGELIST live long and have all the subscribers its merits deserve.

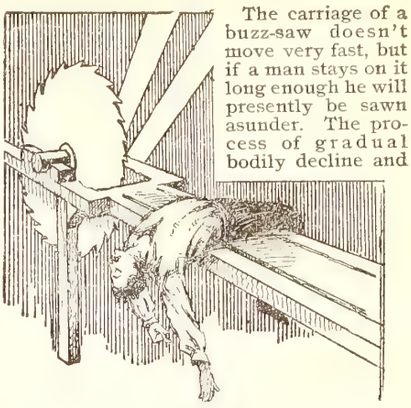
Chautauqua Letter.

The Kentucky Mountaineer, Cram and Sacrifice Physical Life, "Mr. Creakle and Dr. Strong—Ideals of Teaching," are some of the topics for the lecture platform next week. Saturday, the 30th, Dr. Barrows gives "Observations of Popular Hinduism," and on Sunday preaches upon "The Christian Conflict in Asia." All the week following is full of interest. Confucianism and the Awakening in China, Dr. Buckley, the New York editor, on United States wars, and on Robert Emmett, will give extra force and popularity to the week.

On Wednesday, August 3rd, "What is the Bible?" and Saturday, the 6th, "What we Know About the Future," by Dr. Behrends, and then his Sunday morning service is to be followed in the evening by our Bro. Z. T. Sweeney on "Foundations." This showing is enough for one week and more.

Many of our people—Disciples, Christians, members of the Church of Christ—are coming here for a change and rest during the hot days in August. They will be anxious to hear Bro. Sweeney August 7th, in the evening, and on Monday, the 8th, again at 3 o'clock.

Some of the prosperous people who help in all good, and especially missionary work, will put in pocket an extra hundred dollars more than they need for expenses and present it to the headquarters to pay for the building, that Christian members may have a home on these grounds. Those not so able, but just as willing, will bring their part of help and the work here will be far-reaching. Isaac Errett's tract, "Our Position," is being called for and read. Bro. Willett is doing solid Bible teaching.



Last Lord's day morning the need of a communion set was so plainly manifest when the service of the supper was over that Sister T. Roberts Harper, of Philadelphia, asked for a collection for purchase of a set. In ten minutes the amount was promised. Bro. William Bowler, of Cleveland, ordered it from New York, and in has arrived and will be used next Sunday morning. Thanks to this spirited daughter of the lamented Bro. Van Culin, of the church in Philadelphia.

Russell H. Conwell has been speaking to thousands in the amphitheatre the past hour (3 o'clock), on "Acres of Diamonds," and such a mighty teacher and preacher has kept the crowd thinking or in laughter the whole time. W. J. F.

Myrick Apologizes.

After my criticism of Bro. Willett appeared, I was somewhat ashamed—not of the substance of it, but the unnecessarily harsh and offensive words and expressions I employed, and I privately wrote as much to Bro. Garrison. My criticism was just, but the method was unlovely. But when I read Joseph H. McEl'Rey's criticisms and reflected that my article, while not so bad, yet to a certain extent was like his, I was more than ever ashamed of the affair. And I hereby apologize, both to Prof. Willett and to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, for the harsh words and unlovely imputations contained in my criticism. It is possible to correct a statement without impunging the character of the person making it, and I promise to do so in future. When I was a boy I learned, when in a fight, to "holler enough." And I want it distinctly understood that I am doing that very thing now. H. W. B. MYRICK.

The carriage of a buzz-saw doesn't move very fast, but if a man stays on it long enough he will presently be sawn asunder. The process of gradual bodily decline and loss of energy which leads finally to consumption is not always very rapid, but if it isn't stopped it will presently begin to saw its way into the most vital part of the body, the lungs. There would be very little consumption if every family would keep Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery in the house, and use it whenever feeling "out of sorts." It keeps the entire body in such a high condition of health and forcefulness that wasting diseases have no chance to get a foot-hold. A teaspoonful or two before meals, in a little water, gives the digestive organism power to assimilate the blood-making, nerve-toning, strength-building properties of the food.

It enables the liver and excretory system to clear the circulation of bilious poisons and remove all waste matter from the body. It replaces worn out tissue with hard muscular flesh, and changes weakness and debility into active power and nerve force.

The originator of this great "Discovery." R. V. Pierce, M. D., is chief consulting physician to the great Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute of Buffalo, N. Y., at the head of a staff of nearly a score of eminent associate physicians and surgeons. He has acquired, in his over thirty years of active practice, a reputation second to no living physician in the treatment of obstinate, chronic diseases. His prescriptions must not be confounded with the numerous "boom" remedies, "extracts," "compounds," and "sarsaparillas," which a profit-seeking druggist is often ready to urge as a substitute. Dr. Pierce's medicines are the product of wide experience and deep study. Any one may consult him by mail free of charge.

State Mission Notes.

It was recently my privilege to enjoy the association of a great quartette. I was at Nevada on Sunday morning with A. C. McKeever, and never was man treated more royally. Then at night I was at Carthage with W. A. Oldham, and everyone who knows him will feel assured that it was a pleasant companionship. The following Sunday morning I was at Odessa where that little boy of mine, S. J. Copher, ministers in word and doctrine, and at night I was with G. W. Terrell, at Blue Springs. There are days that are not very pleasant ones in my work, but these were red-letter days of enjoyment to me. I wish I had time and space to mention each as it is in detail, but I have run so far behind with my notes that I must crowd much into little.

The very next Sunday I was at Rothville to assist Bro. A. Ellett in dedicating their elegant new house. They had $600 to raise and though it took much patience and persistence, yet the amount was secured and amid great rejoicing the new edifice was dedicated to the Lord. Some men you can't help loving and one of those is J. M. Reddell; of such is the kingdom of God. It was a happy thing to met dear Bro. Ellett again.

On my way to Rothville I missed my train and had to throw myself upon the generosity of Sumner friends. Even to the extent of keeping Murph Waugh out of bed till the morning hours had come, but in the goodness of their hearts they never murmured at it at all, but actually seemed to enjoy it. God bless them.

The week was spent in attendance at the Missouri Christian Lectureship and the Missouri Christian Ministerial Association. To say that both were enjoyable, interesting and vastly profitable goes without saying.

It is to be regretted that the attendance was not larger. One cause of this is, that it was held in the hottest time of the year. This has now been remedied, as we meet next year the last of March at Huntsville. Another reason is that we are having so many other lecture courses in various parts of the state. I believe it is a thing for us to consider if this policy be the best. For my own part I doubt it very much.

The church at Louisiana has suffered a great loss in the removal of S. R. Shepherd to Louis. He has been a leader in all church work there so long, has been the pastor's right-hand man, that his removal makes a great hole in the working force of that church. He has come to St. Louis and gone into the general commission business, and I know that all who know him will wish him well. I may be clannish, but I believe that Christian men ought to patronize Christian firms who propose to do business on a Christian basis, and that is precisely what the Shepherd-Fritz Commission Co., 304 Continental Bank Building, St. Louis, will do. You can trust them in every way.

For the past two weeks the deepest shadow that can come to an earthly home has been hanging over us. Mrs. Abbott has been in the valley of death and as I write this the shadow still hangs, which way the issue will turn God alone knows. Will not the whole church pray for us in this hour of our need?

I ask also that every one invite himself to be a committee of one to see that the state treasury is at once replenished.

T. A. Abbott.

Dedication.

Sunday, July 17, was a memorable day in the history of the little church at Lees Summit. In 1870 the congregation was organized with twelve members. The growth has been slow since then. Last year we decided to let the world know that we were neither dead nor asleep. Bro. H. A. Northcutt was called to our assistance and our membership was doubled. The power of the congregation was realized for the first time. The money came freely and a number of our best citizens obeyed the gospel.

Our old brick was soon condemned. We saw we had to build. The congregation moved into the Opera House and at once began the work of building a new church home. The faithful, tireless building committee, to whom the church owes so much, was appointed. Never was there a more harmonious, industrious, liberal committee. They did the soliciting—not the preacher—and set the example in giving. My task was the pleasure of beholding the joy they took in the work of seeing the church arise in its beauty. The whole church gave gladly, some, it seemed to me, beyond their ability. At last it was finished with raised floor, circular pews—in short with all modern conveniences. The ladies carpeted the floor, the Christian Endeavor Society, led by Miss Mamie Flanagan, put in a beautiful window of cathedral glass, and Mrs. J. A. Carr gave the pulpit and communion table. It affords me great pleasure in mentioning these willing hearts that seemed to vie with each other in working for the upbuilding of the kingdom of Christ. The baptistry is elevated, and one of the most substantial and attractive I ever saw. The auditorium is square, with Sunday-school room, opening by rolling doors, at the same angle from the pulpit.

When everything was ready, we called Bro. F. O. Fannon to our assistance, whose task was to raise $1,000 and dedicate the church. In his unique, matchless style he did his work gloriously. In the afternoon, James M. Vernon, of Independence, gave us a great literary feast in an address on "Our Country, its Mission and Destiny." Bro. Vernon is one of the brightest men in the state and has come into Missouri to stay. Bro. Fannon was with us till Thursday night and led a husband and wife to the cross whom I buried with Christ in the new baptistry, fit symbol of the new tomb of Joseph of Aramathea. The congregation moves into its new home united and happy and takes another step on advancing ground. This is my third year with them, hence my joy in their progress. It is due D. L. Sharr, one of our brethren, to say he was the contractor and did his work to the entire satisfaction of the church. G. W. TERRELL.

Texas Letter.

The battleship "Texas" is no longer the "laughing stock" of the navy. For some time after she was launched a series of accidents befell her. Her machinery would become deranged; in passing into or out of harbor she would frequently ground; and at times she showed such a disposition to "wallow in the mud," that it was feared she would sink. All manner of sport was made of her, and the people for whom she was named had almost lost confidence in her. But such is not the case to-day. In the battle at Santiago, where Cervera's fleet was destroyed, she played a conspicuous and glorious part from start to finish, and history will mention her along with the "Brooklyn," the "Iowa," the "Oregon," the "Indiana," and the plucky little "Gloucester." And when the battle was over her gallant Captain Philip paraded his men, and standing reverently with uncovered heads, thanked God for victory.

R. H. Fife has returned from Kansas City to Texas. He will hold a few meetings, after which he is ready to take regular work. Bro. Fife is too well-known here to need commendation. Let some church locate him at once. Bro Hamlin has received an indefinite call to remain at Palestine.

J. H. Marshall has held a meeting at Wharton and organized a church of twenty-two members, and arranged for them to have regular preaching.

R. R. Hamlin has been at Oakwoods, a mission point with three members. They expect to have a new house soon, and a congregation of sixty members.

J. B. Boen has done a successful work at Kingston, with a church of forty-four members organized, and Sunday-school, and money raised for a pastor. Bro. Boen is now in a great camp-meeting at Throckmorton.

A. E. Ewell locates at Wichita Falls. This is an important place, and Ewell will do great good there.

J. W. Marshall has reorganized the church at Uvalde. Their old troubles removed and a new Sunday-school, they should now go forward in the work of the Master.

Homer T. Wilson, with a batch of his church, spent a couple of Sunday afternoons at Glenwood, near Ft. Worth. Result: a new church and Sunday-school organized.

Guy Inman, an Add-Ran student, and one of the livest Endeavorers in the state, is spending his vacation in Mexico.

F. T. Denson's work at Claude is bearing fruit, as is evidenced by the fact that the lumber is now on the ground for a new house.

Philip King, of Belton, spent his vacation with the church at Itasca. His meeting was fine, resulting among other things, in wheeling the church into line on all questions of modern, progressive work.

Prof. J. B. Sweeny, of the Bible College of Add-Ran University, is in a meeting at Van Alstyne, and prospects are good.

J. V. Coombs, the Indiana evangelist, is soon to hold a meeting at Ft. Worth. All Texas extends him a hearty welcome.

E. H. Harman, of Lake Charles, La., desires, on account of health, to come to Texas. Those in position to know, speak in high terms of Bro. Harman.

Annie D. Bradley, favorably known all over the land as a versatile writer, leaves us soon for Ft. Worth. It is a case of the mother-heart following the child. We will miss her much in the Central Church.

The people of Lancaster are in earnest about Randolph College. The enterprise is only a few months old, and it has been understood that only a part of the buildings would be completed this year. But not so. Those people say that they shall all be finished.

Iowa Letter.

Suffering loss for righteousness' sake. In a fine Iowa town of 10,000 population, I was recently pricing lots for church purposes. The agent of a wealthy non-resident landowner assured me that his principal had refused three or five thousand dollars ground rent (the exact figures have escaped my memory) from the whisky business. The saloon element had the consent of the local property owners, but their plans were temporarily wrecked by this man's stalwart conscience. Of course the whisky element found other parties who took their money for rent, and this man's lots lie idle for conscience' sake. This man is known as a great lover of money; but evidently he loves one thing more than money—righteousness. He puts many church members to shame.

S. P. Telford, of Keota, Iowa, has a unique method of church finance in operation. On April 15th his finance committee printed and put into the hands of every expected contributor a list of apportionments. Every apportionment for the whole church is on this list. On May 1st they sent out the same list with a column added in which every acceptance of apportionment appears. I notice that some cut down the request and accept a lower amount per week, a few raise the amount and accept, and very few decline entirely. On July 1st they sent out a quarterly statement, which, on one sheet, shows the standing of every account. I copy the totals: "Pledges for the quarter. $225.09; Amount received for quarter, $165.66; Balance due, $98.47; Overpaid, $36.49; Due on former account, $142.06; Total now due, $245.48."

"A new Tract on Infant Baptism." 78 pp., lies on my table. It is by C. W. Freeman, of West Salem, Ill. Ten cents per copy, or $1.00 per doz. The author sent letters to every M. E. Bishop save two, and also to the Bishops of the U. B. Church. This is his question: "Will you kindly give me the Scriptural references that clearly teach the baptizing of infants?" The few answers received are very interesting:

"I know of no Scriptural reference that clearly teaches that infants should be baptized, nor do I recall, etc."—JOHN M. VINCENT.

"There are no particular verses of Scripture which distinctively enjoin infant baptism, or etc."—C. D. FOSS.

"I think there is no direct Scriptures. The proof is largely inferential."—N. CASTLE, of U. B. Ch.

John M. Walden's evasion is very cute and seemingly pious. Get it.

"A city set on a hill cannot be hid." A few years ago I organized a little band of Disciples in a large town. Recently I returned to do some soliciting for them. Among others I asked help of a man who is a member of another church. Here is his answer: "Yes sir, I have been watching a few families in your band here. It has done them good—great good. I like to help pay for work that does good in the homes of our town. Put me down on your list." On this same occasion some gave very little or none at all because they saw the dark side of life in this little band. It is a wonder that Jesus saw through the dark side of the world and gave himself on the cross to enlarge the bright side.

I wonder what lessons Charles Spurgeon would have found in what I saw a few days since? He was a wonderful man to see things and learn lessons. I saw a stout old wooden barrel. It was placed under the shade of a tree, the hose nozzle had been thrown into its capacious depths, and the water turned on. The filling process had gone on nicely until two-thirds done. There it halted and a battle begun. Great cracks, almost a finger's breadth, poured the water out as fast as the hose forced it in. I do not know the outcome, but after watching the contest for hours it seemed to me a hopeless task. The staves had warped so that tightening of hoops had not closed the gaping seams. The master of the house had resorted to the hose as his last and only hope in restoring the barrel to usefulness in its full capacity. A few moments thought on your part will evolve these and other lessons:

Neither barrels nor men are made to lie about empty and unused. Service is the law of our being.

Constant use means constant readiness for service and perpetual wholeness.

Neither hoops nor decalogue statutes can fully restore loss capacity. The householder and the Christ must devise something more.

A Stephen full of faith and of the Holy Spirit is a beautiful sight and a blessing to any church or any city. Our full capacity is needed.

The spiritual emptiness of our lives should not be charged up to any lack in God's grace. Back of that old barrel was a stand pipe and great engines and one of the greatest rivers of Iowa.

Partly redeemed, that old barrel was useful—worth more than for kindling wood. Use a Christian man for what he is worth. It may be that some of us are doomed to live on earth a two-thirds life because of the sins of our youth.

Is it any wonder that the Lord Jesus takes a long, long time to fill some lives when others are filled in a moment?

These hot days no one is working harder than Chancellor W. B. Craig, of Drake University. The $50,000 fund begun at commencement time is before him; $7,000 more will complete it. God bless him and the donors.

One of the remarkable facts which will characterize the close of this century is visible in the medical and surgical world. If you have not given it attention, you will be agreeably surprised to see how many physicians and surgeons are abandoning the use of alcohol in whole or in part, no matter in what form. Scientific experiments in Germany, France, England and America have started in the medical world what may prove to be a landslide, sweeping alcohol out of the field. Edward Hornibrook, President Iowa State Medical Society, speaking recently about our soldier boys and the canteen said: "The use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage tends to lower the vitality of the system and increase the danger of exposure to infectious diseases."

Professors Hopkins and Youngblood, recently of Missouri, have leased Oskaloosa College for a term of years, and will make of it a first-class Normal and Preparatory School. These men are a splendid addition to Oskaloosa and our Iowa forces. They are men of large experience in educational work, and know how to succeed. Write them for fuller information.

How About It?

Editor Christian-Evangelist:—In your issue of July 7, 1898, I was very much pleased in reading an editorial entitled "Prosperity of Soul." It appeared to me that I could see between the lines that the writer is in the possession of an experience far in advance of the church which the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST represents—that is, what I mean by the church is the body of professed Christians who make up the congregations of that particular church.

Having been at one time a member in good standing, it appeared singular and mysterious to me that nearly every one, including their preachers, insisted that works, and works only, would qualify for the kingdom, and if immersion had taken place it was the essential thing to do, all else would follow as a consequence. That conversion was merely a turning around, and obedience to the commands would produce salvation. The mainspring of it all was immersion. I could not so understand it. It seemed to me that there was something more than merely the consent of the mind; that a sinner must have applied to his soul and life a more powerful agency than his own will, with forms and ceremonies. All those things would appeal to the mind, but it was not enough to cleanse and enable him to stand. In all that he should do, I found him helpless, and it was by a complete surrender that he was enabled to discover the real help necessary; in fact, the only help out of a sinful state into a pure and happy state.

This was the condition of a real sinner, whose head had become gray in following after the world and all its fancy trumpery. This man repeatedly said in social meetings that the reconstruction he experienced was more potent and effectual than water baptism, and really claimed that he had received the baptism of the Holy Ghost, and that the blood of Christ cleansed him from all sin. In such declarations he was told that it was not in harmony with the church, and that he was professing too much, indeed, boasting that he had something more than his brethren and sisters were favored with, and that the Lord was no respecter of persons. In reply, he said that it was for all, and there was no call for any one to feed on the husks, that divine grace was inexhaustible, and that whosoever would hunger and thirst after righteousness should be filled.

He was reminded again that the church of which he was a member, did not believe in Christian perfection, and that no man or woman could live without committing sin. Well, then, if that be true, what is the use to try? So you see, dear Brother Garrison, that man could not do any good among his professed friends. Now, he claimed that instead of being exercised over keeping his religion, he feels that he must have a religion that will keep him—and that is the only kind that is worth a nickel. Walking in the light, overshadowed and enveloped in the very presence of the Holy Spirit, he knows for himself, and not for another, that there is a divine reality in a religious experience that is dearer to him than all the world. And so long as he is in that pathway he feels comfortable and safe, and he must be on his guard and not lose it. This man asks you to tell him, "How About It?" Must he remain in the church and be a firebrand? Yours,

LEROY CLENDENNIN.

LeRoy, McLean Co., Ills., July 16, 1898.

Canada Christian Colony.

Many inquiries have come to me respecting the Christian Colony on Rainy River, the advantages and disadvantages of this region, etc.

My name has been frequently qouted as that of one who is identified with this country. These two reasons, together with the desire that those who contemplate coming here may know something more of this country than I knew when I moved here, lead me to say a few words relative to the darker side of life here.

There are three great drawbacks here. The first is the inaccessibility of the region. Rat Portage on the Canadian Pacific is 125 miles away. Tower, Minnesota, is the nearest railroad point, but is sixty miles distant. It takes two days and about ten dollars to get there. We have numerous railroads coming in on paper. It is probable that one will be actually completed to Fort Francis, thirty miles up the river from here, by the end of 1899; but even that is not certain. We are simply taking our chances on that.

A worse drawback than the absence of quick communication by rail is in the impassable condition of the roads in summer. Impassable is the only word which will honestly describe these roads. I had to bring my team and wagon from Rat Portage here by water.

There has not been a day since my arrival that I could haul the empty wagon to Emo, our nearest village. This has been the condition since frost left the ground, and will be the condition until winter brings us solid foundations for hauling again. This is an almost intolerable burden to those who are accustomed to good roads in summer. And with from four to five feet of muskeg, or swamp and moss combined, and no drainage in places, this condition will not be materially altered for years. Hauling must be done in winter; lumber, firewood, etc. This is not poetry; it is the rugged truth; and those who contemplate coming here ought to know beforehand the whole truth on so important a matter to the new settler. I do not think that in a generation from now the summer roads here can compare with those of Central Illinois.

But the most afflicting drawback and one which approaches in its burdensomeness to the plagues of Egypt is that of the flies, to which reference is indeed made in the government documents, but so briefly and mildly made that I, for one, never formed the faintest conception of the awful scourge which is suggested, but not described, by the statement that the flies are bad for about six weeks in summer. It would have been only fair to the prospective settler to have told him that for weeks at a time a team cannot be worked more than an hour or two in the early morning or late at night.

He ought to have known before coming here that he must have dark rooms into which his frenzied cattle may rush at the first attack of the terrible "bulldogs," as the large horse-flies are here called. It is hardly enough to tell him that all sensible men expect flies to be bad in new countries. I was in Illinois a third of a century ago, when it was a new country. Since then I have been in other new countries. But this is the first time I have ever seen cattle and people so tormented by these truly infernal pests.

There are advantages here which in the judgment of many, myself included, outweigh these grave disadvantages; but it is not fair to the prospective settler to tell him only the bright side and leave him to find out for himself, after expending his little all, the darker side. I have not now, nor have I had at anytime, any pecuniary interest in what I have said or written about this region. I am not a government agent as some suppose. I am not in the slighest degree connected with any colonization scheme here or elsewhere. I have spent hundreds of dollars of hard-earned money in investigating this country, and in moving my family here, as well as in making an investment here. I have bought a beautiful river front farm, partly improved. This is what the wisest of those who will remain here are doing. Let those interested, ponder these words, and if they come do, so with a better understanding of the situation than I could gain by my trip in the winter which I enjoyed so much. After setting forth these drawbacks it is but fair to say that the older settlers here unite in saying that the autumns are fine and dry; while the winters, though cold, are dry and bracing. It is in these seasons that the hauling, etc., are done. If bad roads must obtain a part of the year, I am not sure but that I would rather have them in summer than in winter; for good roads in winter mean clearing of forests, hauling of wood, hay, etc. But "let every one be fully persuaded in his own mind."

Sincerely, and in the interest of truth,
Yours fraternally, A. P. COBB.

A New Work.

Since Bro. Atkinson has been compelled to lay down the laboring oar of the Ministerial Aid Association, some of his work has devolved upon me, and I wish in a few sentences, to take my brethren into my confience and say a few things to them.

I have never known much of the specific working of this association, though I have long known that in this attempt to restore apostolic practice that it is an application, in some measure, of that higher and better fellowship that "feeds the hungry, clothes the naked and visits the sick" in their distress. Since I have come in connection with this work I have been permitted to read the correspondence between the board and their beneficiaries, and I feel that no one could read these lines from these venerable men and women without being aroused to some thought of duty. I have just received the letters containing the receipts of the July allowances, and I want to give a few of them as specimens:

One venerable sister died before she had sent receipt, and a friend in sending account of her death says:

"Your gift was instrumental in smoothing her pathway to the grave. Her gratitude was unbounded."

Another old brother says:

"Yours most gratefully received. I am eighty-five years old; began preaching in 1836. I have no comfort like that of the love and kindness of my brethren."

Another says:

"I am grateful for your favor. It is indeed a substantial favor to me and my old helpless wife just now. God bless you."

A venerable mother in Israel whose husband was for forty years known to the Disciples in Illinois writes:

"I want to express many thanks for your help and may God bless those who have not forgotten the Lord's poor ones."

Another old sister, widow of a devoted preacher, writes:

"The money you have sent me has been such a relief to me. Without it I do not know what I would have done."

I could fill a whole page with such expressions from the correspondence I found in the office, but surely these are enough to incite a thought in the minds of those who read it as to the duty they have in helping forward this work. Don't forget to send a contribution, however small, to Howard Cale, 120 E. Market St., Indianapolis, and help forward this good cause. D. R. LUCAS.

Evangelistic.

ILLINOIS.

Eureka.—There were two confessions at prayer-meeting last week; a gentleman and his wife.—J. G. WAGONER.

Shelbyville, July 26.—One more addition to the church at Palmyra at my regular appointment last Lord's Day. My work there is being blessed.—A. M. COLLINS.

MONTANA.

Missoula, July 27.—Four baptisms here since last report.—J. C. B. STIVERS.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Worcester.—July 25.—Tent meeting opens nicely. Six additions since July 17th. Audiences average about 400. Order and attention good; interest on increase, prospects good.—ROLAND H. NICHOLS, Pastor.

Everett, July 28.—Had two additions to church last Lord's Day.—R. H. BOLTON.

OHIO.

Ashtabula, July 22.—Seven added here on the last two Lord's Days.—ROBERT SELLERS.

TENNESSEE.

Clarksville.—Two accessions July 26, to Church of Christ, by baptism.—A. M. GROWDEN.

INDIANA.

Indianapolis, July 25.—At the North Park Church; three additions.—J. M. CANFELD.

ARKANSAS.

De Queen, July 27.—Our meeting at Meva closed with 64 additions. We desire to continue in Arkansas. Our permanent address is Amity, Ark.—ARTHUR W. JONES, J. W. IRELAND.

Eureka Springs, July 28.—Two baptisms not reported.—DAVID TRUNDELL, Pastor.

Drake's Creek, July 21.—To-day I closed a week's meeting at this place with 25 confessions and five added otherwise. My debate with Elder A. Bertram, (Baptist) at Clear Fork Church, near Albany, Ky., begins Aug. 26, and the Zachary-Smith debate in Albany, Ky., will begin Aug. 29th and continue six days.—JAMES W. ZACHARY.

NEBRASKA.

Broken Bow, July 31.—Additions for year just closed 26; present membership 148. Never before were the members so encouraged as at present. Our audiences are the largest of any in the city, there being nine organizations. During the last year the attendance has been doubled, the church building painted, new chairs, paper and furnace purchased, etc. The writer has remained here longer than any minister for the past eight years. Many reflections have been cast at our town and even the church, but the past year's labor has been by far the happiest and most agreeable of my life. Our people are gradually gaining a prestige in our city and God has abundantly blessed our labors. I begin my second year's ministry, Aug. 1st, with high expectations.—JESSE R. TEAGARDEN, Pastor.

ALABAMA.

Selma, July 22.—Have just closed a 10 days' meeting at Richmond, with nine additions; eight by baptism.—E. V. SPICER.

ARKANSAS.

W. T. Brooks, late of Lexington, Ky., now of Ladoga, Ind., is in a meeting at Hamburg, Ark. We have no church organization at that point.

KANSAS.

Washington, July 27.—From October, 1897, to July, 1898, during my pastorate, 29 additions to the church; eight at outside points. I would like to locate as pastor elsewhere, Sep. 1st.—A. A. ARTHUR, Minister.

KENTUCKY.

Louisville, July 21.—S. M. Bernard is enjoying the work with the Parkland Church; 19 additions there lately.

MISSOURI.

St. Louis, July 30.—Five additions at the Fifth Church since last report.—W. F. HAMAN, Pastor.

St. Louis, July 30.—Two additions at the Second Church since last report.—BRUCE WOLVERTON, Pastor.

Rolla, July 25.—Eld. J. D. Greer, of Mexico, Mo., has just closed a three weeks' meeting at this place resulting in 13 accessions, and the church spiritually strengthened. May the good work continue.—R. B. HAVENER, Pastor.

Sturgeon, July 26.—We closed our meeting in this town last night. There were 73 additions to the church; 56 by confession and baptism, and 17 otherwise.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Nashville, July 25.—Great interest, large audiences, 12 additions. Many more interested. Bro. W. W. Warren preaches here part of the time, and is greatly loved by his people.—MORGANS AND DAUGHTER.

Marceline, July 25.—Had two additions yesterday, 8 since last report; 49 since Jan. 1st.—ISOM ROBERTS.

ORGANIC EVOLUTION CONSIDERED. By Alfred Fairhurst, A. M. Published by the Christian Publishing Co., 1522 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo. Price, cloth, $1.50, 386 pages.

I have just finished reading, under rather unfavorable circumstances, the late work of Prof. A. Fairhurst, entitled, "Organic Evolution Considered." The principal object of the work is to show that the theory of evolution, as held by Darwin and others, especially as to the doctrine of natural selection and the origin of species, is not sustained by the facts.

Though the author, in his first chapters, introduces subjects which at first glance might not appear to have a direct bearing upon the discussion, it is soon made apparent that the treatment of them was necessary to the full understanding of the objections urged against Darwin's theory. It was necessary, for example, to discuss the ordinary forms and proprieties of matter, to see its possibilities and to compare them with what are regarded as functions of mind.

The author then discusses, also, at some length, that form of matter or medium of force transmission known as the cosmic ether. It might appear to some that this reference might not be necessary, or at least available, but if the views of Haeckel are of any note, and of others inclined to give to matter in some form a potency to which it can lay no claims, the propriety of the discussion becomes apparent. Haeckel, for example, says that "religion itself, in its reasonable forms, can take over the ether theory as an article of faith, bringing into contradistinction the mobile cosmic ether as creating divinity and inert matter as the material of creation."

Now, this is unscientific vagary, and any one would suppose he had taken an overdose of absinthe, and in his exaltation of genius, gone around the world kicking up his iconoclastic heels to knock from their pedestals all of the denominational dogmas of the schools.

The professor, therefore, does well to discuss so thoroughly the properties of different forms of matter as being pertinent to the discussion, and of course the ether, the existence of which, he says, "is now admitted by the scientific world."

Its existence was surmised by Faraday, who had reason to believe, that light, electricity and magnetism were simply forms of manifestations of one force or energy which led Heinrich Hertz in 1888 to experiments that seemed to place the existence of such a medium beyond mere hypothesis.

When, however, we come to the main topic, the discussion of the theory of natural selection, for which so much is claimed, and the dependent question of the origin of species, the facts and the arguments based upon them, and the difficulties brought to view by the common sense and and originality of the author, it becomes evident that the theory of progressive organic evolution, eventuating in distinct species, is not sufficiently inclusive of the facts in the case.

On this particular branch of the subject, involving the important question of the origin of man, bearing directly upon the doctrines of the church, the professor has met the arguments advanced in support of the theory of evolution, derived from the doctrine of natural selection, from paleontology, from the existence of rudimentary organs, and from embryology with an array of difficulties, to be met and overcome, that will be seen to be formidable.

In all these divisions of his subjects, facts are given in great number, which militate against theory, and the arguments derived from them are presented with great skill.

He shows that in the geological records there are so many breaks that it is next to impossible to find any trustworthy evidence of a progressive evolution by gradual differentiation, and that the missing links, so necessary, have to be assumed hypothetically in support of the theory. In fact, one specific hypothesis after another is advanced to account for difficulties that rise up at many points.

The work being so full of scientific facts, educed to support conclusions drawn from them, their possession affords to the reader ampler opportunity to follow out his own line of thought in reasoning from them and at the same time to grasp with more ease the line of argument of the text.

The chapters on design and on agnosticism, in which the author enters the domain of philosophy and theology as well, are full of illustrations in the first case and of strong points in the latter. He gives more proofs of design from his particular branches of study than I have ever met. The agnosticism of Herbert Spencer is fully discussed, and the author shows that nature is too full of the evidences of a first intelligent cause possessing various attributes, to be relegated to the region of simply an unknowable mystery either as an object of thought or of worship.

But to be appreciated the work must be read. To thinking people it will contain enough suggestions of different lines of thought to keep their minds occupied long enough to afford something of an education, and certainly the great number of scientific facts referred to, and especially those derived from the natural history of organisms with their wonderful instincts and developments, make the work valuable even as a partial text book. "THE TWENTIETH CENTURY CITY" is a book of a hundred and eighty pages by the Rev. Josiah Strong, D. D., until recently, and for a number of years, General Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance for the United States. Dr. Strong is well-known as the author of two volumes entitled, "Our Country" and "The New Era." "The Twentieth Century City" is published by The Baker & Taylor Co., Nos. 5 and 7 East Sixteenth Street, New York. The price in cloth is fifty cents, in paper, twenty-five.

Dr. Strong attempts, in this book, both a diagnosis and a prescription. He attempts to show the essential character of modern civilization—its weakness and its peril. He suggests a remedy which, to say the least, seems to be reasonable. Experiment alone will demonstrate the practibility and effectiveness of the suggestions.

The book is divided into eight chapters. In the first the author writes about "The Materialism of Modern Civilization." In the second he writes about "A Nation of Cities." The phenomenal growth of cities in the present century is pointed out and reasons for this are given. This is not a peculiarity of the United States; it belongs to the world. In chapter third, Dr. Strong claims that our moral growth, especially in cities, has not kept pace with our material progress, and that a materialistic city is a menace to itself and so to the life of the nation. Following the statement that our moral growth has not kept pace with our material progress, place a large interrogation point. There can be no doubt that a materialistic city is a menace to itself and to the life of the nation. Our peril is still farther and more fully presented in the fourth chapter. One-half of the book is occupied with this diagnosis. There is a tinge of pessimism in these chapters, a feature, by the way, of almost all that Dr. Strong writes—a feature that is not pleasant. Of course, he protests that he is not a pessimist, and such, in the full sense of the word, he is not. Dr. Strong is by no means destitute of hope. His desires are good, and his expectation is buoyant. He believes that finally the good will triumph over the evil.

His words on "The New Patrotism," or living for our country, rather than dying for it; "Twentieth Century Christianity," that is, the Christianity of Christ, and the "Twentieth Century Churches," have a tonic effect. "The Churches," he says, "must save society, or themselves perish." But the churches will not perish. Dr. Strong thinks that the "churches have not believed in the practibility of Christ's teachings," and to a degree this statement is correct. The thought, until quite recently, has not been entertained that the church owes a duty to society as well as to the individual. More and more the thought is taking possession of the church that it has a mission to society, and this is well. "The Twentieth Century Churches" will be more practical than are the nineteenth century churches. This is a cheering thought. But the churches must not forget, nor neglect, the individual. It is by the salvation of the individual from his personal sins that society is to be made alive to holiness.

Dr. Strong, in that book, speaks of "The gospel of the kingdom," as if it is the good news that the Christ now commands his people to proclaim to the whole creation. A careful study of the expression, as it is used in the New Testament, will show that this interpretation is destitute of a substantial foundation.

The author attempts also an impossibility when he endeavors to find, as he says, an "important distinction between the church and the kingdom." The church, viewed from above, is the kingdom, the kingdom of God, the kingdom of Christ, the kingdom of heaven. This kingdom, seen from below, is the church. This is the only distinction that exists in the New Testament teaching between the church and the kingdom.

"The Twentieth Century City" is a good book. It is well worth reading. If there is a man who can speak with authority concerning the city, that man is Dr. Josiah Strong. He has been for many years a patient and diligent student of the city as a problem in our modern civilization.

Especial attention is called to chapters V., VI., VII. and VIII., in which Dr.

Strong considers the remedies for existing conditions so far as they are what they ought not to be. B. B. T.

MAGAZINES.

Extensive improvements are to be made in the printing plant and in all departments of Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly this fall.

The August or "Summer" number of the Pall Mall Magazine is an enlarged one, and contains a long and unusually attractive table of contents.

An important feature of the August Chautauquan is a strong article by Rev. Anna Howard Shaw on "Women in the Ministry," in which she says that women not only must equal, but they must excel, men in the ministry before they will be recognized. The article is well-written, and shows portraits of some of the prominent women of the profession.

The readers of the Woman's Home Companion for August will find many stories and articles of unusual interest.

"The On Timer's Tribe" is the name of a new magazine published monthly at Denver, Colorado, "in the interest of punctuality."

Higgie & Company, Glasgow, Scotland, have prepared some handbooks on the health and pleasure resorts of Scotland, together with much other interesting and valuable information for tourists and others.

The midsummer number of St. Nicholas is full of seasonable and timely articles. It opens with a story of the navy, "Margery and the Captain," by Anna A. Rogers. Mr. E. B. Rogers, U. S. N., contributes an article on "Big Guns and Armor of Our Navy," telling about the weapons of offense and the means of defense, which are so much in evidence these days. Mr. Rogers describes in brief the manner of making and testing guns and armor and gives an account of the first time that a monster thirteen-inch cannon was fired in America.

The August number of The Century has a number of features of special timeliness, notwithstanding which the endeavor has been made to keep up The Century's standard in engraving and printing. Mrs. Mary Bradford Crowninshield writes a striking romance of a Spanish-American dictator, the title of her story being "Sangre de Cristo." Frederick A. Ober, late commissioner in Porto Rico for the Columbian Exposition, contributes a paper on "The Island of Porto Rico," in which he describes the characteristics of the land and the people, and tells of the vast resources of the island. Osgood Welsh, an American sugar-grower, brings out new facts in "Cuba as Seen from the Inside." Both of these articles are fully illustrated. Walter Russell gives the impressions of "An Artist with Admiral Sampson's Fleet," with sketches from nature of bombardments and the capture of prizes. Surgeon-General George M. Sternberg, of the United States Army, discusses "The Sanitary Regeneration of Havana." Dr. Sternberg believes it is possible to stamp out yellow fever and other epidemic diseases, but that the task will be one of great magnitude and expense.

For Alcoholism
Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. P. P. GILMARTIN, Detroit, Mich., says: "It is very satisfactory in its effects, notably in the prostration attendant upon alcoholism."

FACTS AND FACTORS.

Lieut. S. F. Massey, U. S. A., of Sandusky, O., has been appointed agent by the War Department to superintend the transportation to Spain of the prisoners of war recently surrendered to Gen. Shafter.

The steamer Charles Nelson arrived at Seattle, Wash., July 25th, from St. Michael's with 173 passengers from Dawson and gold dust estimated all the way from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000.

It has been calculated that ordinary gunpowder on exploding expands about 9,000 times, or fills a space this much larger as a gas than when in solid form. The expansion of water into steam is 1,700 times its bulk.

The personal property assessment of Iowa fell off between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000 in 1898 as compared with 1897. The principal decrease is in the items of furniture, live stock and merchandise.

A violent shock of earthquake, lasting a minute, was felt July 24th at Concepcion, capital of the Chilean province of that name, and at Taloahuano, on the Bay of Concepcion, eight miles distant from Concepcion City, Chili.

The statement is made that the population of Spain is about 17,000,000; that of these 8,000,000 could not write; that 6,000,000 could neither read nor write, and that about one-half of the whole have no sure paying occupation.

The whalers imprisoned by ice at Point Barrows are now beyond reach of want. The government overland expedition, under command of Lieut. Jarvis, of the Bear, reached its destination March 29th, having traveled 1,500 miles over a country stream, with obstacles. The expedition left Cape Vancouver Dec. 17th, 1897.

Twenty bags of mail were seized at the Santiago postoffice on the day of the American occupation. It consisted of Spanish official and private correspondence. The Spanish customs authorities asked to have the mail bags turned over to them, but the request was refused, and the matter was sent to New York by the steamer Concho.

Carroll College, Waukesha, Wis., has received from Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Voorhees, of New Jersey, a donation of $50,000 on condition that $50,000 more be secured by Oct. 1st, and that $70,000 of the total sum be set apart as an endowment, the remainder to be expended for building and equipment. President Walter L. Ranking has received pledges of $6,000 toward the remaining $50,000.

The powder mill of E. T. Johnson, at Troy, Pa., was blown up, July 28th, and the owner, who was also the paying teller in the Pomeroy and Mitchell Bank, was killed.

Gen. Shafter reported 4,122 soldiers sick at Santiago, on the 27th of July; 542 of the sick have recovered and returned to duty.

A statement of the condition of the treasury, July 29th showed available cash balance, $262,758,062: gold reserve, $189,474,535.

Habit-Making and Habit-Breaking.

"How shall I a habit break?"
As you did that habit make.
As you gathered, you must lose;
As you yielded, now refuse,
Thread by thread the strand we twist
Till they bind us neck and wrist,
Thread by thread the patient hand
Must untwine, ere free we stand;
As we builded stone by stone,
We must toil, unhelped, alone,
Till the wall is overthrown.

But remember, as we try,
Lighter every task goes by;
Wading in, the stream grows deep
Toward the centre's downward sweep;
Backward turn, each step ashore
Shallower is than that before.

Ah! the precious years we waste
Leveling what we raised in haste;
Doing what must be undone
Ere content or love be won!
First, across the gulf we cast
Kite-borne threads, till lines are passed,
And habit builds the bridge at last.

Only a Fisherman's Son.

BY ALFRED BRUNK.

CHAPTER I.

"No, Ethie, I tell you I won't put up with it any longer. You are fifteen years old and it is time for you to quit all such foolishness and go to work and help make a livin'."

"Well, but pa, you know you said—"

"No matter what I said, you good for nothin' whelp. You have never earned your salt. Go 'long now, and if I ever see you makin' another picture I will whip you within an inch of your life, just as sure as your name is Ethan Langdon," and with this, Lewis Langdon stalked into the house, while his son, Ethan, a fair-haired, freckle-faced boy, started slowly and with hesitating footsteps toward the fishing boat.

"Now, Paulie," said Mr. Langdon to his wife, "I won't have any more of Ethie's foolishness. You make him ten times worse than he would be, with all your pettin' and goin' on. But I'm agoin' to break him of it, if I have to break his neck." His face was livid with wrath and he trembled with indignation.

"No, Lewis," said his wife timidly, "I have not petted him. I have my hands too full with the young ones to pet anybody. I tell him that he ought to help make the living."

"Yes, and he shall do it. I can just talk my eyes out and it don't do no good, but I'll fix him as sure as my name is Lewis Langdon. Where's the lunch? A pretty time of day to get started. We won't get no fish this time, I can tell you."

His wife handed him the lunch bucket, and he strode out of the house with a heavy step, and walked down the path to the river. Mr. Langdon looked at his son angrily, with a set determination depicted on his countenance, while Ethan drew himself as far as possible away from his enraged parent.

Many years before, when Stephen Brown was a reporter for one of the large New York papers, he had been sent on an important expedition to Italy, where he had fallen in love with beautiful, accomplished Maria Caponi, whose father was a wealthy citizen of Florence. The old gentleman violently opposed the attentions of the young stranger, threatening to disinherit Maria if she married him. This only added fuel to the flame they called love, and although her father gave them repeated warnings, the young couple were married and went to Naples, where Maria had an uncle, her mother's brother, who gladly opened his doors to them. After a year of wedded bliss, a daughter came to share life's responsibilities with them, whom they named Paulina. When Paulina was six months old, Mr. Brown was recalled to New York, and they left Italy, Mr. Caponi positively refusing to see his daughter or granddaughter. When the gold excitement spread throughout the country, Mr. Brown severed his connection with the New York paper, and with his wife and child went to California. He was not successful in the mines, so going into the valley, he purchased a farm near the Sacramento River, a few miles south of Butte City. Paulina grew up in comparative ignorance, her mother having but a slight acquaintance with the English language, and feeling that any other education would be useless in the Wild West. When Paulina was eighteen, Lewis Langdon came "a sparkin', " and while he was coarse and ignorant, yet he was strong of limb and capable of many a hard day's work. As for Paulina, she also was unlearned, and as cultivated young men were scarce in that neighborhood, her parents consented to their marriage. Almost immediately after that event, Mr. Langdon moved to a little house situated upon the east bank of the Sacramento River, and began fishing for a living. The following summer a fair-featured, blue-eyed boy came to brighten their home, and they called him Ethan. Shortly after this, Mr. Brown, wornout with his many disappointments passed away from earthly scenes. Mrs. Brown, having already learned that the manners of her son-in-law were revolting to her sense of decency and propriety, refused their offer of a home with them, and rented her farm to a middle-aged couple who had no children, she continuing to occupy a portion of the farm-house. When Mr. Langdon had offered to share his home with his wife's mother, he hoped she would invite them to move into the farm-house and take charge of the farm. When she had politely, but firmly, rejected his offer and rented her place to another, he declared she should never set her foot in his house again, which she never did. While he did not positively forbid his wife to visit her mother, he was so cross and surly when she did go, that she very rarely went. Mrs. Brown loved Ethan very dearly and had asked his parents to let him stay with her, but her request seemed to make Mr. Langdon more furious than ever. Ethan was a bright boy and learned his lessons readily when he had been permitted to attend school.

One day, while he was attending the district school near his home, the teacher, who had no appreciation of Ethan's capabilities, sent a note to Ethan's father, stating that while he always had his lessons, yet he spent too much time making pictures on his slate. At this, Mr. Langdon gave Ethan a very severe whipping and took him out of school, declaring that if he was too lazy to study, he would put him at a task where he would be compelled to work.

Ethan continued, however, to make pictures whenever opportunity offered. He had drawn some on the fence near the house, but being severely punished for it, he sought other material for his handiwork. Mary Smith, a black-eyed girl living in the community, was a perfect angel in Ethan's eyes, but that most worthy damsel made merry over the awkward boy's well-meant attentions.

Never mind, Mary, your day is coming.

Ethan and his father had been out in the boat about two hours, when Ethan looked down the river and saw a pleasure boat coming toward them. It was a small steamboat and was the prettiest he had ever seen.

"Look, pa! What a fine boat," he exclaimed, forgetting for the moment his father's anger.

"You tend to your business or I'll fine-boat you," said his father, whose anger now burst forth beyond control, and picking up a piece of iron which lay at his feet, he hurled it at the boy with all his strength. Ethan quickly noted his father's actions, and dodged just as the missile whizzed past his head and splashed into the water behind him.

"Ahoy, there, and reef your sails," said a pleasant voice just down the river, and Ethan and his father looked up. The little boat had come up and was within a few feet of them. "Have you any fish aboard?" said the man who was standing by the railing of the little pleasure craft. "My daughter says she must have some fish," and as he spoke he turned toward a delicate-looking girl who was standing by his side. She appeared to be about sixteen years of age, and while not actually ill, her colorless complexion showed that she had but a feeble hold upon life. Ethan mentally compared her with Mary Smith, and it is safe to say that Mary gained nothing by the comparison.

"Well," said Mr. Langdon, "I ain't had much luck, but I've got some cats and a few 'scalers.' " The gentleman bought a few fish and then invited Mr. Langdon and Ethan to come up and look at his craft, which they did, Ethan blushing scarlet as he looked at his patched clothes and bare feet. "Henderson is my name, Dr. Henderson they call me in Sacramento," said the man, and this is my daughter, Ethel. And your name is—"

"Langdon," said Ethan's father, "Lewis Langdon, the fisherman, everybody calls me. And this is my boy, Ethan, the laziest, most good-for-nothin' boy around here." As he said this he scowled at Ethan in so fierce a manner that he involuntarily drew back a few steps.

"You don't say so?" said Dr. Henderson, looking at Ethan. "He looks like a bright enough boy."

"Oh, he's bright enough, just lazy. His mother's people are Italian and I expect he has got some of their fool notions."

"Come, Mr. Langdon, and look at her engines," said Dr. Henderson. "Ethel, you and Ethan can stand guard while we go below," and the two men disappeared.

Ethan now looked at his shabby clothes. Ethel had seen his father's cruel act and she sincerely pitied this bashful, blushing boy. "Surely," thought she, "if any one was ever ground under the iron heel of oppression this boy is."

He glanced shyly at her. "She is a regular angel," thought he. At least he said afterward that he thought so, but it is doubtful whether in the confusion of that moment he thought at all.

"Do you like fishing?" she asked finally. Why should he tell a lie to that fair being, and tell her that he did like fishing? Why should he tell her the truth and have her pity him? But she had asked a direct question, he would give her a direct answer.

"No, I don't like it," and his face flushed with shame and mortification as he spoke. She noticed it, and asked gently:

"What would you like to do?"

Again he hesitated. How could he tell her the desire that was consuming his young life. Would not she laugh at him as all his acquaintances did? Yes, even Mary Smith laughed at him and called him a fool. But he would tell her the truth. Everybody thought he was crazy and she would think so, too, but he must tell her. "I want to make pictures," said he confusedly. She was surprised. She knew that he was out of harmony with his surroundings, but she had not thought of this.

"Come, Ethan, we have wasted time enough here," said his father, and they went to their own boat.

"Papa," said Ethel, as they went on up the river, "that boy is very unhappy."

"Well, well, my daughter, the world is full of unhappy people. Even my own peach-blossom has her unhappy days, and I am not sure but this is one of them. Alack, and hey-day! Don't be so pensive, Ethel."

"Now, papa, you are playing," said the girl, seriously. If that boy is permitted to stay where he is his life will be ruined. His father is repulsive and brutal, and he confessed to me that he abhorred fishing. Not because it is a dishonorable business, but because he wishes to be a painter."

"A painter!" and the doctor gave a long whistle. "A painter from the fishing-smacks of the Sacramento!" Why, Ethel, you are sentimental to-day."

"Papa, don't you remember that his father called him lazy and good-for-nothing and that his mother's people were Italian, and that he feared he had gotten some of their fool notions? Now, don't you know, papa, that no other people in the world can paint as the Italians can?"

"Why, that is true enough of some Italians," answered Dr. Henderson, "but for all that, not every Italian who is dissatisfied with his work, would make a good painter."

"Certainly not, papa, but when anybody has the intelligent look of that fisherman's son, no matter of what nationality he is, he ought to be given a chance to develop himself."

"So he should, my child, so he should," said her father, "and when we go back down the river, we will have a talk with him, and see whether he seems to have any talent."

But when a few hours later, they came to the place where they had seen the fisherman and his son, no sign of them or their boat could they see anywhere. And after scanning the river up and down, and from bank to bank they regretfully gave up the search and continued their homeward journey.

CHAPTER II.

The next two years were very hard ones for Ethan. His father became more and more severe with him, his mother dared not interfere in his behalf, and all the young people laughed at what they termed his "fool notions." He had tried two or three times to keep company with Mary Smith, but that young lady only held him up to further ridicule. It was not often that he could see his grandmother, Mrs. Brown. One afternoon, when his father was laid up with rheumatism, he stole out from the house and going to the river, took out one of the little boats and went to see her. She lived about three miles further up the river. and was always much pleased to have him come. He told her his troubles fully and freely. "Never mind, my boy, it will all come out right," she told him. "My uncle Bartolini Caponi was a noted painter in Italy. Some way will be opened to you, my dear son, so don't despair." His grandmother's words gave him great encouragement and he went home feeling more hopeful than he had for many a day. The next day "Shady" Merton, a young neighbor of the Langdons, was assisting Ethan with his work, as Mr. Langdon was unable to be out.

There, papa, as sure as I live, that's Ethan Langdon," said Ethel Henderson a few hours after the young men had gone to the river. "Now, papa, I want you to speak to him."

"So I will, my child, so I will," replied Dr. Henderson. Ethan and "Shady" had noticed the boat and bowed to the gentleman and lady whom Ethan recognized at once.

"Hello, Ethan, how are you?" called out the doctor. "Shady" looked on in surprise. That Ethan had an acquaintance, even though so slight, with such fine people as those in the other boat, he had never imagined possible.

"Come up, Mr. Langdon, and tell us how you are," said Dr. Henderson.

Ethan looked around quickly at these words, thinking for the moment that they had been addressed to his father. Then realizing that he was meant, he nervously ascended into the other boat.

"Come around on this side" said the doctor, leading him away where they would be out of sight and hearing of "Shady" Merton.

"Didn't you call that young man "Shady," just now?" he asked of Ethan. "That's a queer name, isn't it?"

"Yes, sir, said Ethan, "but I don't know what it means. Some say that he will steal, though, when he gets a chance."

"Ah, yes, that explains it, I have no doubt. Now, Ethan," continued Dr. Henderson, "my daughter tells me that when she saw you before, you were very much dissatisfied with your occupation. Is that so?"

Ethan glanced at Ethel. She had grown somewhat larger, but seemed delicate as ever. Looking at the doctor he said, "Yes, sir." Then, half ashamed, he let his eyes rest upon the rippling waters of the river.

"And what do you wish to do?" asked Dr. Henderson, kindly.

"I want to make pictures, sir," replied Ethan, half apologetically, half defiantly.

"Have you much education?" asked the doctor looking at him intently.

"Some, but not much," replied Ethan bitterly. "I didn't get much chance to go to school."

"Where is your father?" asked the doctor.

"At home, sir, laid up with rheumatis," said Ethan.

Inquiring of Ethan the way, he told the pilot where he wished to go, and soon they were at the landing near Ethan's home. Bidding Ethan to remain on the boat with Ethel, the doctor walked up the path to the house. The children had seen him coming and had scampered away to the house to tell them that "a fine city chap was comin'."

Mrs. Langdon met him at the wide-open door and told him to "come in, if you can get in for the dirt." He walked in and found Mr. Langdon on a bed in one corner of the room.

"How do you do, Mr. Langdon?" said he, "I am sorry to see you afflicted like this."

"Oh, its nothin' but this everlastin' rheumatis," replied Mr. Langdon. "It bothers me a sight here lately. But how did you ever get in here?"

"I was coming up the river with my daughter, and we saw Ethan, and he told us you were laid up with rheumatism, so I thought I would run in and see you. I know doctors are not expected to call upon sick people until they are sent for, but I count you as one of my friends, and I couldn't let you lie here and suffer, when I have a medicine which I know will cure you. I am going to have you all right in less than a week, and you will never have rheumatism again."

"I wish to goodness, doctor, I could get somethin' to help me, for it not only hurts me mighty bad, but it keeps me from my work, which is my livin'."

"Yes, yes," said the doctor, fixing up some medicine, but we will stop all that pain and make a well man of you in a week's time. Here," he held the preparation to Mr. Langdon's lips, "take this," and the sick man swallowed it. After twisting his face into various shapes, and calling for water, he settled down in a few moments and declared that he felt better already.

"Mr. Langdon," said the doctor, drawing a chair up close to the bedside, and sitting down, "I want an office boy. Can you let Ethan go and stay with me?"

Had a large wave swept up from the river and filled the room in which they were sitting, Ethan's father and mother could not have been more astonished. The children slipped out of the room, ran down to the river and called out to Ethan that "the city chap was goin' to take him away," leaving that young man very much mystified.

"We can't spare Ethan," said his father, as soon as he had recovered himself sufficiently to speak, which was a very odd thing for Mr. Langdon to say, considering that Ethan was "a lazy good-for-nothin' whelp" who never earned his salt.

But some people do say some queer things sometimes.

"He hasn't any clothes fit to wear in the city," said Mrs. Langdon, a feeling of motherly pride welling up in her bosom, at the thought that this fine-looking gentleman wished to have her son.

"That could be easily remedied," said Dr. Henderson. "If you will permit me to express myself, I will tell you something which I think you ought to know."

"Say whatever you please, Dr. Henderson," said Mr. Langdon, whose pains were greatly lessened as a result of the medicine which the doctor had given him, and consequently he felt very grateful.

"Well, it is this," said Dr. Henderson. "Ethan is not a lazy boy. On the contrary, he is bright and active and very persistent, even when the greatest obstacles are placed in his way. Is it not so, Mr. Langdon?"

"If you mean that fool notion of his about makin' pictures, it is so, and all the worse for him," said Mr. Langdon, his anger rising.

"Exactly," said the doctor, and you can't make a fisherman of him, if you were to try it for fifty years. Not because he feels that he is too good for the business, or that it is beneath him, but because his thoughts are wholly filled with the desire to be a painter."

"Then if that is the case he would be of no use to you as an office boy," triumphantly replied Mr. Langdon. "If his wantin' to be a painter crowds out fishin', it would crowd out everything else. Hi, I've got you there, Mr. Doctor," and he chuckled, as he thought how he had worsted the doctor in argument.

"Not so, Mr. Langdon, and I will tell you why. He would go into my office understanding that it was a stepping-stone on the road to success. That it would give him a chance to visit the different collection of paintings in the city. That everything he saw and heard would be training his eye and ear for his future work. Then he would have the stimulus of kindred spirits. All this would strengthen him and he could and would work with ever-increasing energy and ambition toward the one great desire of his life, namely, to be a painter. But how is it here? If he could be made to feel that every day he spent in a fishing boat he was just that much better prepared to enter his life-work of painting, he would joyfully take up the work, for he would feel that the harder he worked at fishing the sooner he would become a painter. But he has had his desire to become a painter ridiculed, while fishing has been held up before him as the only thing worthy of his serious thought, until he has become disgusted with the whole fishing business."

Mr. Langdon was silent. The truth of Dr. Henderson's words burned into his mind, and he slowly, but surely, grasped the fact, that for years he had treated his first-born son with the most cruel injustice. Rising up in the bed he clasped the doctor's hand in his own, and while tears of penitence stood in his eyes, he said:

"Dr. Henderson, I am called a hard man, and I confess to you I'm not a saint. But I will say this day, that if some one had talked to me years ago as plain as you have just now, that my life might have been different. I see now that I have treated my own boy very wrong, when I thought all the time that he was a mistreatin' me and a feelin' above his father's business. But I see it all now, I see, I see," and he sank wearily back upon his pillow and drew the sheet up over his eyes, as if to shut out the dreadful sight.

Little Things Count.

Bookkeeping has been reduced to such an exact science in the big metropolitan banks that the clerks are expected to strike a correct balance at the close of each day's work, no matter if the transactions run into the millions of dollars. When the books fail to balance, the whole force of the bank is put to work to discover the error; and no clerk starts for home until it is discovered, whether it amounts to 2 cents or $2,000. Generally a quarter of an hour will bring the mistake to light; but sometimes the hunt is kept up until late in the night.

Such a search was being conducted in a New York bank, located in the vicinity of Wall Street. Forty-five cents were missing. At 6 o'clock, not a trace of the errant sum had been discovered. Dinner was sent in for the whole force from an adjoining restaurant, and, after half an hour's rest, the search was again taken up. Midnight came, but still no clew. So sandwiches and coffee were served.

"Hello!" said a clerk. "The National Bank people are working to-night, too. Guess they're in the same box."

TEN YEARS AGONY FROM ECZEMA

CURED BY CUTICURA

For ten years I suffered untold agonies from Eczema, my lower limbs being so swollen and broken out that I could hardly go about. My brother, a physician of thirty years' practice, and other physicians of splendid ability, tried in vain to effect a cure and signally failed. I became absolutely disheartened, and had lost all hope, when a friend induced me to give CUTICURA REMEDIES a trial. I used two cakes of CUTICURA SOAP and two boxes of CUTICURA (ointment), and it resulted in an absolute and permanent cure.

Sure enough, the windows of the bank across the street were brilliantly lighted. The incident was soon forgotten when the wearying hunt after the elusive 45 cents was resumed. Shortly after 1 o'clock in the morning, as they were about to give up for the night, a loud rapping was heard at the front door of the bank.

"Hello! hello! what's the matter?" called the cashier through the keyhole.

"Matter, you chumps! Why, we've got your old 45 cents! Come along home to bed!"

Outside stood the crowd of clerks from the neighboring bank. It appeared that, in making a cash transaction, one of the banks had paid the other 45 cents too much. As a result, half a hundred men had worked for nine hours, and the search was only ended then because a bright clerk, noticing the light in the bank opposite, shrewdly guessed the cause, hunted up the cash slip, and discovered the error.—Harper's Round Table.

King among men, a prince among the seers,
Sun-like, his soul illumined all the years;
Regal in purpose, stalwart in his aim,
Fire was his will, and his devotion flame;
Mourn, Britain, mourn, because his voice is stilled,
But proudly own his duty all fulfilled.

Champion of right, a bulwark of the free,
Facing the wind upon a troubled sea,
He leaped the foam and breasted every wave,
Till race oppressions dwindled to their grave;
Name me the man, and I will name the God
By whose starred shrine the saintly hero trod.

Stupendous pow'r, whose mem'ry is supreme,
His was no tangled issue of a dream;
Nay, from the fairest threads in life's long loom
He wove a stately fabric, as for doom;
Mourn, Britain, mourn, but keep his 'scutcheoned fame
Pure as the source from which his virtue came.

TEXT.—"Nor by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts."—Zech. 4:6.

SERMON.

The mill, on the bank of a great irrigating canal, where the farmers in the valley brought their grain to have it made into flour, was idle because there was an insufficient supply of water in the canal. The large turbine wheel that drove the machinery had ceased to revolve. Where was usually such noise and bluster and industry, now all was silent as the grave. The old mill stood with its machinery all intact, but motionless. The grain stood in the bins and elevators, but could not be converted into flour—there was no power—no water in the canal.

Softly the light, airy snowflakes fell upon the mountains until there was an accumulation of congealed vapor lying upon their granite tops and in their rocky gorges like soft ermine robes wrapped about the bodies of great giants lying fast asleep under the magic spell of their own mightiness. Every drop of water, in the form of ice and snow, on the mountains, where the frost king reigned, was so much "potential energy, that is, energy of position in relation to the work it was capable of performing," and represented an equal amount of actual force—power to produce motion, when properly applied. The old mill, realizing this, appealed to the north wind for assistance, so the wind blew fierce and cold on the mountains, and piled the snow in great heaps, and pushed it over the sides of deep canyons, and tossed it about from place to place until it was quite exhausted. But not a drop of water from the mountains reached the mill. In fact, the small volume of water in the canal decreased steadily from the time the north wind began to blow.

Seeing the mistake it had made, the mill then appealed for assistance to the sun. He smilingly, and with unassumed disinterestedness, consented at once to render the help asked for. So he began to pour his warm rays upon the ice and snow on the mountains, and to liberate the tiny drops of water there imprisoned, and to make their potential energy available for driving the machinery of the mill. Little rivulets began to trickle down the sides of the mountains, and, converging, formed larger streamlets, and these, as they sped on their way, became a river, from which water was diverted into the canal, the mill-wheels began to whir, and flour was manufactured to supply the hungry people with bread—the staff of life—and all was due to the fact that potential energy had been converted into actual force and properly applied.

APPLICATION.

The beneficent possibilities of human nature, like the potential energy of the snow on the mountains, is beyond the ability of man to measure when fully developed and properly directed. But this latent power for good cannot be made available by harsh means—"not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." It is the truth when preached in love, as directed by the Holy Spirit, that develops the potential powers of the human heart, and makes them available for good.

Strange Bible Facts.

The learned Prince of Granada, heir to the Spanish throne, imprisoned by order of the crown for fear he should aspire to the throne, was kept in solitary confinement in the old prison at the Place of Skulls, Madrid. After thirty-three years in this living tomb, death came to his release, and the following remarkable researches, taken from the Bible and marked with an old nail on the rough walls of his cell, told how the brain sought employment through the weary years:

In the Bible the word "Lord" is found 1,853 times.

The word "Jehovah" 6,855 times.

The word "reverend" but once, and that in the ninth 111th Psalm.

The eighth verse of the 97th Psalm is the middle verse of the Bible.

The ninth verse of the eighth chapter of Esther is the longest.

The thirty-fifth verse, eleventh chapter of St. John is the shortest.

In the 107th Psalm four verses are alike—the eighth, fifteenth, twenty-first and thirty-first.

Each verse of the 136th Psalm ends alike.

No names or words with more than six syllables are found in the Bible.

The thirty-seventh chapter of Isaiah and nineteenth chapter of Second Kings are alike.

The word "girl" occurs but once in the Bible, and that in the third verse, third chapter of Joel.

There are found in both books of the Bible, 3,538,483 letters; 773,693 words; 31,373 verses; 1,189 chapters and 66 books.

The twenty-sixth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles is the finest chapter to read.

The most beautiful chapter is the 23d Psalm.

The four most inspiring promises are John 14:2; 7:37; Matt. 9:28, and Psalm 37:4.

The first verse of the fifth chapter of Isaiah is the one for the new convert.

All who flatter themselves with vain boasting should read the sixth chapter of Matthew.

All humanity should learn the sixth chapter of St. Luke, from the twentieth verse to its ending.—Our Sunday Afternoon.

THE CHILD AT SHUNEM.*

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

Elisha has less of mystery in his character than his master. One is able to understand him better. He comes and goes continually on his tours from one center of prophetic activity to another. Carmel, Gilgal, Jericho, Samaria were places visited often by him, the last because it was the capital, where the prophet seems to have been held in high respect. He was a young man of enthusiasm, and the work left him by Elijah was great. He was of a genial and kindly nature, and drew the people to him as Elijah had never done. To be sure he was capable of sudden anger, as when he cursed the lads who ridiculed his tonsured head (2Kings 2:23-25), but he was held in such reverence by the people that his curse was popularly believed to have brought swift death to the offenders.

Among the friends he formed was a household at Shunem. The man was a landowner and evidently rich, and his wife a person of influence accordingly. She noted the prophet's frequent journeys past their home, and he accepted her repeated invitations to partake of their hospitality. She suggested to her husband the plan of making an additional chamber for Elisha's use; and soon this was done. A bed, a table, a stool and a candlestick completed its modest furnishings, and here the prophet regularly found rest, while his servant, Gahazi, was cared for without.

This "prophet's chamber," was a source of blessing to that household. How much of benediction has come to many a house in which a room is set apart to such ministries of hospitality! Those who can look back to a Christian home in which frequent visits of this kind were made by preachers of the gospel; when the meal times and the evenings were spent in conversation upon the highest themes of our holy faith, and where it was a joy to welcome the men and women who came, indeed like "angels unawares," have a treasure of memory that will be evermore precious to them. It may be feared that this old-fashioned grace of hospitality is too much neglected in these later days, as travel is more rapid and life more urgent. But is there not something lost in the change? They may well congratulate themselves whose homes were "the preachers' stopping-places," and whose fathers and mothers were saints of the old school, hospitable, charitable, lovers of the word of God.

And the blessing came to the household at Shunem. The prophet, who stood on good terms with the powers of the state, asked the woman if she desired introduction at court or advancement in rank. She modestly replied that she was content to dwell with her neighbor people of the village. Then Gahazi suggested that as they had no son, such a gift would be the greatest of blessings. No Hebrew family was content to be childless. Every woman looked forward longingly to motherhood, not alone as the discharge of a debt to her people, but as the fulfillment of her life's highest privilege. To be childless was the most dreaded of fates. We are realizing today that the duty and privilege of woman is not found in any one state of life. It is not wifehood or motherhood or spinsterhood, but womanhood that is needed. Nevertheless it is evident that the joy and pride, the culture and discipline, the responsibility and glory of motherhood are being evaded by too many women to-day, for fear that their social life may be hampered by these limitations. One can only look with sadness and pity on a home where there are no children, a sadness and pity the deeper if that condition is the result of deliberate choice.

When the promise of the child came to the Shunammite, she could not believe that the prophet was serious. Long years had left her hope behind. But the promise came true. The boy was born and grew to be a necessary element in that home. How much is added to the life of a family with the coming of the child! A new vision is opened, a new affection grows which strangely enough does not diminish, but deepens the old. A new schooling is begun in which the child is the teacher, and parents are the students. A new vision of God is disclosed, for the deepest meaning of his life is suggested by his fatherhood. It is a sad thing to lose a child; but it is a sadder thing not to have the experience of a parent, even if it does not last —and does it not last? Even if our own child does not abide with us, has not something entered our lives which cannot disappear, but makes us forever parental and tender to all orphaned and unloved children, teaching us that God never intended us to love only our own children, but all "his little ones?"

It was just this tragedy of death which swept into the little home at Shunem. The boy went to the fields to see the reapers, and fainting in the blaze of the harvest sun, called to his father, who, not perceiving the fatal character of the sunstroke, sent him by a servant to his mother. Upon her distress through the hours of that morning we are not to look. But at noon she took the little body to the chamber of the prophet, and feeling that even in her husband there was no help to call back the dead, she hastened to the man of God. To the inquiry of Gahazi as he met her, she would say nothing. Her message was not for the servant, but the master. Her prostration before Elisha, and her broken words told the story.

The prophet, unaware before of her trouble, thought that his servant might, perhaps, by the use of the prophetic rod, restore the child. But the woman would not leave till Elisha himself consented to go. Meantime the servant, bidden to make the utmost speed and to salute no one by the way, where salutations were so elaborate and lengthened, hastened to Shunem, only to fail. Returning, he met the mother and the prophet. As soon as the house was reached, Elisha shut himself into the room with the dead child, and then began a struggle between life and death. He was a man of God, a prophet of the Lord, but it was not for him to call back the dead with a word as Jesus was to do. More desperate was the contest. He threw himself upon the body, using all his vitality to warm it. Then walking to and fro to gain fresh warmth and power himself, he returned to the struggle. At last he seized the child in his arms and embraced him many times (see R. V. Margin) and at last the child came back to life. It was no easy task. The prophet had wrestled with death as with a monster of the forest and had conquered. The boy was given to his speechless and grateful mother, and a great miracle had been wrought in Israel.

SUGGESTIONS FOR TEACHING.

In our times of trouble it is only to God, and those who can speak for him, that it is worth while to go. In the midst of a busy life the prophet had time to attend to the trouble of a woman of Israel; has not God time for us? The appeal of the soul is always to the highest source of power; who should be satisfied with less than the best? It is better to have loved and lost than never to have had the object of love. When we are engaged in divine work we have no time for formalities or unnecessary trifles. Even so small a thing as a prophet's staff may at times be of mighty power. Why did Gahazi fail? Perhaps because of his own sordid nature, which was afterwards disclosed. The prophet's prayer was the first act in preparation for his struggle with death. It is only by contact that life can be given; this is as true to-day in social regeneration as then in the raising of the child.

Free Rheumatism Cure.

Trial Package Free to All—Send for It—Tell Your Suffering Friends That They Can First Test Before They Part With Their Money.

A Genuine Rheumatism Specific That Cures Rheumatism, No Matter if 20 Doctors Have Tried and Failed. It is a Marvelous Remedy.

Not a great doctor; not an eminent specialist; not a patent medicine man but just a plain every-day citizen of Milwaukee says that anyone who will send him their name and address can have absolutely free, a trial package of a remedy that cured him of rheumatism and has cured hundreds of others whose years of pain and suffering, helplessness and despair had well-nigh sent to an untimely grave. It is a subject of great interest. Rheumatism is a most merciless demon. It spares neither the God-fearing nor the infidel. Born of the devil, it seems to tantalize men's souls to see how much they can suffer and yet breathe the air that Providence filled with life.

N. H. Spafford, of Milton, Mass., sent for a free trial of Gloria Tonic. He had suffered for many years. At times the pain would ease up a little and fill his heart with thankfulness that perhaps life would not be such a burden after all. But no sooner would he rejoice than a sudden change of the weather would strike him another heartless twinge of pain, and so it went year after year. The free trial reached him during one of these periodic spells and gave him such relief that he continued the remedy and was completely cured. Mr. Smith, the discoverer of the remedy, was an invalid as a result of rheumatism, the disease affecting his feet. At times he could barely hobble about. He experimented with all sorts of drugs and by great good luck hit upon a combination that acted as a specific for the disease. At first he confined his efforts among those whom he personally knew, but in time the demand for his discovery became so great that he put the medicine up in regular form and has since sold it through the drugstores at $1.00 a box. But most people who suffer are convinced that there is no cure for rheumatism, and to offset this doubt Mr. Smith sends a trial package free that all may test it first and thus learn of its wonderful merit. Send your name and address to John A. Smith, 591 Summerfield Church Building, Milwaukee, Wis., and by return mail he will send prepaid a package of Gloria Tonic, a remedy that will cure any form of rheumatism, no matter how many doctors have tried and failed.

Scrofula, hip disease, salt rheum, dyspepsia and other diseases due to impure blood are cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla.

TOPIC FOR AUGUST 14.

EXALT CHRIST.

(Matt. 21:1-11.)

Jesus said: "I, if I be lifted up will draw all men unto me." How startlingly true that has proven! The attractive power of that life is greater than that of any other. And all the exaltation that is needed to bring men to his feet is simply the exaltation of uplifting. Let him once be lifted up to view, and it is sufficient to magnetize men.

Hence it was that Jesus' one great message to men was the cry "Follow me." He preached other things to be sure, but his principal message was to preach himself. His constant purpose was to fix men's attention on himself. When they began thinking of other men and other things, he would bring them back again to contemplation of himself. "What is that to thee, follow thou me." "I am the way, and the truth, and the life. He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." It was Jesus' own person that he constantly held up to view.

It is certainly striking that this egoism of the Master never becomes egotism. Perhaps there is nothing more offensive, generally, in a man's character than constant self-exaltation, and yet somehow this rule does not bear in Jesus' case. No man is ever repelled from Christ to-day because of his high claims for himself. This is convincing evidence of his supremacy and the justice of his assertions regarding himself. Even unbelievers seldom charge him with conceit. Is this not tacit evidence that his high claims are, even in the hearts of those who refuse to acknowledge him, justified? There is nothing repellant about Christ's egoism. The more he talks of himself, the more we draw closely to his feet, and look up into his eyes, as Mary did at Bethany, and hang upon his words.

Furthermore, Jesus does not tell us much about the mystery in which he was surrounded. He gave little ground for the spinning of theories regarding himself. He gave no system of theology about his person.

Perhaps this is the reason why there are so many different views of this marvelous, mysterious person. He never solved the mystery in so many words. He called attention to himself, and formulated no philosophical theories about himself. So the right attitude for us now, it seems, would be to exalt him, and let theories about him go.

"If Jesus Christ is a man,
And only a man, I say
That of all mankind I will cleave to him.
And to him I will cleave alway.
If Jesus Christ is a god,
And the only God, I swear
I will follow Him through heaven and hell,
The earth, the sea and the air."

This attitude of Richard Watson Gilder is the attitude, it appears, of our age. We are learning that we cannot penetrate the mystery of Christ's union with the Father, and that we ought to lift him up, himself, his person, his beauty, his strength, his purity, his divinity and behold him.

It is in this that Christianity is destined to triumph over all other religions, that it is the religion of a person. As long as we are true to that person and do not wander from him, we shall go on to the conquest of the world. It is in times when the church has been true to Christ that it has advanced. It was when the little band at Antioch became known as Christians that they began to grow. It was because Paul preached Christ that he won the Pretorium and the Roman world. On the other hand, it was when certain modern religious bodies forsook the exaltation of Christ and preached philosophy that they grew cold and dwindled. It is these religious bodies to-day which exalt the master that are drawing all men unto them. No sermon is so effective as the sermon that exalts Christ. There are as many ways of preaching him as there are preachers; but there is just one message that all the people will hear eagerly and drink of, as thirsty children in the desert, and that is the message about the Master.

"Subtlest thought shall fail and learning falter,
Churches change, forms perish, systems go,
But our human needs they will not alter,
Christ, no after-age shall e'er outgrow.
Yea, Amen! O changeless One, Thou only
Art life's guide and spiritual goal,
Thou the light across the dark vale lonely,
Thou the eternal haven of the soul."

The best way to exalt Christ is to live his life. "Herein is my Father glorified," he says, "that ye bear much fruit, so shall ye be my disciples."

Any life upon which falls the shadow of the cross, the cross of his uplifting, becomes glorified thereby and ever—O, think of the greatness and the wonder of it!—adds to his glory. It was only a dusty, painless, rusty old wire screen over a window in a humble cottage home. The rain was falling, but a light was shining outside—an arc-light, and the old screen with its dust and its rain-drops was lit up in a resplendent glory, while the crossing wires, beneath the strong rays of the light, formed as if in fire, the holy sign, the sign of the cross of Christ. And so can any humble life, however dusty and however poor, soiled, apparently, with rust and rain, be transformed into a thing of beauty and of brightness by the cross of Christ, the light and glory of the world.

BOYDEN.

Mrs. Mary W. Boyden, youngest daughter of General W. Lipscomb, late of Lexington, Ky., was born in Madison Co., Ky., Nov. 11th, 1842, died at Slater, Mo., July 10th, 1898. She was married to J. M. Boyden, Aug. 9th, 1870, in Pike Co., Mo. She was the mother of six children, only one of whom survive her. For many years Sister Boyden had been a faithful member of the Christian Church, exemplifying the teaching of Christ by a beautiful, godly life. May the God of all comfort sustain and cheer the hearts of those who mourn her absence!

G. E. Shanklin, Pastor.

Slater, Mo., July 23, 1898.

FORD.

Amanda E. Ford died at her home in Thomas County, Kan., July 2nd, 1898; born Oct. 12th, 1854, near Lafayette, Ind., age 43 years, eight months, 20 days. With her parents she moved to Macon County, Ill., in 1863. She united with the Church of Christ at the age of 17 and continued a faithful Christian until death. She was married to S. W. Ford, Dec. 26th, 1874; to them were born five children, three girls and two boys. The family moved to Thomas County, Kan., the spring of 1887, where they now live, mourning the loss of a kind and loving mother and a faithful wife. The funeral services conducted by the undersigned. Wm. Burkley.

FIELDS.

Byron Fields was born in Lawrenceville, Ill., and died at Morgan, Tex. His home was in Colorado Springs, Colo. He was in the twenty-sixth year of his age. He was the only son of Judge and Mrs. Margaret Fields. Three sisters mourn his untimely death. Byron became a Christian some years ago under the ministry of J. P. Lucas. At the time of his death he was employed in the building of a railroad in Texas. He fell from a caboose car when the train was in motion and was instantly killed, Friday, July 15. At the moment of his death he was in the discharge of his duty. His business position was one of unusual responsibility for a person so young, but he was faithful and efficient. The popularity of Byron Fields in his home town and where he was best known, was very great. There is profound and universal sorrow over his death. But those who mourn do not sorrow as do those who have no hope. He lived and died a Christian. B. B. T.

GANNAWAY.

Emma Catherine Gannaway was born at Palmyra, Mo., June 27, 1841, and died at Hannibal, Mo., July 21, 1898. Her maiden name was Johnson. In 1866, at New London, Mo., she married W. R. Gannaway, who preceded her into rest last February. She leaves a daughter, Miss Lizzie, and many other relatives who will miss her counsel and companionship. In her girlhood she gave her heart to Christ, and through all life's trials and pleasures she has sustained an unfaltering faith in him. In her suffering she never complained, and, giving advice to those about her, passed sweetly into undisturbed peace.

Levi Marshall.

Hannibal, Mo., July 24, 1898.

HUNTER.

Sarah A. Smith was born near Hermon, Ill., July 21, 1857, and died at Abingdon, Ill., July 15, 1898. She was married to James W. Hunter, Nov. 16, 1876. To them two children were born, Isadora, who died at a tender age, and Charles M., who reached his eighth birthday June 29. 1898. Mrs. Hunter united with the Christian Church in early life, and never faltered in the faith. Mr. and Mrs. Hunter had just moved from Peoria to Abingdon to make the home of their old age, but within two short weeks she was called to her heavenly home. The funeral was conducted by the writer at Abingdon, Ill., July 17, 1898.

J. P. McKnight.

Peoria, Ill., July 20, 1898.

JOHNSON.

Nancy Sewell was born at Bowling Green, Ky., July 4th, married Dickson Johnson at Morton, Ind.; moved to Vinton, Ia., January, 1856. Died in the faith at Pitrodie, S. D., July 15th, 1898, was buried in Evergreen Cemetery, Vinton, Ia., July 17th, beside her husband. One daughter and three sons mourn their loss. J. A. J.

KLEBERGER.

On Wednesday evening, July 20th, Mrs. Anna Hayden Kleberger, wife of the Rev. C. A. Kleberger, recently pastor at Ledrow, O., passed peacefully away at her home here. Her illness lasted for fifteen tedious, painful weeks. For the last six weeks she longed for rest. Her age was 39 years, two months and eighteen days. Her husband and two children, Bertha age 13 and Bruce, age 11, remain to cherish her memory. She lived a strong, helpful, Christian life. A simple funeral service was conducted at the home; no signs of mourning were seen about the house. We all know she had gone to her beautiful home.

McPHERSON.

On the 5th day of July, 1898, at Springfield, Mo., the white spirit of Henry W. McPherson left its clay tenement, and went to join the general assembly and church of the first-born whose names are in the book of life.

Earth is poorer, but heaven is much richer because this eminent servant of God has been called to exchange worlds.

He was a faithful preacher of the primitive gospel, and an earnest defender of the faith once and forever delivered to the saints. He was born December 19th, 1811, and died July 5, 1898, aged 86 years, six months and 16 days. He lived to a good old age. His days and years were crowned with gospel holiness. The world has been made much better because he lived in it. In the year 1824, he removed to Fayette Co., Indiana, where he continued to reside for 11 years. When a lad, only 18 years old, he gave his heart to Christ, and united with the Baptist Church. On the 4th day of July, 1829, at the organization of the first church ever constituted in Indiana, pleading for a return to apostolic Christianity, and the reunion of all of God's people on the divine foundation, with a few others he renounced all human names and human creeds, and became a charter member of that organization. He lived to see that little band, who, on the 4th day of July declared themselves free to accept the gospel just as it had been revealed by the Holy Spirit and preached by men whose tongues were fired with the inspiration of God, become a mighty people, numbering in Indiana more than 100,000, and in the United States more than 1,000,000.

In the mighty triumphs of this blessed gospel no one rejoiced more than did Henry W. McPherson. In 1835 he removed from Fayette Co., to Liberty Township, Wabash Co., Indiana. He was one of eight persons who were the charter members of the Boundary Line Church, where he held his membership, until he removed to Springfield, Mo.

He was widely known, not only in Wabash Co., but in all the regions round-about. His name was a synonym of good wherever he was known. In the church, with other religious people, and among the world's people, all spoke of him as one of the very best men they ever knew. After many long years of happy acquaintance the writer can truly say that he never heard one person say an evil word of "Uncle Henry," as he was familiarly known. Truly he was a "living epistle, known and read of all men." Some years ago he removed to Springfield, Mo., where he continued to reside until called to exchange the cross for the crown, and to be with that Savior he loved so well and in whose service he found such sweet joy and such great delight. From Springfield comes the same testimony, concerning his godly life, and his devotion to that gospel he loved so well, and that for many years he preached so efficiently. We were not surprised when we heard that his death was a kingly triumph. He had fought a good fight; he had finished his course; he had kept the faith; and now the bright angels came to carry him to that land that is fairer than day.

"The trees of heaven rise before him, waving bright.
And the distant crystal waters flash upon his failing sight."

He lays his hand in the hand of his divine and ever adorable Guide and goes down through the parted waters of the cold river only to come up on the other side singing songs of triumph to that Savior who had redeemed him with his most precious blood.

"A holy quiet reigned around,
A calm which life nor death destroyed;
And naught disturbed the peace profound,
Which his unfettered soul enjoyed."

His aged and venerable companion and four children, with many relatives, together with the people everywhere, who knew him, mourn his death; and yet they mourn not as others having no hope. Farewell, my dear father in Israel, farewell, you have outrun us a little and gained heaven first, but by the grace of God we will meet you in that land of pure delight, where saints immortal dwell. Sweeter than the power of human words to describe, is the Master's "well-done," when our entrance is made in safety through the gates of jasper and of pearl.

The brethren at Springfield, Mo., took all that was mortal of our departed brother and covered it up in a turf-made dwelling in their beautiful cemetery, there to rest until the morning of the great day, when the redeemed shall come forth to have a body like our dear Lord, and to wear the starry crown. They will cover it over with the first sweet flowers of spring. They will remember his pure life, and will be better Christians because he lived among them.

Indiana mingles her tears with Missouri over the grave of "Uncle Henry."

"Servant of God well-done,
Rest from thy loved employ,
The battle's fought, the victory won;
Enter the Master's joy."

NALLEY.

Died, at Elsberry Mo., July 17th, 1898, after a long, severe illness, Thomas Jefferson Nalley, in the 76th year of his age. Brother Nalley was born in Albemarle County, Va., in 1822. In 1835, came to Missouri. and in 1847 was married to Mary C. Martin, to which union twelve children were born, five having died in infancy, the others still living. More than fifty years ago he became a Disciple of Christ, and with a strong faith in God, "nothing doubting" he lived in an upper sphere, seldom attained by mortal man. Bro. Nalley did much for the cause of the Master in this county, "laboring both in faith and doctrine." Aged wife and sorrowing children, look up. God in his infinite love gave, his gift has been a benediction to you. In his infinite goodness and mercy he has taken away; "Blessed be the name of the Lord." The writer preached the funeral, reading 90th Psalm.

REEDER.

Sherman D. Reeder, a member of the Church of Christ at Stockton, Kan., died in the Sanitarium at Salina, Kan., June 14, 1898. He was born at Tipton, Ia., Jan. 31st, 1863. Moved to Kansas in October, 1878, was married to Lula Hall, June 29, 1884, whom he leaves with four children, a mother, three brothers and two sisters to mourn his untimely death. He said a short time before his death that his desire was that he might be spared to his little family, but if it was God's will that he should go, he was ready. A. C. F.

Sunday-School & Christian Endeavor

Library Books

In the Days of Jehu. By J. B. Ellis. A well written and intensely interesting Bible narrative. The lesson taught is that idolatry is ruin and the worship of God is life and peace. 189 pages. Cloth $1.00

King Saul. By J. Breckenridge Elis, author of "In the Days of Jehu." As fascinating as fiction, and more interesting because it is true. The author recites the history of Saul from the time he starts out to find his father's beasts until his death at Gilboa, and so interesting is the narrative, that to begin a reading is to finish it. Illustrated with numerous fine engravings, many of which were made essecially for this volume. 12mo. Cloth $1.00

Queen Esther. By M. M. Davis. The consecrated, heroic and patriotic Queen of King Xerxes is here portrayed by an ardent admirer. Her graphic life is vividly told, and its rich lessons are pressed home to the heart. Speculation and theology give place to biographical and practical, so that the story seems as real and far more fascinating than that of Joan of Arc. The book is a timely contribution to our literature, just now when a new interest is being aroused among our Sunday-school and Endeavor Societies looking to the establishing of libraries in churches and Sunday-schools. Illustrated with numerous engravings. Cloth $ .75

The Wonders of the Sky, or, God's Glory Exhibited in the Heavens. By W. J. Russell. "The heavens declare the glory of God," and this book leads the mind of the reader to contemplate the beauty, grandeur, sublimity and wonders of the heavens, directing the mind to a better understanding of the universe and greater reverence for the Creator. The subject is treated, not from a scientific standpoint, but in a popular style calculated to be easily understood by the young of our times. Bound in beautiful, illuminated cloth $ .50

A Circuit of the Globe. By A. McLean. Illustrated. This author was sent on a tour of the world by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. This book contains an account of the social, political and religious phases of the many nations visited by the writer. 384 pages. Cloth $2.00

Across the Gulf. By Mrs. N. M. Vandervoort. A story of the times of Christ. Many of the great truths spoken by the Master are mingled with historical facts and traditions, showing that Christ is the Savior of mankind. 268 pages. Cloth $1.00

To many this book will be a search light thrown into the Sunday-school lessons, revealing the characters of Ahab, Jezebel and other notable persons connected with the present quarter's lessons. The book is valuable to the student of Old Testament history. The price is 75 cents.

Mrs. N. M. Vandervoort's late book, "Across the Gulf," is a story interwoven with gospel narrative and historical facts. The hero of the story is made to reject all teachings not sanctioned by the Master, and to adhere strictly to each and every commandment given by Christ. The book is beautiful in diction, unique in style and sound in morals and faith. The price of the book is $1.00.

"Organic Evolution Considered," by Alfred Fairhurst, Professor of Natural Science in Kentucky University, is highly recommended by competent judges who have carefully read this late scientific publication. Prominent among these may be mentioned Prof. W. M. Thrasher, of the University of Indianapolis, Indiana, from whose comment we give the following extract:

"A spirit of transparent candor pervades the book. The tone is judicially calm—that of a simple inquirer after truth. There is a noticeable absence of dogmatism. Concessions by opponents are fairly treated, and he makes wherever possible, the evolutionist himself draw his conclusions.

The voluminous excerpts from the best known evolutionists would alone make it instructive reading for the student.

The lucidity of arrangement, freedom from all ambiguity, the excellent literary form combine to make this volume very pleasant reading, aside from the great interest of the subjects discussed."

Our new publication, "Wonders of the Sky," by W. J. Russell, will be found interesting reading in regard to the wonders of the heavenly bodies. Aside from the information contained in this book, the reader cannot lay it down without a greater reverence for him whose glory is manifest in all the works of his hands. This little volume is bound in beautiful illuminated cloth and the price is 50 cents. We give the following Table of Contents: Preface, Introduction, The History of Astronomy, The Depths of Space, The Stars and their Number, Celestial Distances, Movements of the Stars, The Sun, Planets Nearest the Sun, Planets Farthest from the Sun, Asteriods, Are the Planets Inhabited? The Supreme Power.

IN THE DAYS OF JEHU.

J. Breckenridge Eilis, the author of this book, evinces an intimate acquaintance with both the people and times of which he writes, and he makes the good and bad qualities stand out very strikingly. The story is so well told that it is really fascinating. It freshens one's mind in the facts of history, and impresses important truths by historic examples. Jezebel, the wicked wife of Ahab, turned the heads of the nobles and made Israel bow down to Baal, and filled the land with iniquity. While Jehosaphat had some good traits of character, he committed a grievous blunder when he sanctioned the marriage of his son to the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel. Through this unholy alliance came the downfall and ruin of the kingdom of Judah. Jehu opposed Baal-worship and cleared the land of idols. He smote the idol-worshipers, but did not re-establish the worship of God. The land was stained with the blood of many wars, and there were many scenes of the most exciting character. Thus the book deals with a very important period of the Old Testament history.—Gospel Advocate, Nashville, Tenn.

A Curious Incident.

Once upon a time a certain good man was elected superintendent of a Sunday-school. He was far the best man for the place, and was indeed a very capable worker. If any one failed to do their part he was ready to do it. If any one backed out, he took their place. So in the process of time he came to be the principal feature of the school. In fact, it came to be that there was no school except such parts of it as he could manage and maintain. Almost no one else was doing anything. And it was not because he was selfish or self-important, for he was generous to a fault, and humble above all men. When he became the sole contributor to the school he was only sorry because he could give so little. And when he was filling nearly every office and doing most of the teaching, he merely bemoaned his inability to do more. He was sorry the rest were doing so little, but he stopped not on that account. When the end of the year came around it was so evident that he was the best man for the place, that he thought it as well to dispense with the formality of an election. The others either agreed, or seeing his great earnestness and ability were hushed into silence. After awhile the Endeavor Society came into existence, and no one else showing so great ability at managing things as he, it was unanimously agreed to elect him president. This office he has filled as faithfully as that of superintendent of the Bible-school. True not many helped in the work, but he knew it was a good work and ought to be done, and as no one else seemed willing to do it, he kept on. It soon became apparent that the semi-annual election was a farce, for there was no one else to fill the place, so this election was soon discontinued. He had long ago been elected chorister and elder without anything being said about his time of service, and his wife had become organist and President of the Ladies' Aid Society and C. W. B. M. and held them permanently. So now when the church had become so poor that they could no longer keep a pastor he was asked by some one to talk for them sometimes, and as he enjoyed talking, he accepted this added duty without more than a small show of modesty, and his cup became full to overflowing. Even now he felt so humble in his labors that he was not critical of his brethren, but earnestly strove to do his Master's will and bear his heavy burdens bravely. He was grieved sometimes when it came to his ears that some one had accused him of wanting to do all the work, for he did not want to do it, and was perfectly willing to allow every one to do their part, but rather than that the work should go undone he would do it all himself. And the work accomplished was then so small that he could honestly condemn himself for being unfaithful to the Master's cause, and often did he pray for strength that he might do more. How he finally learned that a leader's great duty was not to work, but to inspire workers, and to delegate to each his proper tasks, and how above all things he learned the necessity of submitting his position as leader to the vote of the people at regular intervals, must be told in another paper.

What We Plead For.

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

For the right against the wrong;
For the weak against the strong;
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.
For the truth, 'gainst superstition,
For the faith, against tradition,
For the hope, whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

New Publications.

IN THE DAYS OF JEHU. By J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS. 12mo, cloth, 75c.

A well written and intensely interesting Bible narrative. Without sacrificing historical accuracy, the author has given us a book more interesting than a work of pure fiction.

I have read "In the Days of Jehu" with interest and pleasure, and regard it, in a literary point of view, as a meritorious production. There is here shown an exceptional power of constructive imagination, and at the same time a wisdom of expression and soundness and reach of thought. Besides, the style is simple, lucid and good, so that the thoughts fall into the mind of the reader without effort on his part. I think there is opened up, in this book, a mine which will yield much good ore, whose metallurgy will enhance the interest of the sacred volume.—DR. H. CHRISTOPHER, Editor Medical Herald, St. Joseph, Mo.

THE EXILED PROPHET; or, What John Saw on Patmos. By J. G. ENCELL. 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

The author has devoted a great many years to the study of this wonderful book. Illustrated with nearly forty half-tone engravings.

This is a valuable book, prefaced by an essay on Daniel by Dr. D. R. Dungan, covering seventy pages, and is exceedingly interesting to the student of prophecy. The seventeen chapters following on the Book of Revelation are equally as interesting and evince much research and earnestness for the truth. The author's conclusions will generally be accepted, and a careful reading of the book will awaken new interest in What John Saw on the Isle of Patmos.—Christian Tribune, Baltimore, Md.

For a number of years the author has been giving the substance of this book in a series of illustrated lectures. The marvel is that he has succeeded in condensing the work to its present form. It is suggestive and stimulating, and is probably as readable and satisfactory as any small volume published on this riddle of the ages, called the Apocalypse.—Christian Oracle, Chicago.

AFTER PENTECOST, WHAT? By JAMES M. CAMPBELL, author of "Unto the Uttermost." 12mo, cloth, 297 pages, $1.00.

This work is a discussion of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit in its relation to modern Christological thought. The following Table of Contents will give an idea of the scope of the book: Introduction, The Significance of Pentecost, A Spiritual Christ, A Spiritual God, Spiritual Worship, A Spiritual Apprehension of Truth, An Influx of Spiritual Life, The Spiritual Man, Spiritual Holiness, Spiritual Authority, The Distribution of Spiritual Operations, The Impartation of Spiritual Power, The Production of Spiritual Works, The Formation of a Spiritual Society, The Inauguration of Spiritual Movements, The Establishment of a Spiritual Kingdom.

ROSA EMERSON; or, A Young Woman's Influence. A Story of the Lodge, the Church and the School. By JOHN AUG. WILLIAMS. 375 pages, cloth, $1.00.

Rosa represents most of the beautiful female virtues, and young Thornton is as bright and noble and fearless as a knight. Their love is strong and true, without the heartaches and heartbreaks which so frequently send the Cupid-smitten unfortunates dangerously near the mad-house. The whole-soulness that left no stone unturned to find the heir of the estate of the father French, and succeeded at last in laying the prize on the head of Simon Bugg, who was not a bugg at all, is as wild and beautiful as the story of Pythias and Damon. Here is another diamond, first in the rough, but polished, in the old way, with his own dust, until Simon French Stuart, as he proves to be, comes fearfully near getting the crown of heroism. I like the fine selection of characters, with which to expose hypocrisy and sham. Faithfulness in the discharge of duty is made to rank high above sectarian orthodoxy, and to throw a white light on the miserable sectarian apologies for religious conviction and Christian living. I hope the author will receive a liberal patronage, and the book a wide reading.—D. R. DUNGAN.

LIFE OF ALEXANDER CAMPBELL. By THOMAS W. GRAFTON. With an introduction by Herbert L. Willett. Large 12mo, cloth, $1.00.

A condensed, concise and accurate account of the life of this great religious reformer, beginning with his boyhood, and following him through his trials and triumphs. It is written in an attractive style. It is just the book for the busy people.

People who know nothing about Mr. Campbell, and who wish to ascertain what manner of man he was, and what he taught, can obtain from this volume the desired information. There are tens of thousands of church members who should buy this book and read and master it.—The Missionary Intelligencer, Cincinnati, O.

STUDIES IN ACTS; or, The New Testament Book of Beginnings. By W. J. LHAMON, M. A. Introduction by A. McLean, Corresponding Secretary of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Large 12mo, cloth, 416 pages, $1.25.

This book is not a commentary; it is not a collection of sermons; but it is a volume of essays, in which the author seizes upon the most critical and interesting portions of the Book of Acts, the strategic forces, and mountain peaks of its history. These he treats with a charm of style, a vigor of thought and mastery of material that have called forth the hearty praise of many readers, though the book is but recently from the press. 116 pages at the end of the volume are devoted to Notes and Comments. A few are by the author, but for the most part they are selections from first-class authorities, and are exceedingly helpful upon many difficult and important passages.

Sent by mail prepaid on receipt of price.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Naturally enough the peace negotiations between the United States and Spain continue to be the absorbing theme in this country and throughout the civilized world. At this writing Spain has not officially signified her acceptance of the terms proposed by President McKinley. There seems to be little doubt, however, among government officers at Washington that these terms will be accepted. It has transpired that M. Cambon, the French Ambassador, who was charged by Spain with opening negotiations, was fully authorized by the Spanish government to negotiate terms of peace, subject only to Spain's approval, just as President McKinley's propositions are subject to the ratification of the Senate. The Spanish Cabinet, it is said, has asked for an amplification of some of the terms, and proposed a modification of some of them. The amplifications have been given, but it is understood that no further concessions will be made by this government. The terms stated include the withdrawal of Spanish forces from Cuba, and the relinquishment of all authority over that island; the cession of Porto Rico to the United States, and the harbor, bay and city of Manila, also, while the future of the Philippines is to be left to a commission to be appointed by Spain and the United States. No war indemnity is asked, at present, further than the territory named, together with a coaling station in the Ladrone Islands. There is little doubt but that Spain will accept these terms as soon as she is convinced that they are the best she can secure.

It is now said that the European governments united in bringing pressure upon Spain to sue for peace. After the destruction of Spain's second fleet, it became apparent to these governments that the continuance of the struggle on the part of Spain would not only involve further losses, but would probably lead to serious complications in Spain. Perhaps they saw, too, the possibility of international complications growing out of the war, if it were indefinitely prolonged. The Pope, too, it is believed, added the weight of his advice to Spain, urging her to secure the best terms possible and make peace at once. It appears that the leading men in Spain are convinced of the hopelessness of the struggle, and are ready for peace. The delay on the part of Spain in accepting the terms offered is no doubt caused by the difficulty of reconciling the Spanish people to the terms proposed. Sagasta has been in consultation with the leaders of the different parties, and is evidently seeking to propitiate the people and prepare them for the inevitable. This will be the more difficult to do because of the false and exaggerated reports of Spanish victories and American losses with which the Spanish press and government officers have deluded the people. At last, however, it is necessary for them to know the facts, in order to reconcile them to the situation, and this, no doubt, is the work that is now being done by the Spanish Government.

While these peace negotiations are going on, there has been no cessation as yet in military and naval activities. Gen. Miles is continuing his triumphal march through Porto Rico toward San Juan, the capital. So far he has met with no serious opposition. Nine or ten large Porto Rican cities have already capitulated, and the American flag has been hoisted in some of them even before the Americans arrived. it is estimated that about half of the beautiful island is already United States territory. Porto Ricans are welcoming the American troops with great enthusiasm, and seem delighted with the idea of having their island under protection of the American flag, instead of remaining a Spanish province. The knowledge of this fact having reached Spain tends to reconcile that country to the surrender of the island. It is reported that San Juan itself is meditating the propriety of surrendering to Gen. Miles without a battle. The Foreign Consuls there advise that course. The healthfulness and fertility of the island, together with the favorable disposition of the people toward the United States Government, give promise of a future of great prosperity for Porto Rico. There can be no doubt but that it will receive an immediate influx of population from the United States as soon as it becomes a part of the United States territory. It will be a fine field, not only for commerce, but for missionary operations, and already some of the leading religious bodies are planning for missionary operations there.

It has been knowa for sometime that since the fall of Santiago the health condition of our army there has been growing steadily worse. The whole truth concerning its condition, however, was not known until the generals of the army, acting on the suggestion of Col. Roosevelt in a statement to Gen. Shafter, setting forth the condition of the army and the necessity for its immediate removal to the North. This petition of the generals, now spoken of as the "Round Robin," has created considerable comment, and has led to some sharp correspondence between Secretary Alger and Col. Roosevelt. It appears from the evidence published that it was the plan of the Secretary of War to remove the army North as soon as it was believed to be safe to do so. It is probable that the letter of the generals has hastened the matter, as the War Department has ordered the ten large transports at Ponce to proceed at once to Santiago to bring Gen. Shafter's army back to this country. Some of the troops, it is reported, are already on the way, and others will follow immediately. The yellow fever patients will remain, of course, in Cuba, as their removal would be dangerous to them as well as to the health of this country. The place selected for the troops is Montauk Point, L. I., where it is thought the weary and sick soldiers will soon be restored to perfect health. Gen. Shafter has been blamed for allowing the petition of his generals to be published, but if the publication has served to hasten the return of the troops to this country, this fact will compensate for any encouragement which it is feared its publication might give to Spain to continue the struggle. Four or five regiments of immunes are expected to arrive at Santiago to hold possession of that city.

Some of the enterprising dailies of the country have been gathering a consensus of opinion from leading men on the subject of the proper disposition to be made of the Philippine Islands. As might be expected there is a variety of opinion. A large part believe that we should hold and govern all the Philippine Islands. A majority, perhaps, are of the opinion that we should content ourselves with holding the city of Manila, bay and harbor, while others would have the government take possession of the Island of Luzon, giving up the others to Spain. The question, however, is generally discussed from the point of view of commercial advantage. In most of the discussions the problem as to what can be done for the people of the Philippines to help them to a better government and a better civilization, has not received adequate attention. So far as the United States Government is concerned, the city of Manila with coaling stations, would meet her demands from a military and naval point of view. But if by the famous victory of our navy at Manila we have acquired any legitimate right to deal with the future of these islands, we ought to see to it that, whether we hold possession of them or yield them to Spain, some guarantee be given that they shall have better government than they have had heretofore, and that religious liberty shall be secured as one of the essential conditions of their future prosperity. Our responsibility in the premises is measured by our ability and opportunity to bring about a better state of things. We do not need the Philippines, further than for the purpose stated, but the people of these islands do need our civilization, and the civil and religious liberty which we enjoy. The question is, What can we do to make them sharers with us in these blessings?

Judging from the specimens we have seen, the average Porto Rican mayor is able to give lessons in rhetoric to our American mayors, especially when they are welcoming the Stars and Stripes. Here is a specimen from the mayor of Guanica, where our troops landed:

CITIZENS:—God, who rules the destinies of nations, has decreed that the eagle of the north, coming from the waters of a land where liberty first sprang forth to life, should extend to us his protecting wings. Under his plumage, sweetly reposing, the Pearl of the Antilles, called Porto Rico, will remain from July 25. The starry banner has floated gayly in the valleys of Guanica, the most beautiful port of this downtrodden land. This city was selected by General Miles in which to officially plant his flag in the name of his government, the United States of America. It is the ensign of grandeur and the guaranty of order, morality and justice. Let us join together to strengthen, to support and to further a great work. Let us clasp to our bosoms the great treasure which is generously offered to us, while saluting with all our hearts the name of the great Washington.

AUGUS BARRENECHA, Alcalde.

Guanica, Porto Rico, U. S. A., July 26, 1898.

Apropos to the remark above as to the popular ignorance in Spain of the power and resources of the United States, we give the following extract from an interview with Admiral Cervera, during which, in answer to the question by the chaplain of the Oregon as to how the naval commanders of Spain could have expected to defeat the United States, the grizzly old hero replied:

We never thought it possible, at least I did not, and neither did several of my ablest officers—two or three who visited the World's Fair in particular. We knew full well our nation's helplessness and the sure extinction our best ships were running into. We understood it could only mean in the end—barring luck and accidents that none might dare hope for—the loss of ships and our own lives. But our duty sent us out to fight, and we did not flinch. Spain is not so well informed as the advanced officers of her navy. Respecting America and its resources and fighting strength the mass of our people possess only the most woeful misconception and ignorance. The Spanish people think Americans a semi-barbarous nation, and believed our armada could wreck all the cities on your coast and then wipe out your warships wherever we met up with them. But, alas for the duty a patriot owes his mother-country when she is wholly blind! I did not dare think so many of my brave men would escape even with naked life!

The story of the foreign commerce of the United States in the year of her greatest exports has just been completed by the Bureau of Statistics in its monthly "Summary of Finance and Commerce," which presents the details of the imports and exports in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898. It shows that the exports to all parts of the world increased both in manufactures and products of agriculture, and that while there was a great falling off in imports, the reduction was almost exclusively in manufactured articles and food products. On the other hand the exportations of manufactures, which amounted to $288,871,449 in 1898, exceeded those of 1897 by $11,586,058, and those of 1896 by $60,300,271; while the products of agriculture exported amounted to $854,627,929 in 1898 against $683,471,131 in 1897 and $569,879,297 in 1896, the chief increase in agricultural exportations being in breadstuffs. The exportations of the year increased $180,336,694, and the importations of the year decreased $148,725,253, the comparison being made in each case with the preceding fiscal year 1897. To Europe the exportations increased $160,313,645, while the importations from Europe decreased $124,100,391. To the North American countries the exportations increased $14,676,828, while the importations from the North American countries decreased $14,752,130. To South America the exportations increased but $53,325, while the importations from South American countries decreased $15,295,879. To Asia the exportations increased $5,549,363, while the importations from Asia also increased $5,300,440. Asia and Oceanica being the only grand divisions from which we increased our purchases during the year.

In no department of our industrial system has greater progress been made than in the use of electricity. Some of the marvelous strides made in this field are strikingly presented in a recent address by Dr. A. E. Kennelly, as reported in the Globe-Democrat, of this city, from which we give a few of his statements. It is estimated that about $600,000,000 has been invested in electric lighting stations and plants in the United States. The storage battery, at one time an apparently hopeless factor in electrical work, has shown remarkable advancement in efficiency and power; one installation now in active operation has 166 cells, weighs 500 tons, and has an enormous output of current. In the ten years since the first commercial trolley cars were run, electric locomotives of 1,500 horse power have made their appearance, even on steel railroad tracks. There are to-day in the United States about 14,000 miles of electric railroad, with a nominal capital of about $1,000,000,000, and employing about 170,000 men. Dr. Kennelly holds that the principal engineering value of electricity to-day lies in its adaptation to the transmission of power through mills or cities, or from some locality where power is cheap to others where it is dear. A steel rope, by its bodily motion, can transmit, with appreciable friction, and depreciation a given amount of power to a distance of some thousands of feet. A bare, quiescent copper rod, half an inch in diameter, and supported on poles, can transmit, possibly, ten times the same power for 100 miles, at an infinitesimal depreciation. A great increase in the convenience and effectiveness of the telephone has come with the general substitution of metallic circuits for ground-return circuits. People can now actually converse at a distance of 1,800 miles, and conversations at distances of 1,500 miles are common. There are now about 1,000,000 telephones connected with this country's telephone service, employing a capitalization of about $100,000,000, 400,000 stations, and about 900,000 miles of wire. Every day about 17,000 employes make on an average more than 3,000,000 connections.

As we go to press we are told by the daily press that Spain's reply to President McKinley's peace propositions is in the hands of the French Ambassador, M. Cambon, at Washington, and will be delivered during the day. There seems to be a general feeling in Washington that Spain's acceptance is full and complete, and that hostilities between these two nations will cease at once. But should there be a disposition shown by Spain to equivocate or modify the terms it is the impression that President McKinley will take some short and decisive steps to bring that foolish nation to his terms as they are, and that right speedily. But we hope that this last resort will not be necessitated.

THE PROBLEM OF CHRISTIAN UNITY.

There are a great many problems in Christianity, as well as in science, that awaits some future satisfactory solution. One of these is the problem of Christian unity. Some things in reference to this problem are very clear. We are sure, for instance, that it is according to the will and purpose of God, that His church on earth should be one, in a sense that would preclude sectarian rivalry, bitterness, wastefulness and misdirection of efforts. We know that divisions are contrary to the mind of Christ, for He prayed that His disciples might be one, even as he and the Father are one. We know that this unity among the followers of Christ is related to the triumph of Christianity in the world, for Jesus prayed for such unity to the end that the world might believe that the Father had sent Him. We know, too, that this union or unity must be in Christ; that He must be its source and center; that it cannot be effected on any platform of theology or of ecclesiastical government. We know, also, that the best way to promote this unity is not by controversy, but by cultivating the spirit of fraternity, with all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, and by working with them in every possible way for the advancement of His kingdom.

These are some of the things we know, but there are other things we do not know. How long will it be until Christ's prayer for the unity of His followers will be realized? Just in what way will it be brought about? To what extent must the present forms of denominationalism give way or be changed in order to the realization of such unity? What will be the final outcome of our plea for the union of believers? These are some of the questions that many people would like to have answered, but for the answer to which they must wait. It is not given to us to know the outcome of present-day movements and efforts. If we know that Christian unity is according to the purpose and will of God; if we feel assured, as we do, that certain conditions are in the way of the realization of this unity, our duty is plain. As for the final result, we leave that to God. Most of us connected with this reformation used to feel much more certain than we now do, as to the manner in which Christian union would be effected. We do not believe, any less than we ever did, in the necessity of union and in the providential character of our mission as a religious body, but if we understand correctly the feelings and sentiments of the brotherhood, at present, the disposition is to do what seems plainly to be our duty in the premises, and follow the divine leadings as to future developments. We are inclined to be less dogmatic about the outcome of our efforts, or the manner in which God will bring about the unity of His sundered family, and are more disposed to commit the whole problem to God, while we seek loyally to follow the leadings of His Providence.

We doubt if the leaders of any of the great movements in history have ever known all the purposes of God which lay behind their own efforts. No one supposes that our revolutionary fathers had any conception of the magnitude and power of the great American Republic as it exists to-day. God had purposes in the founding of this nation which the fathers did not understand, but they were loyal to the impulse of liberty which He placed in their bosoms. It is not to be supposed for a moment that Luther comprehended the mighty results to flow from his resistance or protest against the corruptions of the Roman hierarchy. It was far from the thought of Thomas and Alexander Campbell, in the beginnings of their efforts to plead for a more scriptural Christianity, and for a closer union among the people of God, that they were inaugurating a movement that in three quarters of a century would number a million souls, and whose influence would be felt around the globe. Much less did they understand how God would use their efforts in promoting the unity of His church. When the present war with Spain was inaugurated, the President and Congress and the people of the United States generally, had in view the freedom of Cuba and the relief of the starving people of that island; but no doubt God had in view, not only these immediate ends, but other and far more important ends, which were to be accomplished. Some of these begin to dawn upon us now, but it is too early yet to understand all that God has in view to accomplish in the present conflict with Spain.

If this be true, as a general principle in the divine government, we ought not to think it strange if it be true in reference to the movement for Christian union and our relation thereto. It has already become evident to many of us that our earliest ideas on the subject were wrong, and that God is not working along the lines which we had marked out for Him. His ways are not our ways, and His thoughts are not our thoughts; but as the heavens are high above the earth, so are the thoughts and ways of God above those of men. We see that the spirit of unity is growing; that division walls are neither so high nor so impassable, as they formerly were. We believe that our labors have contributed something toward the growing sentiment of Christian union. If this be so, there was, and is, reason for our existence. No doubt other ends have been accomplished through our religious movement, but it is a great comfort to believe that God has other agencies which He is using for the accomplishment of the same great ends, and that, after awhile, we will be able to see, as we cannot now see, how all these seemingly diverse agencies have worked together for the advancement of the kingdom of God.

Concerning our individual destiny, John says: "It is not manifest what we shall be." The same thing is true in reference to the future of the religious movement. We believe that God has a great work for it yet to accomplish. We have confidence that He will take care of it and guide it to the accomplishment of these purposes. It is a great and a sublime thing to be an agent for God in the consummation of His great purposes on earth. Let us be content with this honor, and be willing to be led by Him in the future as we have been in the past, shaping our course, as the years go by, by the index finger of the hand of Providence, and in due time we, or those who come after us, shall see the solution of all our problems! If Christian unity does not come, it will come in God's way, which will be the best way. In his faith let us go forward with our work, leaving the results to Him who alone sees the end from the beginning.

ABUSES OF THE NAME CHRISTIAN.

The new name Christian was added to the old name disciple to express the higher type of character which the development of Christianity had commenced to produce. It was one of the early symbols of the unity of the church and the universality of the gospel. The church at Antioch was composed of a mixture of Jews and Gentiles, the first instance of the union of these alien races in one congregation. The middle wall of partition had been broken down by the blood of the cross, race hostilities and prejudices had given place to the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, and the unifying name of their common Lord was given to both in one body. This new name signified that the two races into which the world was divided, and which everything else had failed to reconcile, had become one in Christ, and that the gospel held as a sacred trust by the new church, was for the whole world, both Jews and Gentiles.

But the spiritual and ethical significance of the name Christian was its most characteristic mark. It has the same meaning as the name Christ. They are both derived from a Greek verb that means to anoint. The Christ is the anointed of God by the Holy Spirit. A Christian, likewise, is an anointed person, a christed man or woman, called and recognized of God, and anointed to the office of the highest character in the world, higher than the royal and sacerdotal offices of the old dispensations. A Christian is more than a follower or learner or imitator of Christ, he is himself a Christ. He is not the Christ, whose anointing was the reception of the Holy Spirit without measure, but a Christ who is limited in the Spirit's anointing according to his capacity to receive it. So the term is intended to express Christliness, not Christlikeness. It is not, therefore, similarity of qualities between Christ and the Christian, but identity of character that makes them one. To be a Christian is to be Christ, not merely to be like him. When a man is made a partaker of the divine nature by the anointing of the Holy Spirit, he is a christed man, and therefore a Christ. He says nothing that Christ would not say, he does nothing that Christ would not do, he goes nowhere that Christ would not go, for him to live is Christ, and not merely like Christ. If the truth and life of Christ are in me I do not imitate Christ but I reproduce Him. He thus multiplies, not his likeness, but himself in those who are his. A Christman, or a Christwoman is the ideal expressed in the term Christian.

In view of these facts, it is painful to reflect upon the abuse and perversion of the word in the history of the church. No term in the world has ever been more sadly misapplied, more horribly mangled in its abuses. Its New Testament sense is anointed, and consecrated men and women, conformed by the Holy Spirit to the image of God's dear Son. We apply it to institutions, to denominations, to newspapers, to church houses, to schools and colleges, and to all kinds of inanimate and non-Christian things. The application of the term Christian to a single religious body to the exclusion of the rest of Christendom, is to denominationalize and therefore to abuse the term, as we do when we call ourselves the Christian Church. The word Christian when applied to a single religious party, is just as sectarian as Baptist, Methodits, Presbyterian, or Episcopalian. You may apply the term to the individual believer, to the local congregation of believers, and to the whole body of Christ at large, and these are its three legitimate applications. The worst abuse, however, is applying the term to those who are in no proper sense of the word, Christian. State Churchism and Pædobaptism have destroyed the New Testament significance of this beautiful word. In the national abuse of the term, every man born within the geographical limits of Christendom, is without reference to moral character, a Christian. Men, women and children born in England, Germany, Canada, or the United States, who are not Jews, Mohammedans, Buddhists, or Mormons, are called Christians. They may be infidels, rogues, rascals, and political snoleghosters, and still they are Christians. In the ecclesiastical slaughter and slander of the term, all who are baptized, for the most part sprinkled in infancy, as Bob Ingersoll, Chas. Bradlaugh and Annie Besant were, are Christians. This horrible abuse of the word has brought untold reproach on the Christian name in heathen lands. Every man with a white face is known as a Christian in these lands, and hence all the villainies of white-faced humanity are put down to the credit of the Christian religion Rum, tobacco, firearms, profanity, and the nameless diseases of sexual vice, are looked upon as Christian institutions. Fancy what an obstacle this is in the way of the Christian missionary, and how long it takes him to win the confidence of the people. The unregenerate, self-seeking, rum-selling trader precedes or follows the Christian missionary, and the preparation made is commercial greed, and the civilized vices that kill the people like sheep with the rot, or hogs with the cholera, and cause them to loathe everything that bears the name Christian. Hugh Price Hughes once expressed his disgust and indignation at this dreadful abuse of the name Christian, and went so far as to propose that the churches reject it and wear in its place the name disciple. In commenting later on our religious movement, he remarked that he knew but little about it, but expressed the hope that we were worthy of our beautiful name, the Disciples of Christ. This is a beautiful name, but no more beautiful and not near as expressive of character as the name Christian, and the way to remedy the difficulty, is not to repudiate our Master's name because men have sadly abused, as they have abused every other high thing, but to teach the people its proper use, and insist on its New Testament sense. The most urgent reform, in my judgment, is the restoration of New Testament language to its New Testament significance. We had better begin with the word Christian, and first by restoring ourselves to a condition that the term Christian will fitly describe.

Hour of Prayer.

THE REFUGE OF THE SAINTS.

(Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, August 17.)

From the end of the earth will I call unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed:
Lead me to the rock that is higher than I.
For thou hast been a refuge for me,
A strong tower from the enemy.
I will dwell in thy tabernacle for ever:
I will take refuge in the covert of Thy wings.
—Psalms 61:2-4.

The Psalmist here gives evidence of an experience that has come to all hearts—the overwhelming of the heart, at times, with sorrow and trouble, and the desire at such times, for a stronger than a human hand to bring relief. Such experiences come to all the sons of men sooner or later. No matter in what part of the earth one may be, or how far from his place of accustomed worship, the heart, at such a moment, instinctively turns to God as its only refuge. There are many incidents and accidents of life that cause us to feel our utter helplessness and insufficiency. When we stand in the presence of death, especially if it has come near to us, or in the presence of some great and overwhelming calamity, or when, after drifting along the current of sin, we suddenly awaken to the consciousness of our guilt and of our danger and feel that no human arm can deliver us—to whom then can we go? Where is our refuge? Then the soul lifts up its plaintive cry, "Lead me to the rock that is higher than I."

It is a fault of most of us that we fail to call upon God with great earnestness unless we are in trouble. The bright days that pass by, when there is no cloud to shut out the light of the sun, and when health and prosperity attend us, we seem in a sense to be self-sufficient. We are forgetful of God. It is only when the dark cloud of calamity arises and the storm of adversity beats hard upon us, and the shadow of a great sorrow falls upon our heart, that we feel the emptiness of all earthly things, and lift up our eyes "to the everlasting hills whence cometh our strength." It would be better for us if we made God our dwelling-place continually, instead of using Him simply as a refuge in time of storm. Blessed are they who have learned to abide under the shadow of the Almighty and to hide under the covert of His wings!

On the desert sands a weary pilgrim, thirsty and fainting under the heat of the burning sun, is ready to perish by the way. But yonder in the desert towers a mighty rock, that casts its cooling shadow over the sand, and from its base there gurgles a fountain of cool water, which flows through green verdure, under the shadow of the rock. The pilgrim, fainting and weary, reaches the shadow of this great rock in a weary land, drinks of the cooling water, and rests under its shadow, and is refreshed for the journey. Such is "the rock that is higher than I." What such a rock in the desert is to the thirsty traveler, God is to the soul that is burdened with sorrow or with the sense of guilt.

The psalmist had experienced something like this and declares:

"I will dwell in Thy tabernacle forever,
I will take refuge in the covert of Thy wings."

There is no other place of security. There is no other place of serene and undisturbed peace. There is room enough under the wings of the Almighty for all who desire to put their trust in God. Well would it be for us if we could each, to-night, resolve, with Israel's psalmist, to take refuge under the wings of the Almighty.

The lesson emphasizes the value of prayer as the means of coming to God for refuge and help in time of need. It emphasizes, also, the importance of our living continually in such relations with God as to make our prayers effective when we call upon Him. It calls attention, too, to a life of peace and restfulness to which many of us have not yet attained. We are full of worry and care and anxiety; whereas we might take refuge from all these and enjoy "the peace that passeth all understanding." This refuge of the soul is to be found by trusting in God, abiding in Him and committing all our ways and all our interests to Him as to one who "careth for us." This kind of life is possible to all who will seek it aright. May He lead us by His Spirit into the full enjoyment of its blessedness!

PRAYER.

O God, our Father, we thank Thee that Thou art not only great, but gracious, and that in times of perplexity and trouble and sorrow, when our heart is overwhelmed, we may call upon Thy name, and come to Thee as the rock of our refuge. Thou, O God, hast been our refuge and the refuge of our fathers for generations past. Help us to abide under the shadow of Thy wings. If we have been distrustful, anxious, fretful, care-burdened, grant us such increased faith and confidence that we may seek refuge in Thee by lives of trust and obedience. Protect us, we pray Thee, from the thousand ills that beset us here, and bring us at last to be with Thee and enjoy Thy presence and the fullness of Thy peace forever. In Christ's name. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

OR MACATAWA MUSINGS.

It is an important part of the philosphy of life to be able to see and appreciate the beautiful in every season, in every kind of weather, and in every environment. What more musical than the pattering rain-drops, falling from cottage roof and dripping from the eaves, and from the leaves of the trees! How suggestive of somnolence! How it calls up the rainy days of long ago in the country, when we found time to read the papers or perchance a magazine or book! Nearly all night the rain has come down copiously, gladdening the hearts of the gardeners and farmers hereabouts, and giving a newer and fresher tinge of green to all living things. We like the rain as well as the sunshine. This morning the lake has assumed one of its grander moods. The strong breezs has raised the white-caps, while cloud and sunshine, intermingled, are painting the billows with every shade and hue. It is a source of never-failing delight to watch the great billows, foam crested and sun-painted, sweep in majestically and break on the shore in a deep diapaison of praise to Him who holds seas and lakes in the hollow of his hand. Thank God for this great unsalted sea, and for all the beauty He has put on it and about it for man's happiness and well-being!

On the shoreline out yonder we see through our study window Old Glory, waving in the breeze, this morning, with every stripe horizontal, and its field of blue standing at right angles with the staff from which it floats. No doubt this lake and these hills and canons, with their green forests, would be just as beautiful if some other flag waved there, but they would not seem so to our eyes. The Stars and Stripes give them, to our eyes, an added beauty and glory. "Forever float that standard sheet" beside these inland lakes, on the summits of our mountain ranges, over our broad, fertile prairies, in all our lovely vales, on the high seas, and wherever "its broad stripes and bright stars" are seen, may it continue to be the ensign of liberty, civil and religious, the symbol of equal rights to all men and the guarantee of the practicability and stability of a government "of the people, for the people and by the people." The stars on the old banner never shone with as much of the lustre of heaven as since it has passed through the storm of battle in an unselfish war for the rights and the liberty of an oppressed people. Now that the sun of peace is about to shine upon its starry folds once more, it will henceforth command the respect and admiration of mankind to a greater extent than ever before. Now let the great Republic purge itself of all corruption, inequality and injustice of every kind, championing the cause of the weakest and most helpless of its citizens. So shall we honor the "Flag of the free heart's hope and home,

By angels' hands to valor given."

The gregarious habit in human beings manifests itself in many ways. It is not an infrequent thing here at the Park for parties to be formed for an excursion on the lake, for a picnic or for some other purpose. The governing principle in the formation of these parties is friendship, or geniality, based on or growing out of acquaintanceship, formed before or since coming here. This year a large number of St. Louisans are here. It was suggested that we form a little party for a picnic up Black Lake. Within a few hours the party grew to about sixty persons—men, women and children, including several who were not from St. Louis. It was a sort of impromptu affair, each family providing for itself in the way of eatables, but making a common meal of it on the grounds. A little steamer was chartered to take us up, towing our row-boats along for use in fishing and to serve as "lighters" in the debarkation of the party at "Point Superior." It was a lively scene—that of landing this company from the steamer, by means of row-boats—and reminded us of the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers, though we suspect the proportion of children in the Mayflower was not so great as in our party. Once on the ground we all became children, and spent the afternoon in innocent games, and in singing, while some of the more sportsman-like were luring the wily bass. We had a great feast in the evening, topping off with watermelons, and then we re-embarked and had a delightful voyage home, making the quiet waters of Black Lake fairly tremble with our songs. It was voted to be a delightful occasion, and its repetition before the season closes is among the probabilities.

We have perhaps remarked before upon the large attendance on the religious services at the Park this year, and as the season advances this attendance increases. This speaks well for the character of the people who come here for summer rest, or to escape the heat of the cities. But it has necessitated some improvement and enlargement of our accommodations at the auditorium. We are now having the auditorium floored and additional seats put in, at a cost of about $170. The money has been raised for the purpose, mainly through the energy of Bro. William Bellamy, who carried a subscription paper to the people in the Park and secured pledges. The balance was raised in a few minutes on last Lord's day, in response to an appeal for that purpose by the writer. Rev. Mr. Burgess, of Normal, preached to a very large audience last Lord's day, and W. F. Richardson conducted the beach meeting in the evening. Speeches were made by Richardson, Combs, Platt, Harrington and Tyrrell. A great audience enjoyed this meeting, which was one of the very best of the season.

Among the additional preachers of our own to arrive next week are H. L. Willett, J. Z. Tyler and Geo. L. Snively. Of Congregational ministers, J. M. Campbell, Geo. H. Wilson, W. D. Westervelt, and perhaps others will come next week to remain a while, though they have made short visits here already. Graham Taylor comes and goes, but his family has been here for some time. We are in the midst of the peach belt here, and baskets of red, ripe peaches, fresh from the trees, are brought to our doors daily. The rain last night insures a plentiful supply of small fruits and vegetables. So there is no danger that the number of preachers here and coming will exhaust the supplies, especially as spring chickens are now ripe.

Current Religious Thought

As sin may become hienous to sinners so the dangers of conservatism sometimes becomes apparent to the conservative as witnesseth the following from The Independent:

Conservatism is good, but conservatism for conservatism's sake is dry-rot. Progressiveness is good, but change for the sake of change is a sure sign of weakness—not of strength. Paul's instruction to Timothy was that every man should be able to give a reason for the faith that is in him. It is a weak mind and a weak church that contents itself with a reason based on the findings of its ancestors. The ancestors may be right to-day, as they were yesterday; but it must be for reasons based on something more substantial than mere ancestorship. We honor them and build their monuments, but our loyalty to them is not necessarily gauged by a slavish acceptance of their ideas or following their action. When some enthusiastic devotees to the memory of Mary Lyon deprecated the changes that have resulted in Mount Holyoke College, one who knew her well, retorted: "Mary Lyon was a woman of common sense. She did the best she could under her circumstances and with her means. She would have been the last one to suppose that, under changed conditions, her methods should be perserved."

As against the opinion which has been expressed by a Freethinking publication in an eastern city. The St. Louis Christian Advocate says:

A comparison of the publications of 1895 with the ten preceding years might easily be made, but statistical figures generally constitute heavy reading. It is enough to say that the proportion already mentioned, of religious literature to the entire body of new publications, is for the last ten years about the same, sometimes rising a little, sometimes falling, but generally not far from 10 per cent of the whole. There is another point in this connection which is worthy of note, in the publishers' reports of American books, only two classes of publications, works of fiction and legal publications, exceed, in number, the books of a religious character. With regard to fiction it may be said that in every country where printing is done, tales and novels and romances form the largest class of publication, though it is also well to remember that quite a number of these, considering the lesson inculcated in the story, deserve to be classed with religious, while the legal publications do not represent, as a matter of fact, the original compositions of individual authors, for, in every state in this union, the annual or bi-annual Legislature issues from one to five volumes of statutes, while the opinions of the Supreme Courts of the different states and of the United States, number from 100 to 200 volumes annually. When these and the revised statutes are abstracted from the list of legal publications, the religious list will take precedence. In Great Britain, only the class of fiction and education hold a higher place in the list than books of religion. A showing of this kind ought to set at rest a wild statement made without reason or authority. When religious books form in each of the English-speaking countries one-tenth of the whole, and when, in actual numbers, they rank third, if not second, in the United States and third in Great Britain, there is little room for the assertion that interest in religious literature is falling off.

In Robert Stewart McArthur's article on "Historic Creeds and Baptist Churches," in the Standard, Aug. 6th, he says:

If ever there is organic unity, it will begin at the baptistery. Every denomination in Protestant Christendom, and in the entire Roman and Greek churches, can agree upon baptism, that is immersion, as taught by our Lord and his apostles. The Greek Church, numbering quite 90,000,000 of adherents, has ever been a stout witness on behalf of baptism. The Roman Church joyfully accepts it, and all the Protestant churches join hands with these two great bodies. On no substitute for baptism, whether pouring or sprinkling, can all the denominations agree. We are not here arguing a point; we are simply stating an incontrovertible fact. Do men really want organic Christian unity? Are they in earnest when they proclaim this desire? Are they willing to follow Christ into the waters of baptism? Are they willing to join hands with their brethren in all centuries and in all climes? Here is the opportunity; here is the truly apostolic and catholic ordinance. If they will but follow the apostolic injunction and example, then all can say: "We are buried with him by baptism unto death;" and then there may be, if it is desired, organic union without doing violence to the convictions of any, and in acknowledged harmony with the Word of God and its recognized interpretations. On but few points is the scholarship of the world so nearly a unit as it is in regard to the meaning of the word "baptism," as practiced by the apostles and the early church. It would be easy to fill pages with the names of learned authorities on all these points, and the simple-minded disciple of the Lord Jesus, with no guide but the New Testament, comes to the same conclusion. May the Holy Spirit lead all believers into all truth!

Those who are alarmed about the growth of Romanism should read an article in a recent number of the Observer (St. Louis), on its decay in the world. It is evident from the figures presented that Roman Catholicism is rapidly losing ground in Europe and America. We quote a few statements from the Observer:

At the close of the nineteenth century all the dominant nations of the earth, except Russia, are Protestant. At the close of the Napoleonic wars in 1815 Romanism was infinitely stronger than it is to-day. In the German-speaking world Roman Catholic Austria and not Protestant Prussia was the ruling and controlling power and continued to be until the Franco-Prussian war in 1870. The triumph of Protestant Prussia over Roman Catholic France in that great war was marked by the downfall of the Roman Catholic supremacy in things German. The German Empire, consisting of 52,000,000 of enlightened, progressive people, is more than two-thirds Protestant. Romanism has lost its prestige and power in United Germany and the trend of thought and life in that country is away from Roman Catholicism. One hundred years ago France was intensely loyal to the Vatican, but to-day the heart of France is intensely anti-clerical. We do not claim that France is Protestant, but we do claim that it is not loyally Roman Catholic. It is said by no less an authority than M. Taine that less than 2,500,000 Catholics in France are regular communicants. We could give many proofs of the statement that Romanism is decaying in the French Republic. There is even an alarming defection among Roman Catholic priests throughout France, and there is a movement, though still concealed, toward Protestantism. It is a notorious fact that every loyal Roman Catholic country is retrograding, politically and religiously. It is often contended that the Roman Catholic Church is about to accomplish Great Britain. So eminent an authority as the Methodist Times, of London, on this point, says: "The actual fact is that the Roman Catholic Church alone of all Christian churches is declining all over the world. As recently as 1850 the late Cardinal Manning prepared a series of notes in relation to the condition of Romanism in England. In these documents he states there are 1,500,000 Roman Catholics in England to-day, but that only 700,000 of them are English. Of the rest we may add, 100,000 are French, German and Italian, while 1,200,000 are Irish. Now all these were Romanists, but they came to England and so represent no increase whatever. The apparent growth of Romanism in this country (England) is almost entirely due to the immense Irish immigration. If the Irish and Continental Romanists should return to their countries Romanists in England would soon disappear."

Questions and Answers.

[We insert the following questions and answers in place of the regular department this week.]

ELDER JOSEPH FRANKLIN:—I come to you for more light on the church name question. Please answer the following questions through the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

1. Is the name "Church of God" scriptural?

2. If so, is the name "Church of Christ" scriptural? Are both names applied to the same body?

3. Is it scriptural to call churches "Disciple Churches?"

4. Is it scriptural to call churches "Christian Churches," or "Churches of Christians?"

By your answers you will be helpful to many inquirers.

SEARCHER AFTER TRUTH.

The above comes to me from one who was raised among the Winebrennerians, who use "Church of God" as their denominational designation. The writer has been in New England for some years, where he often hears of "Disciples" and "Disciple Churches."

1. "Church of God" is the common form of expression in the New Testament.

2. The name "Church of Christ" is not a common form of expression in the N. T. Once in Rom. 16:16 we find the plural, "Churches of Christ." Any one of those would have been "a Church of Christ." The general church is never called, "The Church of Christ." But Jesus is "Head over all to the church, which is his body." He calls it "my church." This seems to be authority for calling it, "The Church of Christ."

3 and 4. None of these expressions are in the N. T. But in the same way that Paul (1 Cor. 14:33) said "churches of the saints," we might say "churches of the disciples," or "churches of Christians." "Church of Christ" and "Christian Church" are two forms of the same name, just as we say "Church of England" and "English Church." Neither is more "scriptural" than the other.

We may simplify this discussion if we will abandon the fruitless search for a legal enactment affixing a title to some incorporated body. The denomination is often an incorporated body, but "the Church of God" is no more than the aggregate of the believers. When the church is called a body, reference is had to a physical body, and not to a corporation.

Again: In this endless discussion of names we are all intoxicated with denominational wine, and we are hunting after a name by which "we as a people" may be identified by a score or more of other "peoples." One "people" is separated from the others and is identified as, "The Methodist Episcopal Church." Another is known as, "The Presbyterian Church of the United States." With our thought running along this line we ask, "What is our proper name?" Thus put, the question means, "By what name are we to be distinguished from other denominations?" There are many parties or groups of professed Christians. Each has a name which applies to itself alone. What is "our" name?

We need not look into the N. T. for answer. The names therein apply to all Christians alike. All are "Christians," "disciples," "saints" or "believers." No designation in the N. T. serves to tell what kind of Christians any one group is and distinguish it from other groups. No N. T. name serves to classify and distinguish any one church among many professing to be Christian churches. This is the error of John Winebrenner and his co-laborers. They have adopted the name "Church of God" as the name of their church in such a way as to exclude all other churches from the use of it. In the same way a few anti-organ and anti-society leaders are trying to appropriate the name "Church of Christ" as the name of their party. Yet others are using "The Disciples," as a purely denominational epithet. Except for the capital "D" this is scriptural in form only. So is the name "Baptist." But both are unscriptural in application, because "The Baptists," and "The Disciples," are the names of two parties.

We are "Christians" or "disciples of Christ." But these names cannot locate us in any denominational connection. One church relation is that of membership in the "Church of Christ," or "Church of God." But the scriptural use of these names cannot locate us in any denominational church. JOSEPH FRANKLIN.

[This is all sound enough reasoning, except that it ignores the necessity that exists for distinguishing things that differ. As long as there are religious bodies having different creeds, different polities and distinct ecclesiastical organizations, there must be names by which we distinguish one from another, if we write about them or refer to them in any way. The wrong is, if wrong there be, in having religious bodies so different from each other as to necessitate different names. This is the reason why we say, "Disciples of Christ," with a capital D., because it is the least objectionable method of designating the churches of the Current Reformation when it is necessary to distinguish them from others, as it often is. It is perfectly useless to inveigh against distinguishing religious bodies from each other by some name. This will be done as long as these bodies exist.—EDITOR.]

SPIRITISM; OR THE WITCH OF ENDOR.

W. J. LHAMON.

"Why hast thou disquieted me to bring me up?"—1 Samuel 28: 15.

Hypnotism, clairvoyance, clairaudience, mind-reading, Christian science healing, and the phenomena of Spiritualism belong to one family of psychic forces, just as turnips and cabbages belong to the same botanical family. The species, however, in each case, are separated by such degrees that it requires the scientific mind to discover their kinship. What the botanist has done for us in showing that the turnip and cabbages are cousins, the psychologist is doing for us in showing that the above-named forces are closely related, and that their various phenomena spring from the same root.

Spiritualism, as a proposed religion, is scarcely half a century old, but hypnotics, and people with "a familiar spirit," are found far back in the dimest centuries. When mind-readers, and clairvoyants, and fortune-tellers and hypnotics were not understood, and people were incapable of a scientific study of them, they were either superstitiously courted as among the Romans and Egyptians, or peremptorily forbidden, as among the Jews. In this age we neither worship nor prohibit such things or such people; we simply put them into the crucible of scientific investigation. What is dross gets burned; the fire leaves only the gold.

Spiritualism proposes to do three things for us. In the first place, it proposes to prove for us that the spirit lives after the body is gone; that death is only transition; and that the life of the departed is, in general, more desirable than our own. It opposes materialism and annihilation, and seeks to teach us, as Whittier and all true poets do, that—

"Life is ever Lord of death,
And Love can never lose his own."

In this respect, its aims, when they do not spring from mercenary motives, are majestic. But its efforts are not needed. Christ has done this work a thousandfold better, and once for all, and without the suspicion of mercenary taint. Christ is a fact in history. He refuses to melt away in the crucible of criticism. His moral perfection equals the majesty of his spiritual claims, and both are transcendent. His resurrection is a fact, "the best established in all history." As the conqueror of death he has promised us eternal life, and his promises are final to all who trust him.

If the spirits were permitted to come back and communicate with us, would they need so much machinery about it? Would not my departed grandfather come immediately to me, rather than post off to some utter stranger, and then wait for me to hire that stranger to give him an introduction? And after the cash was paid would he still wait to be rapped up through an extension table, or smuggled out of a black muslin cabinet into a dark room, under the mesmeric influence of a piano or a brass band? In the case of old acquaintances, like that of mother and daughter, the presence of a medium with her hypnotic trance and her double slates and tables and cabinets and tests and messages and materializations would seem to be an impertinence. The necessary intervention of the medium is a presumption against the genuineness of the system. When Christ came back from the dead he needed no medium to help him into the presence of his disciples. He stood before them in simple grandeur and lifted up his pierced hands and said: "Behold my hands; and reach thither thy hand and thrust it into my side; and be not faithless, but believing."

Secondly. Spiritualism proposes to give us communications from the dead. One makes haste to admit that mediums do many curious things, and that they tell some things that must have been found out in unusual ways. One should not go so far as to deny the phenomena in order to be rid of the theory. That would neither be brave nor honest. It may be that when the whole matter is sifted, by far the larger per cent. of the doings of the mediums must pass for chaff. Evidence points that way. Perhaps nothing more conclusive in this line has been given to the world than the report of the Sybert commission. Mr. Henry Sybert was, during his lifetime, an enthusiastic believer in spiritualism. "Shortly before his death he presented to the University of Pennsylvania a sum of money sufficient to found a chair of philosophy, and to the gift added a condition that the university should appoint a commission to investigate all systems of morals, religion or philosophy, which assume to represent the truth, and particularly modern Spiritualism." Ten men of candor and scientific ability were chosen, and of these Mr. Geo. S. Fullerton was made secretary. Mr. Fullerton declares that he began his work without any bias against Spiritualism, but on the contrary, much impressed with what he had read, and in a fully receptive attitude. The investigations were thorough and painstaking. They had numerous meetings with slate-writing mediums; they attended materializing seances; they arranged for special experiments with the best known mediums, and they gave special attention to the mediums who advertized to read sealed letters and give answers to them. In the appendix to their published report (dated 1887), Mr. Fullerton says: "I have been forced to the conclusion that Spiritualism, so far at least as it has shown itself before me (and I give no opinion upon what has not fallen within my observation), presents the melancholy spectacle of gross fraud, perpetrated upon an uncritical portion of the community." This report is no less interesting than painful. When slates were not securely tied, the mediums opened them and wrote in them. When they were absolutely sealed no writing appeared in them, though they remained for weeks with the mediums. The materializations were made of the commonest sort of human clay, talking twaddle, susceptible to flattery, tickled with a toy, and altogether too childish and human ever to have been anywhere near a graveyard. Every one of the sealed letters submitted for tests to the advertising quack mediums in Boston and New York and Columbus was opened and read—cut across the end and again carefully sealed, or cut around the seals, and afterward nicely stuck down. The answers to these letters are very funny and contradictory. The spirits do not use good grammar; they cannot spell, and their poetry is shocking.

But, we are reminded, "The spirits do tell things that nobody but spirits could know." Rather, the mediums tell things that nobody but mediums could know. That is a different matter. The true medium is a clairvoyant, a mind-reader, more or less adept in the art. He finds a piece of mineral in your pocket. How did he know it was there? Did the spirits or his special "control" tell him? No, you told him. You and three other men were looking at it and talking about it; the medium sees all that just as you have it photographed in your memory. You carried it up stairs into an office; he sees that too. Finally he tells you that if you invest in the mine from which it came, you'll get rich. Yes, that's just what you were thinking, wasn't it? What is his prophecy worth? Precisely what your own judgment is worth when it is overheated with the fever of speculation.

Or you have a lock of hair, over which you have cried many times; you carry it with you, and the face of the one who wore it is like a photograph before you. The medium finds that lock of hair, and sees what you see. Under the power of hypnotic suggestion he immediately fixes you up a nice little story about your loved one gone, very general indeed, and full of platitudes, precisely such as he has told to a thousand other people with similar locks of hair. Mrs. Prior found such a lock of hair in St. George's Hall the other evening. It seemed to me rather suspiciously done up in a clean white envelope for the occasion. But we will give her credit for finding it. Mr. Bishop and the "White Mahatmas" have done more wonderful things. Mrs. Prior is not a first-class mind-reader. Her hits and misses are about evenly balanced. Poor Annie Armstrong came one night from the spirit world, wanting very much to see a dear friend. Either the friend was not present, or he was too cruel to respond. Surely, Mrs. Prior's audience will not soon forget the graphic picture she drew of the crippled American soldier, the "peg-leg," as she called him, stumping down the aisle. But no one would claim him. The medium caught sight of an elderly woman, rather large, with iron-grey hair; she had been dead about fifteen years. An impressible man about forty-five or fifty years old arose and claimed her for his aunt; he made a prolonged and excited speech, in the course of which he said that his aunt had died when he was a little baby. The applauding audience seemed not to notice the discrepancy as to date of death.

ROME OR JERUSALEM, WHICH?

BY S. K. SHELLENBERGER.

It is hard to break the chains forged in the middle ages. Unconsciously we accept the doctrines of the popes. Sentimentalism has been afraid to test the teachings of our fathers. Age may command respect, and not acceptance. We take off our hats as we enter the halls of antiquity, but we find that even there "all is not gold that glitters," that all was not truth that was taught. The finding of things ancient has become a fad in both the literary and art worlds. Theology, as well, is having its turn. "Back to the fathers," "back to the apostles," "back to Christ," "back to the original," are cries heard from the four winds of the earth. In the midst of these stirring times, sources and authorities should be looked to.

Doctrines being taught to-day are indeed ancient. Some, however, are not quite enough so. Often it is asked, "Is not the Roman, or 'Catholic' the oldest church, and therefore mother of all churches? Is not her teaching to be honored because of its age?" We answer,emphatically, "No." Jerusalem's church was the first one. Her doctrines are the most ancient, because there they began. Her teachings, by virtue of their origin, are entitled to the highest honor and respect.

The old story that Romanism preserved for us the Bible, we deny. On the contrary, it was the "woman" who "fled into the wilderness," whom the "dragon," the inspiration of the old "beast"—Romanism—persecuted so bitterly, that kept the Word for us. It was the souls of those who were slain "for the witness of Jesus and for the Word of God, who had not worshiped the beast, neither his image," that saved this precious boon from being submerged in the awful flood of the blood of martyrs. Let men stop giving the honor which belongs to him who said: "I am with you alway even unto the end," to the pope. He is a usurper. His sole ambition was, and is, to destroy the truth, and upon ignorance, to establish his own authority.

John, in the apocalypse,sees two churches, and only two. They are the true and the false. He sees them emblematically, as two cities—Zion and Babylon—and as women—the virgin and the harlot.

If the common Protestant interpretation of "the beast" of the apocalypse is true, that is, that it symbolizes popedom, (and we believe it is) then the authority of the pope comes directly from the devil; and he is therefore a stranger to anything God or Christ-like, save a stolen name. (For the inspiration of "the beast" see Rev. 13:4-11-15. If you want to know who the dragon was, see Rev. 20:2.)

Contrasted with the above-named beast, we have another, the Head of the true church. He is like unto a lamb and a lion, and received his authority from God. He is the "Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world," "the lion of the tribe of Judah."

The devil inspires the pope (human authority). The pope or human councils, delegates the bishops. The bishops lord it over the people, both great and small, who accept and teach and do what these human authorities have directed. On the other hand, God inspired Jesus Christ. Jesus delegates his apostles (or missionaries). The apostles rescue and save all who accept and teach and do as he, Jesus Christ, has directed.

These things being true, it is well, before lending our influence to these old doctrines, to test them. Are they from Rome or Jerusalem?

"Agonizing at the 'mourners' bench' " is readily traced to Rome's idea that God is a God of wrath instead of love. Heathenism gave the idea to Rome, and heathenism is of the devil. Laboring under this delusion, Rome instituted, first, the mediation of "Mary, mother of God." Then in their dire distress they grasped the idea of the intervention of "saints." Finally, in their deepening despair, they invented "purgatory." Willing to roast, if thereby they might appease the wrath of God. Protestantism left these methods withRome, but brought out with her the original idea. To-day she says to the penitent, "pray and plead, and plead and pray if, haply, God's wrath may be appeased and he may be reconciled to speak peace to your soul." Why beg for a morsel when the feast is spread before you? Jerusalem says: "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest." "Whosoever will, let him come and take of the water of life freely." "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish but have everlasting life."

The spending of such enormous sums of money in piles of brick and stone, ostensibly to worship God, but in reality to satisfy human ambition, is a relic of Rome. Heathenism taught that Deity could only be approached over altars surrounded by gilded walls. Rome caught the idea, confirmed it by a misunderstanding of the Jewish dispensation, and dedicated to—we will not say whom—the enormous and gorgeous temples of the middle ages. Behold the unostentatious places of meeting of the first Christians. Service, instead of show, was the moving idea. Protestants, to-day, in mock reverence, spend from one hundred thousand to half a million in a gorgeous, Christless pile, and whiningly plead poverty on missionary days. The devil and the bondholder both hold unliftable mortgages on these structures; and in their desperate struggle to pay the interest, the world, to whom God has sent us, is unthought of. Don't cry "pessimism." Statistics shockingly bear out the statement.

"Water salvation" as taught and practiced by Protestants in the sprinkling of babies, comes directly from Rome. Egyptian idolatry gave Rome the idea. Where did Egypt get it? Rome sprinkles the baby in the name of the pope and the holy Catholic Church. Then she confirms the youth in the belief that his sins are pardoned through the mediation of the pope. Perfectly consistent is she at least; for she has obeyed the pope's instructions through whom she hopes for salvation. Protestantism sprinkles the baby as per instructions of the pope, but does it in the name of Christ. Then she teaches the youth that Christ will honor the deed even to the abrogation of his own laws. Wholly *in*consistent is this because of the pretense to follow Christ, while obeying the pope.

Raising money, presumably for the Lord's work, by euchre parties, charity balls, "prettiest ladies," Trilby socials, and all other such undignified and un-Christian schemes, is simply a relic of the indulgence-selling of Tetzel times. I need not tell whence came that nefarious business. The principle is now the same as then. The object was to get money to build St. Peter's at Rome and leave the peddler a handsome profit. The end justified the means. The object to-day is to build our new church or frescoe the one we have, or pay for our new pipe organ. A laudable purpose of course. Hence the ends justify the means. If one be abreast with the van of church-socialism of to-day, and if he be conscientious in the Master's service he cannot help being saddened at the growing tendency toward Rome. There is a better way, a dignified way, a respectable way, a business-like way, a Christlike way. And we rejoice to record that our best pastors, our best churches, our best papers, advocate that way. It is not the pope's, but Jesus' way—systematic, proportionate giving.

Human creeds are merely relics of Rome, nothing more, nothing less. For 1600 years she did little but manufacture creeds, and excommunicate, torture and slay the men who had enough Christianity in them to be heretics. Brother Disciples, we condemn written creeds; beware, lest we have an *un*written one. Glad am I, that the golden thought is being grasped, that obedience, rather than interpretation is the test of fellowship with the Master.

Putting God under obligation to us by works is another Romish idea. Works of supererogation was taught by Rome. Hence the monasticism and asceticism of the middle ages. Luther at one time thought to merit salvation by kissing stones trod upon by holy (?) feet. The poor, deluded dupes of Southern Colorado, New Mexico, and Mexico, to-day think to merit salvation by flagellations with cacti, rolling naked in cactus beds, voluntary crucifixions, etc. Protestantism follows in the rear with the same idea, but with less bravery, teaching a mechanical Christianity which is only human piety. They would keep the fourth commandment, but break the first. They would commit us to ceremonies, and rituals, and let love "soar to serener climes." They would put us under the old covenant of specifics, avoiding the new covenant of basic principles.

Such teaching leads the moralist to ask such questions as appeared in the Christian Standard, March 12, page 324. We quote it: "If a person who is not a church member is as good as one who is, will he not stand as good a chance to be saved as the church member?" Here the answer there given.

1. "It is a very great error to suppose that a person can be saved without belonging to the church, just as he can by belonging to it." Why is it such a "great error?"

2. "The best people belong to the church." No argument in that.

3. "A man can't live as good a life out of the church as he can in." Selfishly moral, he can. Honesty and sobriety are found outside the church as well as in.

4. "The greatest sin is to reject God's mercy." Mistaken again. See Matt. 12: 31.

5. "If a man gain heaven without Christ, then God made a mistake in the plan of salvation." What is there in this that would regenerate a man?

Where is the answer to the original question? Were I the author of that question I should now be thoroughly confirmed in my moralistic views. For both question and answer teach the old Romish idea of mechanical Christianity, namely: that by works we merit salvation, and God is obliged to save us. The difference between the student and teacher here is simply in the conception of the kinds of works necessary to salvation. Why not frankly say that a liar isn't a man, a cheat isn't a man, a thief isn't a man. The fact that one refrains from these and similar evils does not put even me, his fellow-man, under obligation to him. He has only done what any man ought to do. Upon what grounds will he merit a reward? He will of necessity go to the pope for his hope on this basis.

Works are never a means to, but a result of, salvation. The life of the peach bears peaches according to the inevitable. So the Spirit or life of Christ in us bears Christ-like deeds, fruit of the Spirit, according to the inevitable. Through or because of this Spirit we are saved. Rom. 8:11, and similar passages. To be without this Spirit is death. How, then, do we get this Spirit. Acts 2:38. Why not simply say in answer to such questions, "Have you obeyed? If not, then you are still an alien and 'without hope and without God in the world.'" Why not tell them plainly if they will not march under the "banner of Emanual" they never can claim protection under it. The only "work" that God recognizes is the fulfilling the commission. That cannot be done by trusting in one's own selfish Pharisaical works.

Let us stop dodging questions. Back to the divine original! Jerusalem is always right. Rome is always wrong.

ORGANIC EVOLUTION CONSIDERED.

ROBT. T. MATHEWS.

In making out a list of books for preachers, and in naming those on the subject of evolution, I should certainly recommend Prof. Fairhurst's "Organic Evolution Considered." On the face of it, it is the work of a live teacher. Those of us who have seen the author in the schoolroom, with his large class rising around him, will remember how swiftly the hour passed in the flow of his vital teaching. One can but feel in this cool-headed book of science the personal intentness and forcefulness of the teacher. Joubert says that the best writings of scholarship are the work of the experienced teacher. Prof. Fairhurst's volume, therefore, has this high recommendation to begin with, that it is the product of one, who, while teaching, has devoted himself daily to study and thought.

Some readers have fallen into a wrong estimate of the contents and trend of the book. It has been thought that the author is making a wholesale war on evolution in general. Strictly speaking, however, his work is a powerful polemic against atheistic evolution. By all means, let every reader "chew and inwardly digest" the "Introduction" and the chapter on "Method of Creation." Here will be found whole paragraphs of clear discriminations and balanced judgments. Let a few of these be quoted:

"It is a fact, I believe, that the propagation of the theory of evolution has decreased belief in theism. While this may be true, the fact should not be lost sight of that a belief in the former is consistent with a belief in the latter."

"At bottom the question as to the method of creation is only a dispute between theism and atheism."

"Evolution may be atheistic, but it is not necessarily so."

With this correction of some superficial readings of the book, it is then in order to recognize what a strong case Prof. Fairhurst makes out against any theory of evolution that ignores the presiding and pervasive energy of Deity. The logic of the book is to show, by the many concessions of stout evolutionists themselves, how impossible it is to account for creation apart from God. The author's polemic is none too strong, not only against atheistic evolutionists and agnostic evolutionists, but against a class, who, on account of their faint references to Deity, may be called quasi-theistic evolutionists. A thorough interpretation of Prof. Fairhurst's argument still leaves the way open for a sound theory of theistic evolution.

How this can be, may be seen in the author's summation of "possible theistic theories, according to which new organic forms may have been brought into existence."

"First, the Creator may have created each species by means of secondary agencies alone, by the process of evolution.

"Second, he may have created each species from inorganic matter by means of a special fiat.

"Third, he may have created certain types of living beings from inorganic matter by special fiats, and from these types he may have evolved, by secondary agencies, all other forms.

"The existence of secondary causes implies a primary cause. The unity in nature shows that the primary cause is one, and not many.

"The method of creation is nothing except as it bears on our interpretation of the nature of the creative power. Theism stands in no danger from creation by secondary causes, for they are consistent with the existence of an intelligent Creator. Evolution may be atheistic; but it is not necessarily so. Either of the above methods of creation may be theistic."

CHURCH ORGANIZATION AND GOVERNMENT.*

J. E. COBBEY.

Of the cause first. The membership of our church boards may be, in a general way, divided into three classes. First, those who do not understand business methods, have never used them and looked upon such methods as official red tape, the use of which is to be avoided if possible. Who have always kept track of their own business in their heads and cannot see why the church business cannot be done in the same way.

They fail to realize that while one man may keep track of a small business in his head and transact it without rules, a board of from seven to fifteen members cannot do the same business without a system and de finire rules. Second, those who understand business methods and believe in using them in the business world, but have an idea that they ought not be applied to church work. Third, a small minority who both understand business methods and believe in using them in church business, but are powerless to make reforms. All of these men are honest and desire to do their duty. Meeting with the board as an advisor and helper is the pastor. The pastor usually has a prejudice against business methods, and a disinclination to advise in business matters. The board of deacons have no confidence in the pastor's advise on business matters, and feel offended if he presumes to advise them. The result is that the business of the church is so conducted that it is referred to with scorn and jeering by those both in and out of the church.

Now as to the remedy. I believe that our people should insist that our preachers should be equipped not only with a knowledge of the Bible, but with a thorough, practical business education as well. Our Bible and theological schools to-day should be more practical. They should instruct the young preacher as to the best form of a church record. How it should be kept; how the secretary's books should be kept; how the treasurer's books should be kept; and teach him bookkeeping enough to tell whether the work was well-done, or, if necessary, that he might keep the church books himself. In other words, the preacher should be an all-around business man. He should be taught in these schools the legal steps necessary to organize a church; what constitutes the best official board; how many deacons; how many elders; the duties of each. What class of men are best-fitted for each position; how the board should be organized; what committees appointed. In fact, so far as the church has to do with the law of the land, the rules of parliamentary bodies or of business,he should be a legal, parliamentary and business expert, ready on the instant to advise or direct. Such a man would compel respect from all parties and they could not long look with coldness on his plea for a better moral or spiritual life. But you say, of what good is this to us, our schooldays are past? If you see the necessity for this class of education, you can bring a pressure to bear on our Bible-schools and theological seminaries that will induce them to give a part of their time to instruction in those branches. The preachers of this generation are better equipped than those of the last. It is our duty to see that those of the next generation are still better equipped. On the other hand, it is no excuse for you that you were not taught on these subjects in your schools. The last instruction of your alma mater was that you continue to grow in knowledge, and the last wish of that venerable president was, that you might build a strong, broad and high superstructure upon the foundation he had assisted you for four years in laying. If this knowledge is needed by you, if it will add to your power for good, you are recreant to the trust that college reposed in you, you are neglecting your duty to the cause to which you have pledged your life, if you do not provide for obtaining this knowledge at once.

I am aware that while our church organizations have within their membership many bright minds capable of organizing them to a higher degree of efficiency, we, as a people, are the poorest organized of any denomination of church people. With the splendid material in our ranks this would not be discouraging were it not that at the first attempt at organization and discipline, a large number of misguided, but earnest, members raise the blood-stained banner of oppression, and cry, Creed! Creed! And the majority of our membership answer at once, and with emphasis: Away with organization! Down with rules! While this prejudice is non-scriptural and illogic, if not positively unchristian, still it exists and must be considered in solving the problems.

With this in mind I would suggest: That this meeting discuss these matters fully. That you instruct your pastor in the legal steps necessary to organize a church. Let this meeting appoint a committee to prepare a form of legal organization which this body shall recommend to all churches. At your next meeting let each pastor report whether his church is legally organized. If not, let him give a reason, if he can, why he has not had it legally organized.

Let this meeting set apart a day for the discussion and adoption of a plan of organization for church government. Have papers prepared by your stronger men on this subject. Discuss how many trustees are best, the minimum of the three provided by statute or more? How many constitute the official board? Who are they? The trustees? The elders? The deacons? All of them together? Or an entirely separate board? How is this official board selected? Elected or appointed? How many members should it have? Should they come from the body of the membership? Would it not be better to let the various church societies, as the C. E., the Bible-school, the Aid Society, etc., name part of this board? What officers and committees should this board have when organized? Their powers and duties?

How the treasurer's book should be kept? What they should show? Enquire into the form used by the different churches; after obtaining all possible information, recommend to the churches the form, that in your judgment, is best. Then ask a report, at each yearly meeting, of the system as to its practical working.

Adopt the same plan as to the clerk's record.

Take up the subject of church finances and discuss the assessment plan, the pledge plan, or any other plan used by any church, and recommended for adoption by the churches, the plan which after investigation shall seem to you the best.

Church finances are a source of annoyance and irritation. The entire system is wrong and should be cast out, root and branch, and a new system built up. Let us teach the people how to give. Let this gathering and each of your preachers place before the people the Bible evidence of their duty to tithe their earnings for the benefit of the Lord's work. Understand the subject first yourselves, then talk it over with your board, talk it over with your members individually and collectively, then when a man has given his one-tenth conscientiously, don't at the end of the year, with a sanctimonious face say to him that the Lord loves a cheerful giver, and ask him to contribute to make up a deficiency of some one else. Don't take up an extra contribution in a public meeting where this man must either give liberally or have the finger of scorn pointed at him, for what the people unjustly believe to be his parsimony. Better go privately to those who have not paid their tenth. If you must publicly collect for your congregation, you should know who has given their tenth. Take no man's word on this. Examine their books, for such men keep books, and if asked, in a proper spirit, are glad to show them. Then say to your congregation, Bro. A. and Bro. B. have, in the past year, to my knowledge, given all that the Lord requires of them, and this appeal is not to them. If these men then choose to aid in reducing the deficiency, you can say to them, without hypocrisy, the Lord will bless a cheerful giver.

Don't hold any more church socials where members are expected to come and get acquainted at an admission of fifteen cents per head to pay for the ice cream and cake which some good mother has furnished free of charge. Don't place the best looking girl of your congregation right in front of the door with a grab-bag contrivance, at five cents a grab. And the little seven-year-old tot just beyond, to pull from your pocket the last nickel of the quarter, for a flower which your wife picked from your own garden as she took your arm to come to the church sociable.

If you need a quarter, say so, and go to the members who are in arrears to the Lord and get it. But make the church sociable free or change its name.

Let us all labor to teach our churches to live within their income. Make our church boards understand that it is just as disastrous to run a church at an expense of fifty dollars per week, when the income is but thirty dollars per week, as it is for a bank cashier to live at an expense of two thousand dollars per year on an income of but one thousand per year. The result is just as certain, and just as disreputable in one case as in the other. I know that these defects in our church business system are wide-spread and deep-rooted; that reform cannot be brought about in a day or in a year, or perhaps not in a generation, but it is none the less desirable. It is none the less our duty to make the beginning. We look to you as leaders to sound the note of alarm. It is your sacred duty to lead the way. Not blindly, not in a perfunctory manner, but with wisdom and intelligence. Will you do it?

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK).

The eighth annnal convention of the Baptist Young People's Union of America was held at Buffalo, N. Y., July 14-17. The receipts for the year as shown by the treasurer's report were $70,160.18, of which $47,159.02 was from the Baptist Union, $12,688.70 borrowed money, and $721.57 from contributions to the "founding fund." Sale of supplies brought in $7,996.03. The disbursements on account of the general organization were $5,801.89; on account of the paper, $42,599.76; for supplies $8,128.82. The deficit for the year of the organization as a whole, including the paper which is now self-supporting, was $1,026,29 as against $1,738.17 last year. A review of the seven years' history of the Baptist Young People's Union of America was given by Rev. J. R. Gow, of Somerville, Mass. He dwelt chiefly on the origin of the union as a compromise between two classes of people; those who desired an exclusively denominational society, and those who were unwilling to take any step that might lessen the interdenominational fellowship of Christian Endeavor. The critical points in the history of the union, when these two parties threatened to clash, were frankly pointed out.

The report comes from Louisville that Dr. W. H. Whitsitt has resigned the presidency of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary and expects to retire from the position at the end of the coming school year, in May next. It has been evident for some time past, that he could not withstand the fierce opposition with which he was meeting, and it is probably for the best that he thus takes himself out of the way. He will go, bearing the respect and esteem of a large number of friends, and especially with the affectionate regard of members of the faculty and the students, as well as the graduates of the seminary. He became connected with the seminary soon after the close of the war, while it was yet at Greenville, S. C., and has been a constant quantity and power during all the years of its history since that time. His resignation will take away from many Southern Baptist exchanges their stock subject, and will compel them to skirmish about for something else to fill their editorial columns. —Journal and Messenger.

Our Budget.

—Peace prospects please prayerful people.

—Read Church Extension literature in this paper.

—The harvests of another summer will soon be gathered.

—We continue to receive many congratulations on our new form.

—We have had to condense many letters to get their contents in this paper.

—We have several other interesting letters which we could find no room for at all last and this week.

—The Spanish-American war will necessitate a revision of party platforms on both sides of the Atlantic.

—The General Christian Missionary Convention meets at Chattanooga, Tenn., October 14th to 20th, and the time will soon be here.

—B. B. Saunders and E. M. Danthil report a good meeting at Garland, Texas, this week.

—Our type is smaller than formerly, and more copy is absorbed each number now than when in our old form, and yet the demand upon our columns for space is greater than we can meet.

—One brother writes that he likes the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST'S new form because he can hold it in one hand and the baby in the other. This example of familiarizing a child in early life to the pages of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is a good one and ought to be commended to others whose babies, children and even grown-up sons and daughters who have seen nothing but their father's political-party-paper or the farm journal.

—In a letter from Prof. Charles W. Kent, of the University of Virginia, we learn that the prospects for the Bible work there next year are very fine and that they are looking forward with great pleasure to having Dr. C. A. Young, our Chicago correspondent, with them for two or three months.

—J. H. Blake, of Drexel, Mo., thinks that Port Arthur, Tex., is one of the most promising cities of the union and the country thereabout the best for agricultural purposes he has yet seen. He regards these as places offering excellent inducements to homeseekers. A special excursion train will leave Kansas City, Mo., for Port Arthur, Sept. 6th, and he urges all who can to take this opportunity to see that country for themselves. For further particulars address J. H. Blake, Drexel, Mo.

—Our Extension Fund is a necessity from the fact that in the majority of cases mission churches cannot borrow money by the ordinary means. Banks, Insurance Companies, Building Associations and money-lenders generally do not want to loan money on mission church property, because collections of interest and principal are slow, and they do not want the ill-will of people by foreclosing mortgages on mission chapels. They avoid all trouble by refusing to loan. Our Board of Church Extension, while taking first mortgage for the security of the loan, does not forclose except in a case where long forbearance ceases to be a virtue.

—W. P. Throgmorton speaks most courteously and nobly of his opponent, J. B. Briney, in the Allen Springs debate, in his paper, the Baptist News. He says:

We found our opponent a nice gentleman indeed, and we are sure that we have never had a more pleasant debate with any man; though we have had several which have been very pleasant. Bro. Briney has had experience and understands well the rules of controversy. He is honorable and fair and knows how to act the Christian gentleman. He made as able a defense of his positions as it has been our privilege to hear, taking the discussion clear through. We shall remember him with feelings of kindness and friendship, and the Allen Springs debate will always be a bright page in memory's album.

—It is reported that W. P. Throgmorton and J. B. Briney have agreed at some time in the future to repeat the discussion on the design of baptism and the work of the Holy Spirit, which they have just concluded at Allen Springs, Ill. This repetition may be oral or in writing; most probably the latter. It is then to be published in book form, so that all who are interested in those questions may have in permanent form the best these scholarly opponents have to say for the positions on them. We expect in the meantime to have a good report of their recent debate for our readers.

—A preacher of good ability, education and character, desiring to preach the gospel where it is most needed, proposes that if any member or any person will furnish him employment at fair wages in any line of work where he can earn a living, he will preach for any congregation in need for one year, free of charge; or he would be willing to give his time and labor to any church that feels itself unable to employ a preacher if it will guarantee to support him while he is among them. There are scores of congregations living on monthly or semi-monthly preaching that would do well to make an arrangement of this kind whereby they would secure the labors of a good man all his time with little or no more cost to themselves than is involved in the support of monthly or semi-monthly preaching. Any congregation addressing the editor of this paper will be put in correspondence with the preacher above referred to.

—The concentrated fire of all the church papers and pulpits is now pouring in upon the "Camp Canteen" and we hope that these vessels of dishonor will soon meet the same end that befell Cervera's fleet. They are the enemy of our army, our homes and our country.

—When Admiral Cervera learned that in the great battle in which his fleet was annihilated the Americans lost only one man killed and two wounded, struck by the marvelous disparity he exclaimed, "God willed it so."—The Christian Endeavor World.

There are others of the same opinion.

—The St. Louis Republic, of this city, proposes enlarging upon the feature of religious news in such a way as to be of greater interest and usefulness to the churches in the state of Missouri than heretofore. It proposes to take notice, in a more extended way, of all conventions, protracted and revival meetings throughout the state of which it can get information. This enlargement idea was the suggestion of Rev. Samuel I. Lindsay, the editor of the religious news department, and we may also say, religious editor of the St. Louis Republic. Dr. Lindsay has been a city pastor for a number of years and will understand how to use this department to the advantage of the churches and benefit of the religious world. We are glad to see our leading journals of the secular press opening their columns wider to religious news. This necessarily means less of the froth and scum of the city in their columns. We hope that Dr. Lindsay and the Republic will have the hearty co-operation of all the preachers of Missouri in this work. Send all religious news you have direct to him in care of the St. Louis Republic. Preview reports are preferred.

—W. F. Irwin, of Bronson, Mo., writes of a very destitute region thereabouts, religiously, and suggests that preachers seeking a new field for pioneer and missionary work, remember them. If our State Mission Board, however, had the money no such church-barren districts could be found in Missouri.

—J. W. Hilton, of Bethany, Neb., says that the canvass now being made to free Cotner University from debt promises to accomplish the work, by God's blessing, this present year. There will be great rejoicing to hear that there is even a fair prospect of saving this beautiful property to our people and to the cause of education. Bro. Hilton will keep us informed of the progress of the canvass.

—J. B. Sayers, Co. A, 2nd Kentucky Vol., Inft., writes us an interesting letter from Camp Thomas, Chattanooga, Tenn., telling of his visit to the Nashville Endeavor Convention, by permission, and of Endeavor and religious work among the soldiers. We are glad to read of such work and to see such faith in our soldiers. He suggests that inasmuch as soldiers can buy good literature there cheaper than it can be sent, that, outside of Bibles, their friends should send them the cost in cash instead. As a rule this will also work better along the line of eatables which are apt to spoil en route.

—The following timely suggestion appeared in an article in the Times, Washington, D. C., by J. Fraise Richard:

While it is proper and stimulating that our soldiers and sailors should receive the thanks of the nation through the President and his Cabinet, it is equally incumbent that the President and his subordinates should be equally remembered and commended for meritorious actions in whose honors all the people participate.

—There will always be some cases where we must give money to aid neighboring missions, especially until our Extension Fund gets larger. However, if the churches hasten to build up this fund, they will be speedily relieved of these irregular appeals and will have the satisfaction of making a successfully managed work a great power in our growing church.

—We publish the program of the Minnesota State Convention in this paper. All our state and district programs this year appear to be prepared with more care than usual and promise better conventions than ever, in each state. Their composite character necessitates lengthy programs, but these variations may prevent monotony and greatly enhance their interest, especially along the entertainment line. They seem to be a happy blending of business, edification and Christian fellowship.

—Joseph Levering, of Baltimore, Md., has issued a circular letter calling upon churches, organizations and associations of every character which believes the canteen to be injurious to the "Boys in Blue," to pass resolutions setting forth that fact and petitioning the President for its removal from every camp and Soldiers' Home over which float the Stars and Stripes, emblem of protection and liberty, and to forward same to him by mail. The suggestion is a good one and ought to flood the "White House" with resolutions.

—We have just received the Fourteenth Annual Report of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society's Committee in Japan. Our work began in the Sunrise Kingdom in 1883. The report is published in Tokyo. It shows sixteen American missionaries and eight native preachers and helpers. The membership is 484, or a gain of 125 during the past year. There are 22 Sunday-schools with 690 pupils, seven day-schools with 321 pupils. There are eight houses of worship and 40 places of meeting. Altogether the report will compare favorably with many state reports in this country, where the gospel has been preached so long. The report is adorned with three admirable illustrations of our missionaries and the churches and schools in Japan. A card addressed to A. McLean, Corressonding Secretary, Cincinnati, Ohio, will secure a copy free of charge.

—The Register-Review, of Kansas City, Mo., is to hand. This new journal is the result of a combination of the Christian Review, of Kansas City, Mo., and the Church Register, of Plattsburg, Mo. It is a sixteen-page journal, half the size of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, with G. A. Hoffmann and R. L. Wilson, first editors. There are several departments, one of which is "State Mission Notes," edited by T. A. Abbott, Corresponding Secretary of the State Board. The paper seems to be organized editorially with a view of special helpfulness to the different interests of the churches of Missouri and we trust that the expectation of its promoters may be realized. we congratulate the Register-Review upon its neat appearance and newsy columns. The Register-Review will appear semi-monthly.

—Bro. Kimball, who has just returned from the Throgmorton and Briney debate at Allen Springs, Ill., says that it was one of the pleasantest affairs of his life. The disputants kept in good spirit from first to last and their closing remarks and hand-shake before the audience brought tears to many eyes. No bitterness was engendered among the people by their arguments and the debate partook more of the nature of a revival meeting than a polemical investigation. The sessions were well attended and the kindliest feeling predominated throughout, so that it may be said that the Baptists and Disciples in and about Allen Springs, Ill., know and understand each other better than ever before.

—The following paragraph from a letter from Harry E. Mitchell, a West Point cadet, is of interest and encouraging in that it shows that religion is not losing its hold upon all the young men of our country:

You will probably be surprised to learn of the existence of a Y. M. C. A. at West Point. We have an average enrollment of about 320 in the Academy and about 300 of these are members of the Y. M. C. A. And we have leaders enough to last almost a whole year without any one leading twice. And then, too, we have two meetings each week. Cadet Boggs, the "honor man" of the last graduating class was our late president and Mr. Williams, so well known in football circles, was also a good leader. Mr. McClure, of Kentucky, is our present president and is a member of the Christian Church; but in that Association denominations are very, very seldom mentioned. We have almost perfected church union as far as it refers to us.

—The Church of Christ at Collinwood, Ohio, was dedicated July 31st. The services of the day began with a sunrise prayer-meeting. The address of the day and the sermon at night were delivered by President E. V. Zollars. Charles Darsie is the pastor. A good program for the day was carried out.

—The Chicago Times-Herald publishes the brief of a sermon recently preached at People's Institute, Chicago, by J. H. O. Smith, in which he said:

The world must recognize the rights of every man, whether a Southern sun has tanned his skin or a Northern clime has bleached him white. The extension of our territory has outrun our expectation and taken us by surprise, but it may be a part of the divine plan that the United States shall extend its protectorate and civilization over other lands. If so the trust must be solemnly accepted. Our statesmen will extend the arts of peace, and American Protestants and Catholics in making the contribution of a non-sectarian Christianity, which is the only true guarantee of liberty.

PERSONAL MENTION.

Dr. B. B. Tyler, of our editorial staff, is said to be engaged with the Broadway Church at Lexington, Ky., for a meeting in the near future.

E. M. Smith, pastor of the Beulah Christian Church, this city, has returned with his family from his vacation, and resumed his pulpit work last Sunday.

Mrs. J. R. Holdeman, our agent at Springfield, Mo., has been sick for two weeks, but hopes to be able to resume her work soon.

J. W. Strawn would like to hold one or two protracted meetings in Central, Mo., this fall. Address him at Miami, Mo.

The church at Litchfield, Ill., for financial reasons is unable to keep their pastor, J. O. Henry, and officially commend him to any church in need of a good, faithful, efficient pastor. E. M. Austin, church clerk at Litchfield, will cheerfully answer any questions in relation to him.

W. H. Bybee, of Bolivar, Mo., would like to hold two meetings during October and November of this year. Churches wanting a protracted meeting should correspond with him direct at Bolivar.

Pastor H. O. Breeden is spending August in the mountains of Colorado.

W. A. Foster will assist Pastor F. L. Platt, of Waterloo, in a tabernacle meeting.

S. B. Ross, of Oelwein, Ia., is assisting in the erection of the new house at Brainard.

C. H. Van Low, Iowa's Judge Schofield, has taken unto himself a wife. One of the accomplished daughters of Iowa City has assumed with him life's responsibilities. Their home is in Marshalltown.

T. R. Hodkinson, of Clarksville, Ia., preached at Olin August 7th.

Lawrence McCrea visited Marble Rock, Ia., on same date.

R. W. Abberly, of Columbus, Ohio, will hold a meeting at Charles City, Iowa, in September.

M. S. Johnson, of Jefferson, Iowa, reports church improvements of $300.

A. W. Taylor, of Cincinnati, Ohio, is spending a month in Harlam, Iowa.

J. R. Johnson and Bro. Pardee are in a meeting at Kent, Iowa.

Vernon J. Harrington is in a meeting at Clewfield, Ia.

J. R. McIntire, of Chicago, is now in Iowa. He may locate in Tingley.

Thos. C. McIntire, his brother, has located at Atlantic, Ia.

C. C. Rowlinson will take Marshalltown Sept. 1st.

S. D. Dutcher, pastor Walnut Hills Christian Church, Cincinnati, preached at Hannibal, Mo., one of his old pastorates, last Sunday.

J. A L. Romig, will dedicate the new tabernacle at Fremont, Neb., Aug. 14th.

Howard C. Rash, of Salina, Kan., is at Portland, Oregon, for a rest.

Wallace Thrapp, of Augusta, Georgia, has accepted the call to Crawfordsville, Ind.

Marion Stevens, pastor Edwards Street Church, Decatur, Ill., holds a Bible Institute at Lewiston this month.

John J. Higgs is now preaching for the Bloomfield and Creighton churches in Nebraska. His home is at Bloomfield.

Owing to the absence of Dr. C. A. Young from Chicago, we have no Chicago Letter this week. He is in the "Old Dominion," speaking three times a day. He reports the Piedmont Assembly, which he attended, a grand success. Bro. E. M. Smith, pastor of the Beulah Christian Church, this city, also visited that Assembly and was not unmindful of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST while there. Bro. Young also attended the Martinsville Convention which he says was well attended. His next point is to be the Tidewater District Convention at Mathews, Virginia.

W. H. Wilson, of Rush Springs, Indian Territory, called at this office on last Monday.

I. N. McCash, of University Place Church, is at the lakes in Northern Iowa for a month.

Melancthon Moore, pastor of the church at Brookfield, Mo., writes that he has been called to remain there another year. About forty were added to that church during the past year under his ministry.

John L. Stine, of Reserve, Kansas, writes he would like to correspond with some minsiter who can live on about $600 per year, in a field where there is a bright outlook for the future. In writing give age, experience, educational advantages and reference.

R. A Thompson, who has been preaching for the church at DeSoto, Mo., for two months, preached for the Compton Heights Christian Church, this city, last Sunday.

W. R. Jinnett, pastor of the First Christian Church, East St. Louis, Ill., has returned from a visit to friends at Eureka, Ill.

D. F. Snider, pastor of the church at Stockport, Ia., has resigned to take effect Sept. 25th. He has accepted a call to preach for the church at Creston, Ia.

J. F. King writes that he is now employed to preach for the church at Formosa, Kas., for an indefinite period of time. He was at Wellfleet, Neb.

A. C. Smithers and his wife, of Los Angeles, Cal., will spend two weeks at Chautauqua this month, then two weeks in Kentucky, after which they will return to Los Angeles, where and when Bro. Smithers will begin the ninth year of his ministry for the First Church at that place. They called at Bethany Park on their way to Chautauqua. We are sorry they could not have stopped off in St. Louis long enough to see the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Clergyman's Statement

Nerve Strength Gained by Taking Hood's Sarsaparilla.

BRIGHTON, IOWA.—Rev. Bernard M. Shulick of this place, owing to weakness of the nerves, was for a time unable to attend to his duties. He makes this statement: "I have suffered for a long time from weak nerves. After I had taken a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla I became quite well again. The weakness of the nerves has now wholly disappeared and I am able to attend to my duties again. I am therefore grateful to Hood's Sarsaparilla and I recommend it to everyone who suffers from weak nerves."

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Is the best—in fact the One True Blood Purifier.

Hood's Pills are the only pills to take with Hood's Sarsaparilla.

W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, Mo., has an admirable paper in the June number of The American Home Missionary, on "Unity Among the Disciples of Christ in the Same City." This paper will bear careful study and much prayerful meditation by the pastors of all our larger cities.

B. S. Denny, of Hampton, made the address August 4th at the laying of the cornerstone at Dows, Iowa. He was assisted by Pastors F. L. Davis and W. F. McCormick.

G. A. Ragan, of Oskaloosa, visited Chicago last week, and Prof. Youngblood preached for him August 7th.

R. W. Lilly has accepted the ministry of the Word for the church at Lynchburg, Va. He was at Chicago, Ill.

G. E. Shanklin has resigned at Slater, Mo., after a four years' pastorate, to take effect Sept. 30th, and would like to correspond with any church desiring a pastor. Address him at the above place.

Through the New England Messenger we learn that Bro. A. Flower, who sojourned during fall, winter and spring in Florida, has returned to Boston and is doing some preaching in the city.

Owing to J. S. Myers' departure from Sedalia, he has disposed of The Christian, of which he was editor, to F. L. Cook, its former business manager. The Christian has been one of the freshest and newsiest exchanges that comes to our table.

On Monday evening, July the 25th, Bro. F. O. Fannon, pastor of the First Church in St. Louis, spoke to a large audience in our church. He came on a visit to some old friends and right royally were his visit and sermon enjoyed. Bro. Fannon held a successful meeting for the church here about ten years ago, and our people became attached to him and have loved him and praised him ever since. He is a man zealous for the Master, princely in bearing, noble in purpose and grandly warm-hearted. He reports his work in the First Church in St. Louis as being in every way prosperous.—The Christian.

E. M. Miller, of Rockwell City, Ia., writes: "We close our work here Lord's day, Aug. 14. During the two years we have been here the membership of the church has increased from about 55 to 95. It has been a great pleasure to note the growth in grace and good works among the members. The church is without a building, but a good start has already been made toward the erection of a house. A beautiful lot, in the best possible location, has been bought and practically paid for, and there is in the treasury, in pledges and cash, nearly $600 for a building. Good workers, liberal givers, good audiences and regular attendance are some of the hopeful signs of the church in Rockwell City. My successor has not yet been chosen, but will be soon if a satisfactory man can be found. I will not locate till I have taken a needed rest.

Correspondence.

New York Letter.

We are enjoying our vacation this season at Sing-Sing-Heights-on-the-Hudson, at the old camp-meeting grounds, which is the oldest camping place for religious purposes in this part of the country—this being the sixty-seventh year of the assembly. Hence the Sing-Sing camp-meeting antedates by many years, Ocean Grove, Old Orchard and other similar places. It is a beautiful little town of tents and cottages in the midst of an extensive grove of oak and pine trees, which have grown to immense proportion through these years. Of the services we hope to speak in our next letter as at this writing they are only beginning. We had only gotten into the country and settled down to rest when on the Lord's day a message came announcing the death of Sister Salina Catharine Sinclair one of our oldest and best-loved members in the 169th Street Church.

"Grandma," as she was familiarly called by many of us, became a Christian in her fourteenth year and was baptized in the Hudson River. At twenty-five years of age she was married to David Sinclair, a young man of spotless Christian life, who unfortunately was spared to her only about thirteen years after their marriage. This union was blessed however with six children, the first two of whom being twins died in infancy; the other four survive her. They are: Miss Nellie E., Mrs. A. H. S. Lobingier, William A., and David C., all of whom were with her until the last, except David who lives in Idaho.

Mrs. Lobingier, her second daughter, is the widow of our late and honored Brother Henry Schell Lobingier, who for four years was the beloved pastor of this church. She has lived at her mother's home since his death and here her two lovable children, Vida and Leslie, have grown up almost to maturity. Sister Sinclair's home was in a peculiar sense "the church home" of the congregation. There was not a member of the church however humble who did not find a cordial welcome within her hospitable home, for she, with every member of her family, had a deep ane abiding interest in the welfare of the church. She brought her children up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. They sing in the church choir, teach and work in the Sunday-school, in the Christian Endeavor Society, the Ladies' Aid, mission band and in fact in every activity of the church they are earnestly engaged. It is largely because of their mother's influence before them. She passed away Saturday evening, July the 30th, and on Monday evening, August the 1st the funeral services were held at her late home 1280 Franklin Avenue, in the in the presence of a large number of relatives and friends, and on Tuesday she was laid to rest in the family plot in Greenwood.

She was a very dear friend to me and mine. We made our home with her family for almost a year after coming to New York, and she and her excellent family did all in their power to make us feel at home with them. Her life was one beautiful righteousness. Her death was victorious in faith and her hope was strong and steadfast to the end. To those of us who knew her well, her memory is a precious heritage. And now she sleeps the sleep of the just. She rests from her labors and her work do follow her, and through them, though dead, she yet speaks.

Bro. E. M. Flinn, who recently graduated from Union Theological Seminary in this city, has just received and accepted a unanimous call to the pastorate of the Church of Christ, Haverhill, Mass. This is Bro. Flinn's first charge and consequently he enters upon it with grave hopes and fears. He is within seven miles of Andover Seminary and within forty-five minutes of Boston, so that he has within reach excellent opportunities for educational enlargement which he expects to take advantage of as he may be able to do. We wish for our good young brother and the Haverhill church great prosperity in the work of the Lord, and may this be but the beginning of a long and useful pastorate.

Our branch work on the east side is prospering well. The 159th street church voted sometime ago to lease a lot of sufficient size on the Southern Boulevard near 167th street and build a neat chapel at a cost of about $1,000. The church has issued bonds of $10 each and is selling them now to members and friends, and we are glad to say that within a few days most all of them have been suscribed for.

The bonds are non-interest bearing and are to be redeemed by the church at the rate of two per month until the series of one hundred shall have been taken up. Among the commendable features of this scheme, one is the saving of interest to the church and the other is the distribution of the burden of this work and the fellowship among our members so that almost every one may have part therein. This also widens the interest in the branch work among our people. It illustrates one of the invariable rules of success in church work, viz., the necessity of giving each one something to do for the Lord. We hope to be in our chapel sometime in the fall, and then we are certain our work in that quarter will move forward with even more encouragement.

Bro. W. C. Payne is at Cincinnati and Bro. J. M. Philputt is at Indianapolis on their vacations. They each expect to return to the city in time to attend our state convention at the 169th Street Church, Aug. 29th to Sept. 2nd. In speaking of the convention this leads me to say again that our committee on entertainment wishes the names of all delegates to the convention before the time of the assembly so that we may be able to locate all as comfortably as possible. All who contemplate attending, therefore, and have not done so as yet, will kindly send us their names, stating at the same time how many will be present from their congregations. This will help us quite materially. We confidently expect a profitable meeting and anxiously desire a goodly representation from every congregation in the commonwealth of New York. Come, brethren, in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ, praying and planning for the advancement of the Master's cause in our beloved Empire state.

If a bicycle tourist does not make interesting acquaintances along his route, it is generally his own fault. The people with whom he cares to talk will usually care to talk with him if he goes at it right. An unexpected and apparently unfortunate circumstance detained us in Portsmouth nearly a day after we had planned to start. To pass away part of the time we took a ferry across the harbor, and on the way fell into conversation with a corporal of marines, who straighway devoted some hours of his time to the task of showing us the barracks, fortifications and harbor. Doubtless, a corporal of marines does not stand very high in the counsels of the war department, but it was pleasant to hear this wearer of Her Majesty's uniform express his hearty sympathy with the United States in the war, and his belief that British soldiers and sailors generally would welcome an opportunity to lend us a hand. If one can draw any conclusions from a series of conversations with Englishmen of the rank and file, chosen at random all through the midlands on the South of England, it would be that the English people are as desirous of our friendship as the English Government is anxious for an alliance. Since setting foot on British soil we have not as yet observed the slightest trace of animosity toward America and Americans.

Leaving Portsmouth and passing Southampton without a stop, our route lies around the head of the Solent and through the New Forest, which has been a royal hunting preserve since the days of William the Conqueror. To the historical traveler, New Forrest can never quite lose the uncanny atmosphere which is connected with the mysterious death of King William Rufus, eight centuries ago, but 'Arry and 'Arriet, from the surrounding country or from Southampton, find it a merry picnicing ground and are not oppressed by thoughts of dead kings, whether murdered or killed in the hunt. To get a mental picture of this or any other of the so-called forests of England, the American reader must reconstruct his idea of a forest. New Forest happens to be well wooded, except in its high-lying moorlands, but it would be none the less a "forest" if it was as barren as Dartmoor. When the term "forest" appears on the map, look out for a tract of uncultivated land, either wood or moor, or both, used either as a game preserve or as a sheep-range. As we pass into Dorset and through the South Downs, we are in the land of sheep.

Speaking of the sheep suggests that something ought to be said about things to eat. The first and most important statement to be made in this connection is a refutation of the charge that an American must of necessity go hungry in England. This oft-repeated allegation is nothing less than calumny and slander. There exists only a shadow of excuse for it in the fact than an Englishman will often make a meal upon what we would consider merely the accessories—bread and butter, marmalade and tea. These constitute a "plain" breakfast or tea. In the first week of my travels, when I was green and had not yet the ripe experience of nearly a month of English life, I frankly told one hostess that these trifles were no breakfast at all, and that drinking tea in the morning was in itself a mark of utter folly. She smiled faintly, and when I tasted the cup of coffee she made me, it became evident why she preferred tea. At the great hotels, many of which are conducted on American lines for the benefit of the travelers from "the States," the distinctively English features are lost—so I am told. We are not staying at these hotels, just because we cannot afford it; second, because we do not want to, since we prefer to get nearer to the life of the English people. These two considerations seem quite sufficient to induce us to choose the more humble accommodations, to be found at inns, "temperance hotels," and farm houses. We have made it a point not to ask for watermelons, green corn and other distinctively American articles, but to eat and drink what is most characteristic of the part of the country where we happen to be. So in Dorset we ate mutton chops; in Devonshire we drank cider (only they spell it with a "y," as they do a bicycle "tyre") and ate strawberries with Devonshire cream, a delectable preparation, midway between cream and butter. In Cornwall we ate fish, especially pilchard, and the meat pie, commonly known as "squab" or "cornish pastry." The ingredients of the latter are so many, varied and unrecognizable as to give rise to a tradition that the devil dare not enter Cornwall for fear of being put in the pie. My first experience led me to believe, on the contrary, that he had entered Cornwall and had been put in the pie, but a closer acquaintance with the Cornish pastry has relieved it of the suspicion of demoniacal possession.

When the traveler reaches Exeter, he finds himself confronted to the westward with a tract of mountainous moorland, known as Dartmoor Forest. The official bicycle guides describe the twenty-five-mile ride across it as "wild, lonely and dangerous." Under these circumstances there was, of course, nothing to do but plunge into the center of it, avoiding the easy road along the coast. It was an afternoon of hard work, up and down an endless succession of steep and stony hills, but it was worth all the quiet, level rides a man ever took. Dartmoor may almost be described as a forest without a tree. In its three hundred square miles there is only one small grove of dwarf oaks, in addition to the few trees along the watercourses. The hills are of granite, covered with peaty soil and crowned with great blocks of bare granite. It is a grand and gloomy scene, even under the bright afternoon sun, and much more so when the mist of evening begins to gather in the valleys. Then comes a giddy race down from this highland into the town of Tavistock, a descent of five hundred feet in two miles. In the wilds of Dartmoor I lost my companion. We found each other the next day in Plymouth, where, moved by a common impulse, we were both seeking for the spot from which the Mayflower sailed for the founding of the new Plymouth in the Western world.

The south coast of Cornwall is not a happy land for the cyclist, unless his appreciation of the picturesque outweighs his desire for easy riding. It is a land of endless hills, and if one wishes to keep near the coast he must leave the main road, and make his way over steep and stony by-ways. It is a magnificent, high, rocky coast, dotted with the most picturesque fishing villages, wherever a cleft in the cliffs leaves room to wedge in a few houses and drag up a few boats. The most quaint and curious of all is Polperro, a town without a street which any four-wheeled vehicle larger than a goat-wagon could get through, and that only by carrying it occasionally up and down steps cut in solid rock. After pressing through this and a series such as this, we came for a time into the less picturesque mining section of Cornwall and thence on into the Lizard, the promontory, the southern point of which, called the Lizard Head, is the lowest latitude in England. We arrived in the evening and found quarters in a clean little cottage overlooking the sea. In the morning I was up at six to take a walk along the cliffs and, clambering down the face of the rocky wall, dive into the sea at the most southerly point in England. From the Lizard to Land's End the coast scenery continues with increasing grandeur, and finally we stand upon the Last Rocks at Land's End. We are twenty-eight days out from Liverpool and the distance covered is 1,013 miles. We have been as far east as Dover, have stood upon the most southerly and most westerly points in England. Now we are off for John o' Groat's House, the northern tip of Scotland. W. E. G.

Omaha Letter.

DEAR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—Permit me to congratulate you on your improved appearance, and through your columns to say, probably the most important occurrence to the Church of Christ in this vicinity in recent years, was a meeting at the First Church, this city, on the evening of the 26th inst., of the representatives of five of our congregations, for the worthy object of organizing a "Disciples' Union."

There were present from Council Bluffs, Brethren S. M. Perkins, A. R. Caudle, pastors of the church there, Dr. Carter and others. The First Church of this city was well represented, their new pastor, D. D. Burt, and a goodly number of representative brethren being present. The Walnut Hill church was represented by the pastor, Joseph Nicholls. The writer and others from the Grant Street made up the audience.

Dr. Carter was called to the chair and D. D. Burt was made secretary.

A statement by Bro. Burt of the object of the meeting was followed by the selection of a committee of six, one from each of the congregations represented, and one, Bro. Howard Crandell, for the church at South Omaha to draft a constitution and by-laws.

After pleasant, brief addresses from a number of those present, the meeting adjourned to meet at the call of D. D. Burt, chairman of the committee on constitution.

It should here be stated that this meeting was the result of action taken by the First Church, at a recent Lord's day morning service. This move promises great things. Will you not join us in prayer to our God that this move may be blessed of him, to the end that it may result in permanent good?

Elmer P. Ireland, a recent graduate from Ashley S. Johnson's "School of the Evangelists," preached very acceptably in the Grant St. pulpit on the evening of the 3rd inst. We predict for this young preacher a life of great usefulness. Some church will do well to employ this Nebraska boy.

President E. V. Zollars, of Hiram College, visited your correspondent and with him visited the great exposition recently. He was greatly pleased with the display and with Nebraska.

He was the principal speaker at our recent state meeting at Beatrice. His lectures were rich in thought, in expression and in application. All who heard him felt well repaid.

The Grant St. church was well pleased on the 24th inst., to have Miss Ada Boyd, of Bilaspur, India, address them. She spoke with great interest of that far-away land, of work accomplished and work undertaken in India. She occupied the pulpit of the Grant St. church both morning and evening. She is a very fluent and interesting speaker.

Since the writing of a certain Omaha letter by our South Omaha preacher, the writer has had a number of letters of inquiry concerning a suitable place to stop while visiting the Exposition. In self-defense he would like the privilege of answering all at once in this way.

Make the Hotel Henryton, 27th and Lake Sts., your home while in our city. Why?

Because, 1st. H. O. Devries, an elder in the Grant St. church, and state superintendent of Christian Bible-schools is the landlord.

2nd. This is the official hotel of the Omaha Christian Endeavor Union.

3rd. There is no saloon near it.

4th. It is within walking distance of the Exposition.

5th. The price is reasonable.

I trust this may satisfy all inquirers and cause our brethren who attend the great Exposition to stop at this Christian hotel. In conclusion let me say, Long live the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I know of no finer Christian publication.

Itinerating in Japan.

For a number of months I have spent a good share of my time "on the wing." It has been said "a good Methodist should have a back for any bed and a stomach for any food." It is hard for me to stand both the Japanese beds and their food. The beds are short and the covers are hard to manage, being hot in summer and cold in winter. Sometimes I find it hard work to eat cuttle fish and praise it. When I eat devil fish I feel like the devil is getting away with me rather than I am getting away with him. These are incidents; I eat cuttle fish and devil fish when I have to do so. In the mountains the food is poor, without everything, but rice and eggs. In April I started for Akita Ken for a few weeks' work there; had to travel through the mountains, over the sand for twenty-five miles, walking a good part of the way, though I was able to ride in a sled for about ten miles.

For fourteen years the work has been going on in Akita Ken. While many do not have a very accurate idea of Christianity, there is a wide-spread knowledge of the principal facts in the life and the great principles of his gospel.

When I reached the station only train to Akita, I felt like I was stranded in the desert.

[illegible] Akita, and the day before my arrival it was full of years and good report, both within and without the church. There was a feeling of joy in the victory. The Buddhist priest in charge of the cemetery refused to perform the Buddhist ritual at the grave.

The Japanese do not have much use for Buddhism except when forced. The priests have possession of the graveyards and try to make the most of them.

However, I heard an interesting [illegible] other day. A Buddhist sermon in Niigata compels its students to study the Bible.

In Akita, we had a number of meetings which were well-attended. Persons who [illegible] years ago been in the Sunday-schools are now becoming Christians, and a good many were out to the meetings to hear of Christ afresh. One inquiry meeting, attended by about twenty persons, lasted from seven to eleven o. c., and was full of interest.

At Honjo, where there had been a good deal of trouble with two unfaithful members, we had a good hearing and met a number of former Japanese friends. At the town of Iwnia, where there is a great silver mine, we had audiences of three hundred for several nights, and a good interest was aroused, the meeting could have been continued with profit, but we had to go on to the yearly meeting.

However, Bro. Stevens who took a different route from me, met me by appointment at Yokota, one of the good towns of Akita Ken. The theatre was jammed full of attentive listeners, say 500 persons, and they listened as though they were afraid they would lose a word.

It was an inspiring audience; they came forward by the score to receive literature and to be enrolled as desiring literature by mail.

Three of us, Stevens, Saito and myself were traveling at the same time in Akita Ken.

A Buddhist, sighing said: "If Buddhists had such zeal, they could take the world."

The day of open, gross idolatry is passing away in Japan.

In one address I told this story about an idol: A man fell in a river; in order to save him a friend who could not swim, tied a rope around the neck of a Buddhist idol of wood and threw it to the man in distress, he siezed it and was dragged ashore. The priest said the Buddha had miraculously saved his life. Another man fell in and was in danger of drowning when the person who had been rescued ran and tied a rope about the neck of the first image of Buddha he found and threw it to the man in the water, he siezed it as it struck the water and went down with it. Stories disparaging the use of idols and holding them up to ridicule are received with cheers. CHAS. E. GARST.

Church Buildings.

The Scriptures speak of "nine master builders," and while the passage may not refer directly to church buildings, yet it is important that great wisdom be exercised in this department of our work.

A close observation has proven to me that comparatively few churches are practicable after ten or fifteen years. Many of them are sold at a great sacrifice; others are torn down or rebuilt at a considerable loss. Would it not be better to build houses with a view to tearing them down or closing them at the end of a decade?

For illustration: Suppose a congregation in a growing town or city. They decide to build a house. They raise a certain amount for that purpose. Instead of spending a large amount on heavy stone walls, high towers, etc., that will stand for thirty years, suppose they spend one-third of their funds for a building that will last ten years, and judicially invest the remaining two-thirds, to be returned, one-third at the end of ten years, and the other one-third at the end of twenty years. In this way:

1. The congregation will be assured of a house for thirty years.

2. When the time comes to tear down the old structure no loss will be felt, for its service will have paid for all it cost.

3. The congregation at the end of ten years will be largely different from the one that built the old house, and they can now build one that will suit their tastes and meet their demands.

4. If at the end of twenty years the growth of the town shall make a removal necessary, the second ten-year structure may be abandoned or sold for some other use, and the church will sustain no serious loss.

If it is found best to rebuild on the same site, a building can then be erected according to latest improvements and the demands of the then enlarged congregation. There are many advantages in this kind of building.

1. The congregation can always have a structure that is modern, and that meets the demands of their work, both as to location and equipment.

2. The church is not burdened with a debt.

3. The members always have a local as well as general work to enlist their activities.

4. It encourages the people to keep up with modern improvements in buildings.

5. Changes and improvements are made without losses.

Of course, the illustration above given is but a sample. The amount raised and invested at any one time would depend upon circumstances.

There are three things that should always govern a building committee.

1. Location. This is vital. Always select the very best location for the work that is to be done, and change as soon as it ceases to be the best. Many an excellent work has been missed because of the location of the building. No congregation can afford to dally at this point.

2. Beauty and utility must be combined. I would not build an uninviting, prosaic, barn-like structure. Because a building is to last but ten or fifteen years, it does not follow that it must needs be homely and uninviting. But the most important requirement is that the building be suited to the work to be accomplished in it. We are now awakening to understand that the church is a working institution, and it is high time we were awakening to understand that in a very important sense the church house is a workshop, and the different departments of work to be carried on in it should be kept in mind when drawing the plans of our building.

3. Build within our means. Did you ever hear of a church being dedicated with a surplus of money in the bank? You have heard frequently of the dedicatory service being delayed because there was not enough money nor credit to complete the building. We often hear of a heroic effort being made on the day of dedication to provide for the debt. Many times congregations deliberately build handsome houses (more permanent and beautiful than practicable), and cover them with large debts and send them down together to coming generations. They seem to say to their children, "We know better than you do how to build the kind of house you will need after we are dead and gone, so we will build it now, and you can pay for it when you take up the work."

Is it any wonder that many young people forsake the church of their parents that had been provided for them in this way?

I imagine I hear the children of the future saying to us, "Build according to your present need, and pay for what you build. We prefer to have a voice in the plans of the building for which we pay. But if you wish to leave us a legacy in the way of church property, leave it in the form of money or investments, that we may utilize in erecting the kind of building that our circumstances demand."

Cuba and Puerto Rico Markets.

The markets which are likely to be opened in Cuba and Puerto Rico to American producers and manufacturers are the subject of much attention and inquiry just now. Large numbers of letters reach the Treasury Department and Bureau of Statistics asking for information regarding the class of articles imported into those islands and the countries which have been supplying these articles. This information will be given in elaborate form in the next monthly publication of the Bureau of Statistics, the "Summary of Finance and Commerce," and will show that Cuba has been, under normal conditions, buying annually about 25 million dollars worth of goods from Spain, about 4 million dollars worth from Great Britain, less than a million dollars worth from France, and less than a million dollars worth from Germany, while from the United States her purchases have ranged from 8 to 24 million dollars in value. The imports into Cuba have been of course light during the past year or more, and a fair estimate of her purchases can only be obtained by examination of the figures of the year 1896 or earlier years.

The imports into Cuba and Puerto Rico from the United Kingdom were valued at 1,478,171 pounds Sterling in 1892; 1,321,926 in 1893; 1,121,096 in 1894; 943,793 in 1895; and 729,550 in 1896. The largest of these imports from the United Kingdom in 1896 were cotton goods 233,673 pounds Sterling, linens 137,634, iron, wrought and unwrought, 78,668, machinery 43,241, hardware, cutlery, etc., 22,936, coal and other fuel 35,429.

From Spain the imports of the year into Cuba 1896 were 134,461,675 pesetas, the value of the peseta being, according to the Mint Bureau, 19 3-10 cents. The imports from Spain in the year 1896 were larger than those in any preceding year in the decade. The largest item of the 1896 imports into Cuba from Spain was flour 20,326,882 pesetas in value, shoes 17,249,760 pesetas, sandals 13,433,510 pesetas, firearms 9,361,200, wine 7,347,045, preserved food 4,742,361, oil 3,316,218, manufactures of flax and hemp 3,700,087, soap 3,176,846, wax and stearine 2,095,622, manufactures of wood 2,257,840, smoking paper 1,885,231, beans 1,878,019, rice 1,490,849, corn 1,432,815, onions and potatoes 1,205,115, pressed meats 1,581,570, soup pastes 1,435,999, saffron 1,171,260, packing paper 1,420,235, woolen blankets 1,099,356, no other articles passing the one million pesetas line.

The exports from Spain to Puerto Rico amounted in 1896 to 37,660,609 pesetas in value, a larger sum than any other preceding year in the decade. The largest item was cotton manufactures, 12,339,767 pesetas, shoes 5,380,740, sandals 3,601,380, rice 2,652,611, soap 1,255,814, oil 1,202,075, no other item reaching one million pesetas in value.

The following table shows the total exports from the United States to Cuba during the past 10 years:

1888	$10,053,560	1893	$24,157,698
1889	11,691,311	1894	20,125,321
1890	13,084,415	1895	12,807,661
1891	12,224,888	1896	7,530,880
1892	17,953,570	1897	8,259,775

The following table shows the leading articles exported to Cuba from the United States in 1893, the year of our greatest exports to that island. Only the articles amounting to $100,000 in value or more being included:

Lard	$4,023,917
Flour	2,821,557
Machinery	2,792,050
Hams	761,082
Corn	582,050
Bacon	556,747
Potatoes	554,153
Beans and Pease	392,962
Railway bars, iron and steel	327,411
Wire	321,120
Cars, passenger and freight	271,571
Saws and Tools	243,544
Steam Engines	130,652
Agricultural Implements	130,341
Cut Nails	107,002
Boots and Shoes	114,943

The exports from the United States to Puerto Rico in 1897 were $1,988,888, in 1896 they were $2,102,074, in 1892, $2,856,003. They were of about the same character as the exports to Cuba, wheat flour being the largest item, $516,188 in 1897; lard $228,051, bacon and hams $112,602, pickled pork $152,411, beans and pease $57,550, machinery $69,462, no other articles of export in 1897 reaching as much as $50,000 in value during the year. Butler College Day at Bethany Park.

Saturday, July 30, was celebrated at Bethany Park in honor of Butler College. In spite of occasional showers, there was a larger attendance at the Park than at any previous day of the Assembly. A large number of persons came from Indianapolis and other parts of the state especially for the day. Quite a number of alumni were present, some having come from beyond the Mississippi, and even from the Pacific Coast.

The exercises began with an address to preachers by Prof. Jabez Hall, of Butler Bible College, upon the mutual relations of pastor and people. This was the closing address of a series that have been offered throughout the week by Prof. Hall to preachers. Any one who is familiar with the graceful and elegant diction of Dean Hall, with his wide experience as a pastor, and with his deeply spiritual view of a minister's responsibilities, can conceive what an inspiration these heart-to-heart talks have been to the brethren present.

After an hour's intermission, spent in social mingling, the audience assembled again at 11 o'clock to hear the address of the day, delivered on behalf of the University of Indianapolis, of which Butler is a part, by the Rev. J. Cumming Smith, pastor of the Tabernacle Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis. Dr. Smith is a Canadian, educated at Toronto University and Princeton Seminary. He was for some years a Professor in Philosophy at Toronto University, and is eminently qualified to represent academic ideas upon any platform. His address was upon the "Catholicity of Culture," and was highly appreciated by his audience. Dr. Smith touched upon religious culture in a felicitous manner and with such broadness and liberality that many declared afterwards that if his denomination had not been previously announced, no one would have been able to discover it.

Bro. J. E. Pounds, who presided, then introduced the college quartette, who sang selections of college songs. After dinner, and the happy hours of reunion among alumni and old friends, the assembly gathered again in the tabernacle for the Bible College session. Addresses were made in the order named, by Burris A. Jenkins, H. O. Breeden, of Des Moines, A. C. Smithers, of Los Angeles and Bro. Herzog of Hiram College. All these brethren spoke very enthusiastically of the future of Butler Bible College. Bros. Breeden and Smithers declared that the attractions to young men preparing for the ministry at Butler Bible College are unsurpassed in the brotherhood, and predicted a large gathering of students for next year.

Bro. Pounds then reported progress in the raising of funds and the prospect of students for the next session. He told of students coming from all quarters, from Texas and Missouri, from Kansas—three from Kansas—Iowa and also from the Eastern states, to study for the ministry.

The evening session was devoted to a patriotic address by Pres. Scot Butler, which was listened to by a large audience. Altogether, notwithstanding the fact the attendance thus far at the Park has not been quite up to that of recent years, the celebration of Butler Day is considered eminently satisfactory.

BURRIS A. JENKINS.

A Glance at Michigan.

The word, Michigan, means "a weir for fish," and the peninsula shape of the wolverine state shows a coast line to justify the Indiana appellation.

Michigan, like Kentucky, was once "a dark and bloody ground." Indian, Frenchman, Englishman, American fought in its forests and on its lakes for possession, but the irrepressible Yankee came out on top, according to his custom. Michigan became a territory in 1805 and a state in 1837.

In 1812, Congress passed a law that 2,000,000 acres of land should be surveyed in the territory of Louisiana, and like quantities in Illinois and Michigan to be set apart for the soldiers in the war with Great Britain.

The lands were surveyed in Louisiana and Illinois, but the surveyors reported that there were no lands in Michigan fit for cultivation.

Accordingly, Congress repealed the law so far as it related to Michigan and appropriated 1,500,000 more in Illinois and 500,000 in Missouri instead.

Those surveyors would have "a bad taste in their mouths," if they could see the country now, for Moses from Mt. Pisgah saw no better.

In 1835, war existed between Michigan and the sovereign state of Ohio, over a strip of land claimed in common by them; troops were sent into the disputed territory, but happily the difficulty was settled by Congress before any heads were broken.

Michigan consists of two peninsulas, "almost surrounded by water," but numerous lakes are found inland, and these are filled with water and fish, perch, bass and blue-gill, and the law only permits them to be taken with hook and line.

Mint is cultivated in Michigan. A member of Congress from this state is known as "Peppermint Todd," because he cultivated the aromatic herb.

Berries are a staple product. The strawberry lasts from June 1st to July 4th. Then the raspberries begin to ripen and they last three weeks. There were shipped from Benton Harbor in one day, 25,000 crates of raspberries. There are also large fields of huckleberries and cranberries. The berry crop gives employment to an army of hands and brings in considerable money.

The peach crop promises well and will last from August 1st till snow flies.

There are about 8,000 Disciples in Michigan, divided among some 200 churches.

There are but four strong churches.

It is not as easy to make Disciples in Michigan as in Missouri. Unbelief and heresy prevails to an alarming extent. The white tents of the Adventists are spread abroad, and their prophets tell of their near coming of the Lord. Spiritual mediums tell from what animal their souls are developed—cat, dog, horse or cow. They can make you a picture of your deceased wife or your great grandmother's spirit, if you give them an old photograph of the same to begin with.

There are others who teach that men are possessed with two minds each, an objective and a subjective mind. In most men the subjective mind lies dormant, but when both minds are active we have a genius.

Medicine need not be taken, let the patient be put to sleep, believing that he must take medicine in the morning and the subjective mind will produce the same effect as if the medicine had been taken.

Faith-cure, mind-cure and Christian Science doctors abound, "and my people love to have it so."

Women preachers are numerous. Divorces are easily obtained and frequent. Many believe with Betsy Bobbit:

> "If women had a mice's will,
> They would rise up and get a bill."

The law compels a man to support his family in Michigan. A poor man may marry an heiress, and she can then get a divorce for non-support. She don't have to spend a single denairus of her money.

Perhaps this all flavors of the pessimistic, perhaps the evils are exaggerated. A new minister called upon one of his lady members. He remarked, "Some of the members think my sermons are long, do you think so?" The lady member replied: "They are not long, they only appear so."

There is much good in Michigan. The people are peaceable and intelligent. There is a healthy temperance sentiment. Religious people of the various sects are friendly.

Union meetings among the orthodox are frequent.

Michigan has a good school system and the influence of the great university at Ann Arbor is felt throughout the state.

The people of Michigan are proud of their General Shafter, the hero of Santiago.

The writer has been called to preach two patriotic discourses, Memorial Day and Thanksgiving Day, July 10, both union services. The people when once at church give good attention to the speaker.

Two old Disciple preachers reside in Paw Paw, Bros. Brooks and Hurd. As I have not moved my family here, I board with Brother and Sister D. Woodman. They are exemplary old people and have a delightful home.

I congratulate the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on its improvement and have misgivings as to the fate of this rambling essay, but knowing that "faint heart never won fair lady," I venture the overture. J. P. DAVIS.

Paw Paw, July 20.

Michigan Grains.

L. H. Smith, minister of the Church of Christ, of Algonac, visited in Ohio during the first of the month, and the writer filled his pulpit on the 3rd of July. The work there is prospering well under the care of so faithful a man of God as Bro. Smith, who has won the hearts of the people. The congregation has outgrown the church building and we hope that a year's time will give them a start in the direction of a new building.

On the 10th of July the much-loved Bro. McCall, of Yale, was enjoying a recreation in one of the rural districts, and the writer supplied his pulpit. It was a pleasure to spend a Sunday with the Yale brethren, as I labored with them for four years. Their church building was erected during that time. When I finished my work there, which was done in my own feeble way, the church made no mistake in selecting the sweet-spirited and pure Bro. McCall, who came to us at that time from the Methodists. May the Lord bless him in his work.

On the 17th of July I was in Wovesta and Wilmot, and preached for Bro. Kean. He is doing a good work and is worthy of better support than those two weak churches can afford to give him. Bro. Kean united with our people two years ago. He came from the Free-will Baptists and dearly loves our plea and people. The church at Wilmot will erect a new church edifice during the coming year. They hope to erect one which will be a credit to our people in their nice little town.

The brethren at Durand have secured a promise from S. S. Jones, of Danville, Ill., to hold a meeting for them during the month of August. A hall has been rented for one year, and it will be used for Bro. Jones' meeting. There are just fifteen Disciples in Durand, rich in faith and of course are poor in this world's goods. We hope that at the close of Bro. Jones' meeting our number will be increased. Durand is a great railroad center and is also in the center of the state. It has a population of twenty-five hundred, and is the growing town of Michigan.

How very important it is to get our churches established in all such growing towns. It is so hard to get our work established, after the different sects have their organizations to oppose us. There are so many towns in the state of Michigan with just a few Disciples, who might meet together to break the loaf and admonish one another on the Lord's day and grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth, if they just had the zeal and courage to do so; but instead, in many cases, they are losing their opportunity. There will be a day of reckoning and they will be the losers by not having been faithful, but those who have been loyal to the Savior will be rewarded with the crown of life. Loved ones in the Savior, think of this. If you are living in a town where there are but a few Disciples, think of this and ask with loving eyes looking heavenward, "Lord, what can we do for thee."

R. BRUCE BROWN.

Love that Alters.

"Love is not love that alters when it alteration finds."

That is one of the sublimest lines in all literature. It is the final definition of love by the world's greatest reader of the human mind,—Shakespeare. Nearly all women who truly love, love in this sublime way. Men seldom do.

Woman's most glorious endowment is the power to awaken and hold the pure and honest love of a worthy man. When she loses it and still loves on, no one in the wide world can know the heart agony she endures. The woman who suffers from weakness and derangement of her special womanly organism soon loses the power to sway the heart of a man. Her general health suffers and she loses her good looks, her attractiveness, her amiability and her power and prestige as a woman. Dr. R. V. Pierce, of Buffalo, N.Y., with the assistance of his staff of able physicians, has prescribed for many thousands of women. He has devised a perfect and scientific remedy for women's ailments. It is known as Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It is a positive specific for all weaknesses, diseases, disorders, displacements, irregularities, and debilitating drains peculiar to women. It purifies, regulates, strengthens and heals. Medicine dealers sell it, and no honest dealer will advise you to accept a substitute that he may make a little larger profit.

"I was afflicted with kidney trouble and I have always had a torpid liver," writes Mrs. E. Crosswhite, of Duffau, Erath Co., Texas. "When I commeneed your medicine I was not able to stand on my feet. I used one bottle of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and five vials of his 'Pleasant Pellets.' I am now well. I had not walked in four months when I commenced the treatment; but in ten days I was able to walk everywhere."

All Should Take the Reading Courses.

The Bethany C. E. Reading Courses seem so wise in themselves that their plan of work is their own best commendation. To be most useful our young people must be a reading people. What better lines to fit them for usefulness than the three lines suggested in these courses?

They need to know not only more about God's Word, but how to study it; and most admirably adapted to this end is the small handbook on Bible study. They need to know more about the people and the movement with which they are connected, and hence the handbook on the Disciples. They dare not be ignorant on the subject of missions, and hence the handbook on missions. The courses are well worthy the attention of our older people, and all our preachers could take them with profit.

These handbooks, covering the above lines, are neat in design and are written in a clear, terse style by strong, representative men from amongst us. Our young people must leave the "iridescent" dreamland and prepare themselves for real action. To do this they must read. The Bethany Reading Courses come as a God-send in this hour of need. It is a mind-invigorator and gives a base of supplies for largest future usefulness.

Our young people should know more of the Bible. Here are all the main lines of Bible thought, focusing on a few pages, making them fairly glow with concentrated heat. They should know more of missions. No book written has within the same space more fuel for missionary fire. The handbook on the Disciples is an encyclopedia of facts that lead up to our present work and standing among the reformers of the world. It was a happy day for our work when the courses were planned. Have your young people begin to form a Circle at once. Have your old people take it. Take it yourself. It is good. M. E. HARLAN.

Form versus Life.

CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—May the Lord bless you on your great mission in this world, spreading the pure light of the gospel of the Son of God, carrying light and truth to many homes and hearts. I admire the new dress and form of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I believe this will begin a new era in the life and work of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. It is clear, clean and cultured; it is just superb! I like it more than ever. It is filled with rich spiritual food. I have just finished reading an article from the pen of J. J. Haley which, to my mind, is just grand, rich and full of truth—"more truth than poetry." I wish that all of our preachers and every member could read this one article. If heeded it would produce a great reformation in the minds of many of our people. There is too much dead formality in many of our churches. I fear "the dry rot of formalism" already has set in in many places, and many persons are substituting religious forms and theories for the divine life and holy character. I fear it is true that many believe when they have done the form they have paid the debt, purchased the indulgence and from that time on you see no change in their life. They live, act, walk and talk just like the world. There is no change in their heart (mind) hence no change in their life. The question in my mind is, have these people been baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins? Have they really been baptized into the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost? May the Lord save the people from dead formalism and fill them with his Spirit, love and power. J. P. HANER.

Religious Work at the University of Virginia.

The assertion has frequently been made by those unacquainted with the facts that the University of Virginia is an irreligious institution. How utterly untrue this is, is shown by the fact that every leading denomination in the South counts among the men who fill its pulpits, edit its papers and control its counsels many graduates of the University of Virginia. Virginians take a natural pride in remembering that the Young Men's Christian Association at their University was the first Y. M. C. A. ever organized at an American college. Since the founding of the University of Virginia Y. M. C. A. in 1898 its members have gone out to fill many of the pulpits, the college and editorial chairs, and other positions of high professional and business influence in the south. "Wipe out," says Colonel Charles S. Venable, "the foreign missionaries of the Presbyterian Church who are University of Virginia men, and you almost destroy the enterprise;" and this is only one direction which the vast influence for good at the University has taken.

The problem of bringing active religious influences to bear upon the young men of our universities and colleges is one of growing seriousness. How well this problem has been solved at the Virginia University and the force of the moral and religious influence exerted there strikes the attention alike of visitors and residents. "I have never known," says Rev. Charles A. Young, National Secretary of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, whose special work brings him into touch with student life at colleges and state universities from Michigan to Georgia and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, "I have never known a more manly Christianity than exists among the students of the University of Virginia at present. There is no show or sham in their religious pretensions." And the words of others are equally strong. Rev. John Williams Jones, known and loved throughout the south, says: "I have known the University of Virginia for over forty years and during all of that time have never heard of a case of skepticism originating there, while I have rejoiced to know of not a few cases of skepticism which have been cured by influences brought to bear upon them at the University." So much for the statement, more current in former years than now, that Mr. Jefferson founded an atheistical school.

The University Y. M. C. A., which has just closed its fortieth year of continuous work, has given out some interesting statistics for the past year. Of the four hundred and eighty-nine students at the University of Virginia last session, two hundred and fifty-eight were church members and one hundred and seventy were active members of the Young Men's Christian Association. Of the church members there were eighty-six Episcopalians, sixty five Presbyterians, forty Methodists, thirty-eight Baptists, thirteen Catholics and ten members of the Disciples Church, with others unclassified. Notes and News.

Chatauqua Letter.

Prof. H. L. Willett's work here, for this season, has closed. It has been hard, but enthusiastic and earnest. People have followed him as a prophet of old, becaue he has interpreted the Scriptures, by the internal truths and the everlasting record made by the servants of the Lord and fulfilled in the spirit and person of the divine Son of God and his righteousness.

Some of the thoughts gathered in conversation are pointed and helpful.

Higher criticism, when governed by the Spirit of Christ, is helpful to the scholar in dispeling mystery, and in bringing our own up to the great beauty and power of the Scriptures and their lessons to man.

To reach Christian union we must all get back to Christ and be controlled by his Spirit.

The world is learning the Lord's prayer, that "we all might be one" and his call unto humunity as one great brotherhood.

They who stand for creeds are now compelled to make answer unto their own households, who read away from theology and into the pathways marked, "Thus saith the Lord." The more the Bible is studied for help, in the wants of man's better nature, the more the wonderful the book is "a lamp to our feet and a light to our path."

The quetion of baptism is where all come, and there is no longer any dispute among scholars. Immersion is right. The motive which brings one to its requirements settles its validity with all peoples.

The concensus of opinion is direct for Christian union, and when the people reach the platform their leaders will find the way of the Bible is best.

To-day Dr. Burrows, of Chicago, opened wide the field of Foreign Missions, in his wonderful words on Hinduism. The thunder of the guns on the Pacific Ocean is to open the doors of monasteries, unchain the Bible and liberate it from papal serfdom. How the cheers went up when he spoke of a new light for Asia, shining by way of Manila, and the message of God's liberty from America!

Next week, Thursday and Friday, we have "Who is Jesus Christ?" and "Why did Christ die?" by Dr. Behrends, and Dr. Burkley's Question Box.

Our own Bro. Z. T. Sweeney will have thousands to hear his great argument on "Foundations," Sunday evening. This is a good mission point. People come and inquire who we are, and what we believe, and they are from North and South, and many states of the Union. W. J. F.

An Answered Prayer.

It is recorded of Adoniram J. Judson that he said: "I never in my life prayed for a thing, earnestly and persistently, that it did not at last come. It may not have come in the way I expected it or when I expected it, but it certainly came at last." I quote from memory. I think this ought to be the experience of every disciple who endeavors to work for his Lord and Master. The difficulty with the majority of Christians is that they lack in the persistence which at last brings success. George Muller prayed persistently for months for enlargement in his works at Ashley Down, Bristol, England, for homeless and helpless orphans, before he told any man or received a shilling. At last the Lord opened the windows of heaven and flooded him with means. Why may not this experience be duplicated by every man who gives himself unselfishly to others as Muller did? Is it not a fact that prayer, persistent, earnest and fervent, should play a far more important part in our educational and missionary enterprises? Is it not a fact that the individual in "laying up" what he does not need, the college in accumulating a big endowment, the missionary enterprise in accumulating property on which it can depend in an hour of pressing need, makes the "life of trust" in which our Father delights partly impossible, or in many cases wholly impossible?

God has expressed himself on this point in both dispensations. He gave his people bread from heaven day by day. He did this to teach them to trust him. Some of them tried to "lay up" for the "rainy day" with dastrous results: "It bred worms and stank." Under Jesus his disciples are to pray for their daily bread. How many of us so live by putting our surplus into his cause that we can do this? This is to my mind, a very serious question.

I have had some experience along this line. It has been a severe test of my faith and patience, but the experience and the enlargement have and do more than overbalance the cost. I relate my experience for the benefit of "whom it may concern." It began in the early spring of 1894—over four years ago. I judged from general prospects that our room would in the following fall be insufficient. I met the students in the college chapel, who were as enthusiastic as I was. I spoke of my plans for enlargement. The building I had in mind was to be three stories high and contain thirty rooms, the first story to be used as a cellar. I proposed to the students that if they would pledge the work to excavate the foundation, we would pledge the money to buy the brick. They agreed to do this. We also covenanted to meet in the chapel every evening and pray for means to complete the building. We were launching into what was to us an almost unknown sea. The young men began to dig and draw brick. We laid the corner-stone May 10, 1894. We have been working on the building and praying for means to finish it all these years. The passer-by reads on the corner-stone in imperishable marble the words of our Redeemer: "The poor have the gospel preached unto them." Last summer we finished the second story and, although we could not put in the steam, there were plenty of young preachers who were glad to live in cold rooms in order to secure an education. Volumes of prayers have gone up for the completion of this building. At last four years and four months' persistent prayer and unremitting toil have brought their reward and the building is in the hands of the painter. And we have learned to pray! The young men have learned to pray! The building is already wired for electric light and we are confidently looking for the money to put in the steam before frost appears. This building is and shall be opened to the poor young men of the Church of Christ. We propose to train men to be place-makers and not place-hunters. We shall have at the opening, Sept. 24, room for 140 with at least 300 applicants. Our work invites the poor young preacher to come and share its poverty, its struggles, its triumphs. It makes our brethren everywhere to invest their money in an effort that has already done and is destined yet to do much for the cause of pure Christianity. Our work does not "beg;" it is its only appeal. Two things I hesitate not to affirm: 1. We have more poor young preachers to sit at our tables than sit together anywhere else on earth; 2 A dollar and prayer invested here will never die! "Believest thou this?"

THE CONVENTION.

See the program and note the treat in store for all who attend. Of course you will be present. It will be a gem; three days and home again. The program committee had to cut much, but its "boiled-down" policy will be approved of. "Come, let us reason together" respecting Minnesota missions.

THANKS TO THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

"A Christian paper in every home" is a taking slogan, and right persistently may the question be pressed, which introduces a word we wish to say regarding the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has very kindly mailed gratis above 200 copies of the present issue to some two score points and in the state in the interest of increased attendance at the convention and now to put into effect the good old rule, "One good turn deserves another." What say you to "booming" the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST'S subscription list? Will you not only personally subscribe, but circulate a subscription list about among the brethren? Scan the columns and see what a rich feast the publishers set before you. Will pastors and missionary secretaries please press the matter? It need scarcely be explained that this notice comes not at the suggestion of any CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST attache.

VACANT PULPITS.

A matter which ought to be referred to in every letter is that at all times the secretary is in touch with preaching brethren available to the Minnesota field. Amen! Will officers of churches please bear this in mind?

EVANGELISTIC.

Evangelist A. B. Moore reports continued good audiences at Austin and satisfactory progress made in the new church building enterprise.

Evangelists Atwood and Sweetman commence a meeting at Luverne as the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST goes to press. These brethren come to the state believing in Minnesota and it is hoped their efforts will be blessed.

St. Louis Letter.

One of the peculiarities of a great city is the unstable character of its "bon ton" districts. These shift about without much regard to natural laws. The district in which the publishing house of the Christian Publishing Company now stands was once the aristocratic district of the city. On either side of "Lucas Place," now Locust Street, stand elegant stone-front mansions, once the homes of the rich, but now largely publishing, boarding, school and business houses, and what was once two magnificent church buildings. The church in which Dr. Brooks preached for so many years is now a theatre and the great stone cathedral-like stone church building where Dr. Niccolls preached to the wealth of the city so long, is now used only for mission purposes. Both of the churches have gone west, the former to Compton Avenue and the latter to Taylor Avenue. This is the second westward move of these two churches. They are following up the class of people by whom they were built and for whom they exist, and hence their change from rich to richer possessions.

When the high-tone atmosphere comes over a given district, property immediately takes on immense values. A portion of these values grow out of the class of buildings erected, while much of it is merely assumed for protective purposes—protective as to the social rank of its families. In proof of this we have only to point to the immense decline in the value of these same buildings after the high-tone atmosphere lifts and drifts to settle elsewhere. The writer has talked with men who, ten and twenty years ago, bought elegant stone-front houses as an investment which they are now offering to sell for from one-third to one-half less than they paid for them. The wealth of the district simply took wings and flew away and these men were left to wonder why they had been so short-sighted and foolish. Had they bought unimproved property farther west they might now be worth millions to their present thousands.

But the purchase of improved property has not always proved successful with investors. Many long-sighted men have bought large interest in suburban property here and there, put down costly improvements and begged and coaxed for the aristocratic swell to come, but it would not, and so their thousands are locked up in unsalable real estate. That high-tone atmosphere is an uncertain quantity. No one seems to know when it will go nor where. It lifts and splits, shifts and drifts, by some law not yet monopolized by speculators. And so the lucky ones after all, in this as in other things, are those who happened to be in the right place at the right time. Go into many of the old streets in St. Louis to-day, and the old residents of that street will tell you that it used to be "one of the swell streets of the city, but it has gone down terribly." Some families are able to follow up these social waves, but not all, and not a few are lost in the attempt.

One of the chief causes of these social, moral and physical district transformations, of course, is the growth of the city's industrial and commercial interest. As these enlarge the residence portions of the city are encroached upon and its families retreat. To get away from noise and dirt, the common people and commerce, they offer their property for sale at low figures and seek new quarters. Vanderventer Place fifteen years ago headed the society procession on the west; now it is at the foot on the east. Its historic mansions will soon become common houses as those of Lucas and other places. The advance line of this wave is now alongside Forest Park on the west, but with the extension of electric lines into the hills beyond it will not remain long at this point and the costly churches just erected in the west will be confronted with the same old problem—farther west—at no distant day.

But a more important question is, Are churches for the rich only, or for all people? That many of them are compelled to move west to retain an audience is evident, but that they move west to find a people to whom they can minister is not the case. They almost invariably move out of a more densely populated soul-impoverished district than those moved into. And why? The people will not come, they say. And why? But why should they come? Is not the command of the Lord to go? Why, then, do they not remain and minister to the intellectual, moral and physical wants of the people who surround them? The money usually sacrificed in moving a church "farther west," doubtless amounts to more than the church ever gave in the way of direct help for those in need in its immediate neighborhood, or perhaps in its history. Will the Lord not hold churches responsible for this waste of ointment in their efforts to follow the whims of fashion and fashionable society? But here again we are confronted with high mountains, and so think best to conclude our epistle.

Nashville, August 2.—Closed a three weeks' meeting here with 29 additions, 19 by baptism, five from the denominations and five by letter. Bro. W. W. Warren preaches here part of the time and is doing a fine work. This is a good church and the meeting was an exceedingly pleasant one to us.—MORGAN AND DAUGHTER.

ILLINOIS.

Watseka, August 1. — Three added here yesterday; one from Presbyterians and two from Baptists. 72 of our Junior Endeavorers picnicked recently on the banks of the Iroquois, near our beautiful county-seat.—B. S. FERRALL.

Arrowsmith, August 1st.—Our new pastor, Elder G. M. Read, is an efficient leader. A church rally was held yesterday. Six accessions at the A. M. service; seven during the month.—CHAS. D. HOUGHAM.

NORTH DAKOTA.

Ellendale, August 1. — Began a meeting August 3rd at Clark, S. D., under the direction of the South Dakota State Board. Our work at Ellendale is doing nicely. The church at Ellendale is the only self-supporting Church of Christ in the whole state of North Dakota.—T. S. NOBLITT.

IOWA.

Des Moines, August 1. — Baptized three young people at Lehigh yesterday. I will deliver a few sermons there this week.—L. F. MCCRAY.

Sheldon.—Four added by J. R. Mowrey.

Shannon.—Organized with 44 members.—J. R. JOHNSON.

Sioux City.—Two more.—WALTER VAN DE WALKER.

CALIFORNIA.

Fortuna, Aug. 1st. — Two additions July 24th; baptism at the close of the service last evening.—A. B. MARKLE.

INDIANA.

Terre Haute, July 29.—At the close of our prayer-meeting, Wednesday night, July 27, six persons came forward and made the good confession and were baptized the same hour of the night.—N. W. WITMER.

Indianapolis, Aug. 1st.—At North Park Church, two additions. At the Broad Ripple Church, one addition.—J. M. CANFIELD.

Publishers' Notes.

At the beginning of J. G. Encell's book, "The Exiled Prophet, or What John Saw on Patmos," is an interesting essay on Daniel, by D. R. Dungan. This essay is intended to prepare the reader for the explanation given of the things seen by John on Patmos. The author of the work proper takes the position that the things contained in Revelation are to be understood by some one at some time. If it were not so it would not be called the "Revelation of Jesus Christ."

Those who like reading of this kind will enjoy this book. The book is one that will be read with profit by many. The author's style is clear.—The Gospel Messenger, Mt. Vernon, Illinois.

"The Exiled Prophet" is a late publication of the Christian Publishing Co. It is the fruit of many years' study of Revelation by its author, and contains 245 pages. The price is $1.25, postpaid.

"Across The Gulf," by Mrs. N. M. Vandervoort, published by the Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo., deals with the times of Christ, and its object is to show that out of Christ there is no remission. In the working out of the story the great truths spoken by the Master are mingled with historical facts.

It is written from the intelligent scriptural standpoint of a Disciple of Christ. Most young people will read fiction of some kind, so it is infinitely better for them to read such pure and wholesome stories as this one, even if some "traditions" have been interwoven.—Christian Guide, Louisville, Ky.

Members of Endeavor Societies who need books that will give them instructions concerning their work will find the following books contain valuable information along that line. The Endeavorers who will carefully read these books and be guides by the instructions contained therein will find great pleasure and profit in their work as members of the Christian Endeavor Societies. "The juvenile Revival, or The Philosophy of the Christian Endeavor Movment," by Thomas Chalmers. Introduction is by Dr. Francis E. Clarke. This book begins with the planting of the Christian Endeavor movement and follows it up through its many stages to the full fruitage. It is neatly bound in cloth and the price is 60 cents. "The Y. P. S. C. E. at Work," by Frank R. Stutzman. A pamphlet giving full instructions to various committees, the author having had many years' practical experience in Endeavor work. Price 10 cents. "The Helping Hand," by W. W. Dowling. This is a manual of instruction for the Y. P. S. C. E. covering all points concerning this work. Flexible cloth, per copy 25 cents.

Those who have read "Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism Examined and Refuted," by D. H. Bays, speak in the highest terms regarding the merits of the book. We give the following extract from a review of this book by the Gospel Advocate, Nashville, Tenn.: "The author was reared in the faith of Mormonism, and was for twenty-seven years a zealous advocate and defender of its peculiarities; and thus he has had a most excellent opportunity to obtain his knowledge by close relationship with all the prominent leaders of that faith. He presents the doctrines as they are defined by its leading minds, together with the biblical evidences adduced in their support, and then offers such evidences from scriptural and other sources as overthrow their arguments, and prove the entire system erroneous. It contains full proof-texts and historical references upon every phase of the question discussed, which makes it a complete handbook of ready reference. It will be an indisputable help to those who in any way have to meet Mormonism." This book contains 460 pages, is neatly bound in cloth, and the price is $1.50, postpaid.

Ohio Notes.

The annual district convention began the first of August. There are twenty-five districts in Ohio. This means five conventions. Who dares to estimate the power of these conventions in advancing the cause of Christ?

Bellefontaine dedicated her new house July 24th. President Zollars was at the helm. This is a good house, worth about $8,000. We shall expect great things from our brethren there, now that they have better tools.

Ohio soon loses one of her best young men, Bro. Plattenburg, of Ashland. He goes back to Uniontown, Pa. He has done a fine work at Ashland and they are loath to let him go. He is a strong preacher.

The church at Tiffin is without a pastor at present. This is a good church. They will no doubt procure a leader soon.

Samuel Traum, one of the recent graduates of Hiram, will preach for the churches at Fairview and Danville, Highland county. Hitherto these churches have been doing without preaching. They are strong churches in latent force and it is hoped Bro. Traum will develop them in usefulness.

Guy Hoover has given up the work at Zanesville to re-enter Hiram to finish his course. His successor has not yet been announced. He brought this church up to self-support in his two years' work there.

The Fourth Avenue Church in Columbus, only two years and a half old, is the strongest church in district No 1. Their growth is phenomenal. E. S. DeMiller is a wise and devoted leader.

The corner-stone of the new church at Steubenville was laid recently. Bro. Slater is doing faithful work there. Our brethren have the largest Bible-school in the city.

J. W. Baker has taken the work at Galion. They contemplate a house soon. The faithful few there have made a bold struggle in the years past.

W. J. Russell, formerly of Columbus, recently held a tent-meeting at Crooksville and organized a church of 36 members. They contemplate a house at once.

John S. Lawrence, the father of the North Fairmount Church, Cincinnati, was elected Corresponding Secretary of the Ohio Christian Endeavor Union. He will make a faithful officer.

The new church at Martain's Ferry is only about six months old but has a settled pastor and its own house, and 100 members. This is good work. But there are more places in Ohio where the same work could be done.

Peter Butts, of Newton Falls remembered Hiram College to the extent of $30,000. What a wonderful monument. This ought to stimulate others to a like liberality.

The North Central Ohio Ministerial Association will meet at Mansfield the fifth and sixth of September. No wide-awake preacter in reach of Mansfield can afford to miss this meeting. A good practical program has been prepared. F.

SUBSCRIBERS' WANTS.

TEACHER of Bookkeeping, Typewriting, Stenography, wanted. A lady teacher of the above subjects, a member of the Christian Church, who would like a position in a first class female school, is requested to communicate with,
M. COLLIS, Lexington, Ky.

WANTED.—A position as cashier, saleslady or assistant in post-office, by a young lady of business ability. All departments of P.-O. work fully understood, having had four (4) years experience. Will begin on small salary, can give good reference as to moral and Christian character. Address, C. Brookins, 619 East Adams St., Springfield, Ill.

S. R. MAXWELL, Pastor of the Rockville Christian Church, is at liberty to engage in evangelistic work. He has preached for 10 years, two years of this time in evangelistic work. He is anxious to make engagements with churches. References: Dr. F. D. Power and A. J. Wright, Washington, D. C. Bro. Maxwell's address is Rockville, Md.

WANTED.—A Christian physician to locate in Marietta, Ind. Ter. Also a good location for building up a private Christian School.

AGENTS WANTED.—In all parts of the United States to sell the best acetylene gas generator yet invented. Very simple in construction, cheap in price, absolutely safe, and less trouble to operate than an ordinary coal oil lamp. Will save at least one half the cost of lighting, and give a light almost equal to sunlight. Liberal terms to agents. For full information address the inventor and patentee., Rev. Cal Ogburn, 775 W. 9th St., Riverside, Cal.

September Fourth!

We need and must have the largest offering for Church Extension at the date just given that we have had in all the fifteen years of our work in this field. I say "must," not because of any authority in me or in our Church Extension Board, but because the exigencies of the case require the use of that word. Look at them and see.

1. We have 2,000 unhoused mission churches in this great land, 1,700 hundred of which have appealed to our Board in vain for aid in the past few years.

2. The fund on hand with which to heed the cry of our homeless brothers and sisters is so inadequate that the Board can answer but one appeal in four.

3. Our statistics show such a rapid increase of our churches that every year we are organizing more than half as many new congregations that cannot build without help, as we have been able to help through this fund in all the fifteen years of its history.

4. But fifty per cent. of our young churches can build without aid.

5. The fund must be doubled, trebled, quadrupled, quintupled before it will suffice. We could use half a million dollars right now as a loan fund.

6. Unable to reach that sum, we are trying to reach the half of it by the close of the year 1900. And with reasonable efforts it can be done.

7. Let all our churches throughout the land at once take up the watch-cry and make it echo from ocean to ocean and from the lakes to the gulf: "A quarter of a million dollars for Church Extension by the year 1900!!"

8. The fund now has in it nearly $160,000. We need to raise $90,000 in the next three years, or $30,000 a year. With reasonable effort, I say, it can be done.

9. And because it can be done it MUST be done. Duty demands it. Self-respect demands it. The exigency of the case demands it.

10. To meet this demand our churches should raise $20,000 September 4th next. Let Kentucky do her duty, and Ohio and Illinois and Missouri, all the states and all the churches, and a glorious result will follow.

GEORGE DARSIE,
Kentucky correspondent for Church Extension.

Facts and an Appeal.

Dr. Pierson said that America is the key to the evangelization of the world. In order to the conquest of the world we must conquer America. Our strength as a people is in the Ohio Valley. We must go into all the world by way of Dixie, the Pacific Coast and New England. Church Extension is of pre-eminent importance in this. It is the stay and support of all our evangelistic forces. It makes possible the completion of the works which they begin.

Less than one-fourth of the area of this country, containing 30 per cent. of its population, contains 75 per cent. of our membership. In three-fourths of this country we are a feeble folk, almost unknown. This is a missionary territory. We may plant missions, but they will die without homes. We must house them.

The Congregationalists made a strong appeal for funds in their literature last year, because they had 200 homeless churches. We have 2,500. Place one on each fifty-foot lot and they would stretch out 24 miles. Think of it! Twenty-four miles of homeless churches. We have more than 100 of these homeless congregations in Kansas. We have 5,700 preachers, 10,000 churches, perhaps 10 per cent. of them dead, and it leaves us with about 6,500 housed congregations.

A conservative Missouri brother says: "For five years past we have organized six congregation per week and built three buildings, or we have 4 per cent. annual increase in organizations and 2 per cent. in buildings. In five years we have gained 1,570 church organizations, or 19 per cent. We gained in the same period $2,745,000 in value of church property, or 20 per cent. Half of this latter was in enlargement and improvement of our older churches. Half of these 1,570 new churches are unhoused. Brethren, we must do better."

The mission of Church Extension is not so much to build churches as to boost them. Other churches have recognized the great worth and work of Church Extension.

Up to January 1, 1898, the Methodists have received $5,985,000 for church erection. They have built 10,552 buildings and their present receipts run about $10,000 per month.

The Congregationalists have a fund of over $3,250,000 and have assisted nearly 2,900 churches. During the last triennium, ending July 1, their receipts were $570,000 and built 377 churches.

The Baptists have a fund of above a million. They have assisted 1,428 churches, 91 of them last year.

The Presbyterians have largely a gift fund. The loan feature is of more recent introduction. The large part of their work in church erection has been done by donation. They have aided 6,305 churches, and the sum total of their benevolence in this direction amounts to nearly three and one-half million dollars. Last year they aided 216 churches with $126,000.

Our own fund amounts to $155,000, have built 384 churches, and 99 of them have returned their loans in full.

Some have complained, claiming that the expense is entirely disproportioned to the work done. Remember that when the fund has quadrupled, the expense will probably not have doubled. The expense of handling a small fund is proportionately much greater than for a large one. We pay our secretary less than any other board, except one, and that one does no field work and is really not much more than a clerk.

With all of these homeless churches and new organizations multiplying rapidly, and our work going forward at a constantly accelerating speed, we must have a larger Church Extension fund in order to discharge our duty as a people, and to enter the doors of opportunities that God has opened before us. We must do larger things along this line. We must strike for $250,000 by the year 1900. Let us pray and push for this result. VERNON J. ROSE,
Kansas Correspondent for Church Extension.

Church Extension Fund.

The National Conventional at Indianapolis, last October, made the following recommendations: "Because the board can answer but one appeal in four, we recommend that unusual effort be put forth to raise our Church Extension Fund to one-quarter of a million dollars by the close of 1900. To this end your committee recommends that more attention be given to the September offering. Thus far we have compelled the board to raise seventy-five per cent. of this money by going into the field after it. We must raise more by annual offerings in September, and because this is the month after vacation, the month after summer sluggishness in the churches, when the pulse of church life is not vigorous, we urge that extraordinary effort be used to work up a generous and general offering for this important work."

From last October we have just three years in which to lift our fund from $150,000 to $250,000. To do this we must raise $35,000 of new money each year, the interest paying current expenses while this is being done.

To raise $35,000 annually the following plan is proposed: The board will endeavor from the collections in the churches at the September offering, asking each church to raise its fair proportion in order to secure this amount. The other $15,000 the board will endeavor to secure annually in pledges and bequests.

The board now invites the earnest help of the brotherhood at large to the accomplishment of this worthy object. "Nuggets of Truth on Church Extension" which explain the work in full, will be sent free to all churches who will notify us by card. We will also send collection envelopes to churches who desire to use them. Send in orders at once and let preparation be made in a definite and systematic manner to reach the $250,000 by the collections of the next three offerings.

A suggestion as to what each congregation ought to raise has been mailed to the churches, and it is hoped each congregation will take pride in doing its part toward raising $20,000 by the September offering.

Send orders for literature and envelopes to Financial Exhibit.

Comparing the receipts for Foreign Missions for ten months of this current missionary year with the corresponding time last year shows the following:

	1997	1898	Gain
No. cont'ing churches	2,550	2,856	306
No. cont'ing Sunday-schools	2,753	3,156	413
No. cont'ing Endv. Societ's	274	380	106
No. cont'ing individuals	749	701	48*
Amount	$88,729.60	$102,324.03	$13,594.43

Comparing the amounts from different sources shows the following:

	1897	1898	Gain
Churches	$36,659.33	$42,755.35	$6,095.96
Sunday-schools	27,951.94	31,687.31	3,735.37

After A Battle.

BY HELEN A. RAINS.

A crown, a crown for the living bring,
A wreath for the noble dead;
For some let the praise of our nation ring,
For some let our tears be shed.
For some we shall stand at the cottage gate,
To greet with a kiss once more;
For some we'll no longer watch and wait,
For them is life's greetings o'er.
For some will the plume and banner wave
Anew for the brave to bear;
For some bring the bier and prepare the grave
Their place is no longer here.

A crown, a crown for the living now,
A wreath for our noble dead;
For this do the leaves of the laurel glow,
For this has the myrtle spread.
Much work is there for our hands to-night
For those that have struggled well;
Brave boys that have stood through the storm of fight,
And those who have nobly fell.
'Tis mete that our smiles with a crown should go,
Our tears with the myrtle wreath,
For one has been made for the living brow.
And one for the brow of death.

Only a Fisherman's Son.

BY ALFRED BRUNK.

Concluded.

It was arranged that Ethan should go to Sacramento and be Dr. Henderson's office boy; the doctor to come after him in two or three weeks.

Mr. Langdon speedily recovered his health and in a few days was out in his boat, fishing in the fruitful waters of the Sacramento. He was now very kind in his treatment of Ethan, and as they would spend the day on the beautiful river, drawing out good draughts of fish, and as fishing was no longer held up before him as the chief thing in the world, Ethan began to feel that there was much pleasure in it after all, and almost regretted that he was going to leave it, perhaps for life. He now enjoyed almost unlimited freedom, and often visited his grandmother. She rejoiced greatly that the door of opportunity had at last been thrown open to him.

"Work hard, my boy, and never forget your parents and your younger brothers and sisters. Make yourself an honorable name that they may have reason to be proud of you. Never let them blush for shame on your account."

The news went all over the community that Ethan was going to Sacramento and become a doctor.

"A pretty doctor he'll make," laughingly, said Mary Smith. "I wouldn't let him pull my cat's tooth," and she giggled, thinking she had made a very witty remark.

Ethan felt that he could not leave home without calling upon Mary. She received him politely and said she would be sorry to see him go, but she knew he would be back again in a few days.

"I expect to come back and visit my folks as often as I can," he said.

"Oh, yes, of course," she replied, "I expect you will. Why it won't be two weeks till you will be back here to stay,"

"I don't know," said Ethan somewhat provoked, "but I don't think I will."

"When you get down there and get to paintin' pictures, won't you paint mine?" she asked, with mock-solemnity, then laughed, and turned it off with a little cough. He saw that she was making fun of him and turned very red in the face.

"It takes a long time to learn to paint, I am told," he said quietly.

He soon took his leave, scarcely knowing whether to be glad or sorry he had called.

There was one who was genuinely sorry to have Ethan leave, and that was his mother. She had in her heart idolized him all his life, but because of the misunderstanding between Ethan and his father, she had been compelled in a great measure to hide her feelings. But now that harmony prevailed, she caressed and fondled him to her heart's content.

At last the doctor's boat appeared at the landing, and that gentleman appeared at the house with a new suit of clothes, hat and shoes for Ethan. Donning his new clothes and bidding his loved ones an affectionate "good-bye," the little vessel glides down the river, Ethan waves his handkerchief, the boat goes around a bend in the river and is lost to view.

CHAPTER III.

Ethan felt rather awkward for some time in his new place. Every-thing was so strange and different from what he had been accustomed to, that at times he became very homesick, and one night as he lay upon his bed, restless and sleepless, the pangs of homesickness so overcame him that he actually wept. He longed to see his brothers and sisters, his mother, and felt that it would be a relief if he could go out with his father in the fishing boat! Then he thought of Mary Smith, pretty, black-eyed, teasing girl. How he would like to see her. Then he remembered that she had predicted his early return home. He shut his lips tightly together. "No," said he to himself, "she shall not laugh at me this time, I'll show her what I am." And with this resolve firmly anchored in his mind he went to sleep.

Ethel Henderson and her father spent a great deal of time outdoors, either on the boat or driving out into the country, and Ethan was called upon sometimes to join them on these trips. Occasionally, Dr. Henderson would take him home for a few hours, and the respect which his own people and old neighbors showed him, served to increase his own self-respect. One day he went with Dr. Henderson and Ethel to see a fine collection of paintings and statuary on J Street. He was greatly pleased with what he saw, and looked in rapture at the various masterpieces. One especially attracted his attention; it was a Swiss landscape scene. There was a beautiful little lake, a plain stretching away into the distance, at the farther side of which rose the mountains in magnificent splendor, their hoary heads clearly outlined against the blue sky. In the midst of the lake was a small sail-boat, with a man in the act of turning the boat around. In the stern, sat a young man and young lady who were wistfully looking toward an old bare-headed man upon the shore, who was holding out both arms toward them. The name of the painting was "Called Back." Ethan called the attention of Ethel and her father to it and they thought it was indeed a masterpiece. A few mornings after that the doctor entered the office and Ethan showed him a picture which was a sketch of the painting, "Called Back." Ethan had copied it from memory.

"I must show this to Ethel, my boy," said the doctor. That young lady was very much pleased at this manifestation of Ethan's skill.

"Papa," she said, "Ethan must go to school. He has talent and it must be developed."

And so it was determined that Ethan should be sent to the city schools, assisting Dr. Henderson in his leisure hours.

As Ethel grew into young womanhood her health improved some with the years, although it was evident that she would never be strong. She was a constant inspiration to her father, who had followed her mother to her last resting-place many years before. She lived for her father as he lived for her, and each deemed it a pleasure to labor for the other. Kind and helpful to all, she was of great assistance to Ethan. He began to regard her as an older sister, and confined to her his aspirations and difficulties. She led him to the Savior and he became an earnest Christian. In such an atmosphere, is it any wonder that his noblest impulses gathered strength with the years?

After Ethan had been with Dr. Henderson about four years, the doctor said to him one day: "Ethan what would you think of a trip to Rome?"

"Why, sir, I should like it very much, but that is not possible. It takes money to go to Rome."

"So it does, Ethan, so it does, and that is just what I wish to speak to you about. If you wish to study painting, Rome is the place for you. And Ethel and I have talked it over and decided that if you desired to go, I will loan you the money."

Tears stood in the eyes of the young man. "You are too kind, sir, but I hope you will never have cause to regret it, I will accept your kind offer and go as soon as proper arrangements can be made."

Ethan had made remarkable progress, not only in school, but out of it. He had developed his powers of observation and become a good character-reader. He could detect a swindler in a very few moments.

He concluded now to spend a couple of weeks with his parents. He helped his father with his fishing and enjoyed it immensely; had some fine visits with his grandmother, Mrs. Smith. That estimable lady talked to him by the hour about Italy, and told him he must not fail to visit her old home, which he promised faithfully to do. One evening when he returned from one of those delightful trips up the river, he found Mary Smith at his father's, Mary has grown stouter, but is as lively as ever.

"Well, they do tell me you are goin' to Rome! Sakes alive! but that's a long ways off." She now tried to win Ethan's regard, but it was useless. He now saw just how coarse and ignorant she was.

Judge Harrington, so-called because in an earlier day he had been justice of the peace, was president of the Commonwealth Bank of Sacramento, his daughter Mabel, about three years younger than Ethan, attended the same school he did, and already they were very much attached to each other.

One day Dr. Henderson and Ethel came up the river and stopped at Mr. Langdon's.

"Ethan," said the doctor, "I have some important business in San Francisco that must be attended to, but you can see to it just as well as I can. So come on down with us, and you can come up and finish your visit when you get back from San Francisco,"

The next morning Ethan boarded the 10:30 train for San Francisco. Among the passengers he noticed Judge Harrington, who greeted him pleasantly. The judge was a pretty good-natured man, but looked sharply after the dollars. The day was intensely warm and the car doors and windows were open, and the passengers were fanning themselves with fans, hats, books or papers.

Between Sacramento and Davisville there is a long stretch of level road, with a slight curve upon an embankment about, three miles east of Davisville. The train had slowly pulled out of the Sacramento depot, crossed the river, started out under a full head of steam, and was making the usual fast time of the San Francisco Express. They were passing around this curve when crash! bang! crash! and the cars were crashing in one another and plunging down the embankment! It was a scene of the greatest confusion. Men, women and children were piled in heaps in the wrecked cars. Some were cursing, others praying, some were laughing, others weeping; some were loudly shouting, others silent; some climbed out of the car windows, rejoicing that they were unhurt; some were badly bruised, while others were unconscious. Ethen was on the ground unhurt. How he got out of the car he never knew. He saw just a few feet before him, Judge Harrington lying on the ground unconscious. Casting his eyes upward he saw a car standing on end upon another car, which was lying on one side at the bottom of the enbankment. The first mentioned car projected partly over the end of the prone one, and had already begun to fall, Ethan grasped the situation instantly. He must rescue Judge Harrington or he would be crushed to death. Darting toward the prostrate, unconscious man, he dragged him from under the falling car. Laying the judge upon the ground and gasping for breath, he straightened himself up and involuntarily threw out his right arm just as the car came crashing to the ground.

The car came in contact with his arm just above the wrist, and snapped the bones as if they had been thin glass. But he knew it not. Seeing that the judge was safe, he ran to a group of people a few steps away, and singling out a young man said:

"Go, Charlie, to Davisville, and wire the officials at Sacramento! Run quick! Telegraph to Dr. Henderson."

No need to say any more. Charlie was gone like an arrow.

"Hello, young man! Seems you got hurt," said a man to Ethan, pointing to his arm. Ethan glanced at it and saw the blood trickling down his hand.

"It is nothing but a slight bruise," said Ethan. "It will soon be all right."

"I hope so," said the man. "I trembled for you when you went for the judge. That's what I call grit, I do. Let's go and see how the judge is making it,"

So they walked back to Judge Harrington, who was now looking about him utterly confused.

"Hello, judge!" said the man, "how are you now? Get up and shake yourself," and he and Ethan helped him to his feet. "If it hadn't been for our young friend, here, you would have been a goner. I reckon you were lying right there where that car is, and he jumped right in and pulled you out while the car was falling! Talk about pluck! If he hasn't got it, nobody has. And that's what he got for it," pointing to Ethan's arm, which had begun to swell and was getting very painful.

"So I owe my life to you, sir," said Judge Harrington to Ethan. "You have my most profound thanks and when we get back to Sacramento come to the bank aud your bravery shall be rewarded."

"Thank you, Mr. Harrington," replied Ethan proudly, "but I want no reward for doing my duty."

Soon the officials and doctors from Sacramento were at the wreck, and the wounded were put on special cars and sent back to the city. Dr. Henderson gave Ethan his immediate attention.

"Come, my boy," said he, "get right on here and let us get back to town as quick as we can."

As soon as the train arrived in Sacramento, Dr. Henderson took Ethan to his home. His practiced eye soon saw that Ethan's hand could not be saved. That it must be amputated, and that at once, or he would not lose only his hand, but his life.

"Well, Ethan, my boy, I have disagreeable news to tell you, but I know a strong-nerved lad like you can bear it," said the doctor, as cheerfully as possible.

"You mean that this hand must come off, is that it?" asked Ethan.

"That's right, Ethan, that's right," replied Dr. Henderson, "but you shall suffer no pain, no, not a particle."

CHAPTER IV.

After Ethan's hand had been amputated Dr. Henderson sent for Mrs. Langdon, and the presence of his mother gave him great encouragement, in this, the gloomiest hour of his life.

Sometime after the wreck, Ethan was sitting one morning in Dr. Henderson's office, when the railroad's attorney came in and said:

"Mr. Langdon, I have called to settle with you. How much do you think we owe you for the loss of your hand."

"Well sir," said Ethan, I would not have taken $100,000 for that hand. It not only disfigures me for life, but I must give up my life's dream of being a painter."

They finally fixed on $5,000 and the money was paid over. Just as the lawyer left, a messenger boy brought Ethan a note which he discovered was from Judge Harrington, requesting his presence at the bank. Arriving at that institution he was ushered into the president's private office, and into that gentleman's presence.

Judge Harrington arose, and extended his hand. "I am glad to see you appearing so well, Mr. Langdon. Pray be seated," and going to his private safe he counted out $10,000 in crisp bank notes, and stepping up to Ethan said:

"Mr. Langdon, you saved my life and I wish to make a small return for your brave, generous act."

Ethan arose and pushed the judge's hand from him. "No, sir," said he, "I cannot take pay for doing that which was simply my duty. As for the loss of my hand the railroad company has already settled that."

"Be seated sir, I wish to have a talk with you," said the judge, going to the safe and replacing the bills, then seating himself in front of Ethan. "Dr. Henderson tells me that you were expecting soon to go to Rome and study painting, and that the accident has rendered that impossible."

"Yes sir," sadly replied Ethan, "as my right hand is gone, the desire of my life to be a painter, goes with it."

"Dr. Henderson further informed me that you have a good business education, and are apt in detecting swindlers. Well, sir, we need just such a man in this institution, and if you will consider the proposition, I can give you a position that will pay you well."

So it was arranged that Ethan should go into the bank and become general overseer, after he had acquainted himself with the workings of the institution. He then went home and spent several weeks with his parents. Nearly every one regretted his great loss, and especially did his grandmother mourn because of it.

"But it will be all right Ethan, its bound to be all right," she told him. "You do your duty and trust to God's loving care."

Mary Smith used every means in her power to once more win him to her side, and when she found her efforts unavailing she sneeringly asked, "Who would want a one-armed man, any how? And as for his makin' pictures I knew he never would."

Ethan returned to Sacramento and began his labors in the bank, and soon mastered the workings of the various departments. His keen observation was very serviceable to the managers of that institution, and he soon became a favorite with everyone connected with the bank. Judge Harrington learned to rely upon his sound judgment and kept him with him all he could. Ethan told him that he was in love with his daughter, Mabel, and received his consent to their marriage.

"Ethan met with a lucky accident when he lost his hand," said the judge one day to his daughter.

"Why do you think so, father?" asked Mabel, who was a medium-sized brunette. "I thought it was a great calamity."

"Why, if he had not lost it, he would have gone to Rome and studied painting, got himself into debt and then perhaps would have failed, for it takes a good painter to succeed nowadays. But as it is, he has settled down to business and is becoming a first-class business man."

"Well father," said Mabel, "that only shows his good sense and determination. Were it not for these good qualities he would spoil his life grieving over what might have been. But as it is, he puts the impossible behind him and goes on to success in another calling."

"Perhaps you are right," said her father and the conversation ceased.

When Ethan had been in the bank about a year, he and Mabel were quietly married, and settled down to housekeeping in a pretty cottage near the eastern limits of the city. Judge Harrington became feebler, and the care of the bank developed more than ever upon Ethan.

One day his quick eye and ear saved the bank from a heavy robbery, which endeared him more than ever to the directors of that institution.

Ethan carefully saved his earnings and became a large stockholder in the bank. One day, at a meeting of the directors, Judge Harrington resigned the presidency of the bank, on account of his increasing infirmities. Ethan was unaminously elected to fill that important position.

"Let me congratulate you, Mr. Langdon," said one of the directors, "upon your election to the presidency of this bank. You have shown by your indomitable will, how to turn defeat into success, and that courage and perseverance will certainly reap their reward."

Lean Hard on Him.

My inability to do
A thing that merits rich reward—
My nothingness before the Lord
Prostrates me. I would shrink from view
In this great world of workers true.
Yea, overwhelmed with sense
Of my own insignificance,
I in obscurity away
Would hie, disheartened, and lie down
And die.
How can I do his will?
How his high purpose true fulfill?
How meet the obligations of
My being? How my fellows serve?
I shrink the task to try. It is Impossible. Too weak am I—
Too impotent in presence of Demands so sacred and so great!
But hark! A soothing voice I hear:
"I am thy strength. Lean hard on me.
Grace, plenteous grace, 'tis mine
To give. Lean hard."
I rise, and in
His might I forward go renewed
With strength omnipotent; assured
That leaning on his mighty arm,
I all things well can do for him.

THE LITTLE ONES.

BY ALICE CURTICE MOYER.

"Oh, that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away and be at rest."
"I would hasten my escape from the windy storm and tempest."—Ps. 55:6, 8.

They came in seriously from their play; these two dear little ones: The sweet little daughter with brown curls all about her face and blue eyes of such a wonderful, fathomless depth, wherein there came at times, an expression as though seeing the unseen, and of holding communion with him who is invisible, and the little brother whose hand she held, two years her junior, more practical than his sister, but none the less sweet and lovable because of it. There was a world of wonder on each little face.

Evidently, there had been a serious consultation between them, and play had been put aside for its consideration; then, for its satisfactory disposition, they had to come to the supreme authority on all subjects—mother.

SHEDSKIN 20 TIMES

My little boy broke out with an itching rash. I tried three doctors and medical college but he kept getting worse. There was not one square inch of skin on his whole body unaffected. He was one mass of sores, and the stench was frightful. In removing the bandages they would take the skin with them, and the poor child's screams were heart-breaking. After the second application of CUTICURA (ointment) I saw signs of improvement, and the sores to dry up. His skin peeled off twenty times, but now he is entirely cured.

Stopping at her knee, their faces all serious with the solemnity of the—to them—most important thought, they asked:

"Mother, do you suppose God will allow us to choose the sort of wings we are to have in heaven?"

"Because," said the sister, "we have decided on the kind we want."

Restraining a smile, the mother gently urged:

"Tell mother what sort you have decided upon."

"If it would be just the same to God," said the serious little daughter, "I should like to have wings like a butterfly—a beautiful white butterfly, that flies about in the sunshine and seems so happy."

"And I," said the practical little son most solemnly, "would like wings like a parrot, all green and glossy and strong-looking. Do you think God will let us choose for ourselves, mamma?"

Now this mother had a way of encouraging her little ones to tell her their thoughts and of opening to her their hearts fully and freely—gently reproving if necessary, sympathizing if possible—and as a result, had so completely gained their confidence, that in their hearts there was never a thought of withholding anything whatever from her loving consideration and counsel.

Therefore, she did not say, "Don't bother mother," or "Run away and play," or "Wait until you are older," etc., but answered:

"I think, dear ones, we can safely leave that question with God. All we need to do now, is to be ready, so that when the time comes, we may be satisfied with our reward."

"But mother, we will have wings, won't we?" urged the little son.

"That is another phase of the subject, my darling, which we must be content to leave unanswered until the time when all things shall be made known to us. We can safely trust to the Heavenly Father who doeth all things well, knowing that he has planned for us, that which is best."

"And we were thinking," said the sister softly, "how nice it would be if God would take us to him now. We want to be little angels—brother and I."

The sayings of this little daughter and the strong desire she frequently expressed to be in heaven, had often raised a great dread in the mother's heart, lest this desire should be granted, and that the Father would take this pure little one to himself, while she, selfishly, perhaps, did so pray to keep her on earth. But she found comfort, however, in the thought she now expressed.

"My darlings, your wish is granted. You are with God now. You are of his kingdom, for he has said so; and it is your mother's constant prayer that you may never emerge from the shelter of his arms; and whatever the life of the hereafter may be like unto, or whatever may be its conditions—these we can safely leave in his hands. That we may attain unto all its glories, is the question with which we have to do, and with which this life is concerned. It is here, in this life, that we need wings, and here we can have them by patient striving—wings that insure peace and happiness on earth, and blessedness in the hereafter."

Then she read to them the nine beatitudes, beginning with "Blessed are the poor in spirit," explaining how the possession of these requisites each bring a blessing, and how they may be likened unto wings that lift us up above all things earthly, and which may finally "fly away and be at rest."

"They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles."

She told them again, as she had often done before, how necessary it is to study pure and holy living from childhood—striving to be "more like Jesus." And that as sin is allowed to come in, peace and joy will go out; and how important it is that the dear little ones whom Jesus loves, should early begin to cultivate a beautiful "heart-garden" wherein may grow and blossom the rare and priceless plants of love and truth—taking great care that no tares find a lodging-place there.

Was this mother wise to speak thus metaphorically? Did their young minds grasp her meaning? Yes. The genuine child-like child, the child unspoiled by that artificialness which consists mainly of little tricks and small prettiness learned by heart, take wide views, ponder deep subjects, enjoy great books, and have large thoughts.

Since psychologists claim that it is the larger motor activities that develop first, we can understand from a philosophic point of view why these things are. But the more beautiful theory is that given by Coleridge: "In infancy, heaven lies all about us." Whatever may be the reason, we all know how children will leave their play to inquire into subjects that embarrass their elders because of their inability to readily answer. We have seen, with wonder, how quick they are to seize upon ideas of spiritual and fundamental meaning and distinctions of great breadth. But it must be because of their purity, their nearness to heaven, that they so readily read the character—see the hearts as it were—of those about them; a perception that becomes more or less dulled, perhaps, as the smaller and more prosaic things of life gradually assert their right to a place in our minds and lives. But "out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise." To merit the praise, the love and the confidence of the innocent child, is to reach a height of no small significance. A great and good man once stood at a crowded street crossing in a large city, waiting, in company with others, for an opportunity to cross over to the other side. In the waiting crowd, was a little girl. Feeling the need of a pilot, she looked into the faces of those about her, then walked straight up to this grand man and took hold of his hand. He piloted her safely across the street, and in relating the incident afterward, he said, that in all his life he had never appreciated any honor that had ever been conferred upon him, more than the confidence of that little child.

Oh, these little ones! How they get into our hearts and find firm lodgment there! When we hear men and women express a dislike for children, then may we know that there is something radically wrong with those men and women. Hard, indeed, must be the heart, that does not respond to the joy of happy childhood, or that is not touched by childish suffering, even though they be but strangers. And when these little ones come into the world as one's very own, a tiny speck of humanity, with its dependence, its wise look, its smiles and unexplained tears, it reaches a corner of the heart that has hitherto been untouched and unreached by any other love; and as we see it grow from day to day, month to month, and year to year, so should we realize in proportion our responsibilities concerning this life given into our care and keeping; and though we sigh over each transition, as from frocks to kilts, and from kilts to the "first suit," etc., of our sons, and over each lengthened tuck in the skirts of our daughters, yet we would not have it otherwise. We watch the gradual unfolding of these tender plants, and like Hannah of old, we long to lend our treasures to the Lord. We want to teach them in such a way as to lead them to see and to understand, and appreciate the possibilities of life. "It is a sad thing," says Munger, "to begin life with a low conception of it. It may not be possible for a young man to measure life, but it is possible to say, I am resolved to put life to its noblest and best use."

We cannot too early instill this sentiment into the heart and mind of a child. We cannot too early begin its training in all things moral and religious—watching, instructing, praying, guiding, with the help of the Heavenly Father, into that haven which is "safe from the storm and the tempest."

THE CURING OF THE CAPTAIN.*

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

The kingdom of Syria, with its capital at Damascus, was one of the fragments of the older Babylonian Empire, organized into separate existance about the period of Solomon, through the encouragement offered by Egytian kings, whose policy it was to erect as many barriers as possible between themselves and the strong rival power in the Mesopotamian Valley. The new kingdom under the dynasty of the Benhadads prospered so that already in the reign of Solomon it was the cause of serious concern to Israel (1 Kings 11:14-25, and in later days entered to no small extent into the politics and military operations of both the Northern and Southern kingdoms of Palestine (1 Kings 15: 16-21; 20: 1 f; 22:1 f; 2 Kings 6:8 f; 12:17 f). War between Syria on the east, and either Judah or Israel, and sometimes the two kingdoms on the west, in league against the common enemy, was the recognized order for several generations. These wars were marked by varying success. At times, Syria was victorious, and took portions of the East-Jordan territory from her rivals; and even Samaria was reduced to desperate straits of famine on one or two occasions. The results of a successful campaign were usually a great number of captives, to be reduced to slavery or sold into service, a money indemnity, and free trading privileges in the humbled capital. This latter condition was accomplished by setting apart certain streets in the city to the free use of merchants and residents of the stronger people. When the fortunes of war reversed, the conquered territory was reclaimed, and though the enslaved captives were not restored, the trading franchises were in turn extorted from the enemy (1 Kings 20:34).

In such a period of war, as in our own day, the military class in both nations came to the front, and the most conspicuous men of the times were successful warriors. Among the most notable figures at the court of Benhadad was a certain Naaman, a hero to whose prowess Syria owed much of her recent success. He enjoyed, like Jacob under David or Benaiah under Solomon, the full confidence of his royal master. But a great affliction had fallen upon him; he was a leper. This malady was the most dreaded of diseases of the east, as it is to this day, for it was recognized as incurable. It embraced a wider variety of phases, from simple skin disorders to to the dreaded elephantiasis. One might be a leper, without hope of cure, so far as the limited therapeutics of the day could give aid, and still find the disease no especial hindrance to the discharge of his public business, save that it menaced him with increasing disorder and shortened life. This seemed to have been the case with the Syrian. Again he might be so afflicted that only seclusion, as in the case of Uzziah (Azariah, 2 Kings 14:5), or expulsion from all contact with society, as was generally deemed necessary (2 Kings 7:3 f), could suffice. These poor creatures, objects of horror to the unaccustomed eye, infested the environs of cities, subsisting upon the scant charities of pitying people. They especially appealed to the sympathies of our Savior, and there is no more notable proof of the divine likness in Christians in these later years than the work for the lepers by missionaries, in which signal ministry of tenderness our own brethren in the far lands have been not the least conspicuous examples. Such a wreck as leprosy produces, if left to work its ravages, ever appealed to the Hebrew mind as the proof of divine wrath for sin, as the stroke of God; and so leprosy as a symbol of the disasters wrought by sin has stood as a significant figure of speech in the vocabulary of the church.

Among the Hebrew slaves taken in the Syrian raids was a girl who because a servant in Naaman's family, and who had known Elisha's power as a prophet and miracle-worker. It is evident that he was not in the habit of making his power a common and cheap thing. Even the king of Israel, who is not named by the writer of the narrative, but who was probably Jehoram, did not know enough of Elisha to be saved from deep perplexity when he received Benhadads message (v. 7). But among the common people, where religious elements always have freer course than in courts, the prophet was well known, and his miracles were the cause of wonder and faith in the power of God. The maiden's frequently expressed confidence in the prophet of her God was the impelling force that set in motion the cavalcade of Naaman to Palestine, and in the end made him a notable convert of the religion of Jehovah. No position could promise less than that of a captive maiden in a foreign land, and yet no episode of the Old Testament is more interesting as a proof that God uses small instruments to accomplish great purposes, and that his love goes out to men of foreign races, as well as to those of Hebrew birth (Luke 4:27).

By the advice of his king Naaman started with a letter to the king of Israel. He had provided himself with great treasure to pay the price of his recovery. Jehoram, who was quite unconscious of the power of the prophet living in his capital, was terrified upon receipt of the letter, which be regarded as a trap, or an attempt to find a cause for war. It was then that the preacher who had seen Elijah's ascent to heaven, assumed the responsibility for the whole transaction and bade the king send the Syrian to his cottage. Here, then, began that discipline of the proud man whose sword had glittered in the foremost battle for Syrian glory. Instead of being greeted as a great guest at court, he was bidden to drive with all his train of followers to the dwelling of Elisha, among the more modest houses in the upper city (v. 24). Then when he had arrived he was not even honored with a sight of the prophet; the latter only sent word to him that he was to go dip repeatedly in Jordan in order to be heeled. And why should he go to Jordan? It was a rushing, turbulent, muddy stream; while in his own country there were beautifully clear waters—the rivers of Damascus. He had seemingly come all the way to be made the laughing-stock of a Hebrew rabi. It was too much to endure. He went away from the place of his humiliation in a rage. This is just the place where many men break down. The lesson of humility is too hard. The price of discipline is too great. The hour of opportunity passes, and life goes on fruitless. Many a man is asking himself why he has never succeeded better in his work for Christ. In not a few cases the true answer is to be found in his unwillingness to serve except in his own way, and with his own self-pride and importance preserved. It takes a long and severe discipline to teach one that the best of gifts and abilities may be made quite useless by a self-centered mind, which seeks great things for itself and not for God.

Fortunately, when his own pride proved his worst enemy, the love of his servants saved him. Their better wisdom prevailed, and obeying the directions of the man of God he went to the Jordan and bathed the seven times prescribed, and found his flesh restored again to freshness and health. His pride had bowed, and his blessing came. The power of God was vindicated, the prophet was honored, the captain converted, and the maiden's promise fulfilled.

SUGGESTIONS FOR TEACHING.

Riches and honors prove of small satisfaction in face of a great affliction. As leprosy blasts the physical life, so sin works ruin to the soul. God uses very humble instruments to spread his truth and accomplish his purposes. The fame of a quiet, godly life, unknown to courts, may be wide-spread among humble people who have felt its pervasive power. Men of the Elisha type find the rewards of doing good, not in money given, but in joy experienced; men like Gehazi prize the gifts. To know that there is "a prophet in Israel," that there are those who can give true counsel in times of danger, is the greatest assurance that can come to a people. The path of humility is the path of service and exaltation. "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted." The love and mercy of God are not bounded by race or distance. Obedience to divine commands always results in blessing.

PRACTICAL USES OF THE BIBLE.

(Ps. 119:97-105.)

"Every Scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness." Read this whole passage from 2 Tim. 3; say from verse 14 to the close. This passage tells what some of the uses for the Bible are. Perhaps a few of them may be classified roughly somewhat as follows:

It is useful for conversion. Nothing is so powerful as the Word of God for bringing men and women to Christ. It is quick and powerful, sharper than a Damascus blade. The winged words of Scripture will sometimes pierce a callous heart where arguments fall blunted to the ground. Jesus defended himself on the mountain of temptation with the sword of the Spirit, alone, which is the Word of God. And a single shaft of Scripture has often been known to convict a sinner and win him to a righteous life. For this reason, in trying to win men to the Master, nothing is so effective as the words of Scripture, spoken from a loving heart. Avoid then, argument, and quote the Word, if you would win souls. Passages printed on little cards and distributed to acquaintances and even strangers have often been of inestimable value. Such cards are already prepared in abundance and may be obtained by addressing The Silent Evangelism Association, 30 Lafayette Place, New York City, and enclosing stamps for sample cards.

The Bible is useful for comfort. If you have a friend in trouble, you can in nowise so comfort that friend as by quoting, unostentatiously, some of the wealth of comforting words of him who cried through his prophet, "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people." "The Father of mercies and the God of all comfort, comforteth us in all our affliction that we may be able to comfort them that are in any affliction, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God." Recently a woman in one of our western cities was thrown into frantic grief by a loss such as seldom comes to any one in the world. A friend stood by the chair of the tearless, moaning creature, and quietly, with deep sympathy, quoted some of the tenderest, most blessed words of consolation in the good Book—"The Lord is my shepherd," "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee," "There is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother," "I go to prepare a place for you," "Let not your heart be troubled," and numberless others. Little by little the storm of grief was stilled, tears flowed, and some measure, at least, of relief was obtained. There is thus expressed the double sympathy of a loving, kindly friend, and of the great Father who pitieth his children.

For conduct the sacred Volume is invaluable. There are few situations of doubt, few moments in which one can scarcely decide his course, that do not possess within the all-comprehensive lids of the great Book some word that will help in time of need. The Sermon on the Mount alone will decide most questions of casuistry, moreover, the examples of lives nobly lived in the midst of like passions as our's, and tempted in all points like as we are, are an unfailing source of strength.

The Bible is useful for the respect which it inspires in any man of discernment. Franklin sat at the table of French critics and heard the Bible abused, while other books were lauded to the skies. When opportunity offered, Franklin begged leave to read a certain passage that he considered good literature. The critics were thrown into extravagant ecstacies at the reading and enquired what the book was. The piece of literature he read was Ruth, or parts of Job, or Ecclesiastes. Every man who tells the story has a different selection that he declares Franklin read, and I am not sure which was the passage. This diversity only shows, however, how much of the Bible is worthy of all praise, even as literature. Many literary students are gaining respect for the Bible through Prof. Moulton's little volumes, "The Modern Reader's Bible," published by the MacMillans. They are simply the the books of the Bible published separately in little volumes of modern form. Prof. Child, at Harvard, always had his students, in a certain course, read portions of the Bible, simply as examples of fine literature.

For worship the Bible is useful. For the quiet hour, when one would come face to face with the Father, and see him who is invisible, no medium is better through which to peer than his sacred Word. Our longings are expressed for us, who feel after him if happily we may find him, in no other way so adequately as through these inspired pages. The Psalms, some of Isaiah, the Sermon on the Mount, the thirteenth to seventeenth of John, the thirteenth of First Corinthians, and a world of sweet, quiet, meditative worship-words, how they express for us the inexpressible!

The best proof of the practical value of any instrument is the finding of it in every home. The sale of an article is the test of popular appreciation. Few things are found in so many homes as the sacred Book. No other volume is so widely bought.

THE NORMAL INSTRUCTOR

A SERIES OF

NORMAL BIBLE STUDIES

FOR TEACHERS, CLASSES, INSTITUTES AND ASSEMBLIES.

By W. W. DOWLING,

Author of Christian Bible Lesson Annuals, Etc., Etc.
Editor of Our Young Folks.

This Series of Normal Lessons, when completed, will be much fuller and more comprehensive than any other before the public. The following parts are now ready:

BOOKS OF THE SERIES.

I. THE BOOK.—This Part contains a General View and Analysis of the Books of the Bible, with numerous helpful Diagrams, and Questions for Review.

II. THE CHRIST.—Part II. under this title, treats of the Christ, and contains a General View of his Names, Offices, Symbols and Types, followed, first by an Analytical View of the Prophecies relating to Him, and then by a Series of Lessons giving an Outline of His Ministry.

III. THE CHURCH.—In Part III. the Church is considered in all its phases. There are lessons on the Church in Prophecy, the Church in Type, the Church's Name, Head, Foundation, Beginning, Membership, Ministry, Mission, Unity and Future Glory.

IV. THE LAND.—Part IV. treats of Bible Geography. It takes up the subject under the two headings of "Old Testament Lands" and "New Testament Lands," the chief attention in each department being given to Palestine, the Land of the Prophets, the Saviour and the Apostles. There are numerous maps and diagrams to aid in the understanding of the subject matter presented.

OTHER PARTS will follow, treating of Institutions, History and kindred subjects, as rapidly as is consistent with a careful consideration of the great themes to be treated.

STYLE AND PRICE.

Each Part contains subject-matter enough for a three month's course of study. The volumes are bound separately in strong manilla covers, and sold at 15 cents per copy, or $1.50 per dozen.

Literature.

A Vade Mecum.

I have just finished reading a book from which I have gained much good, and I desire to say a few words in its commendation. Several considerations seem to make it unnecessary for me or any one else to commend it to others. First, its author is Phillips Brooks. Second, it dates from the year 1877, hence commands the respect due to mature years. The book to which I refer is Phillips Brooks' "Lectures on Preaching." I have read it with much pleasure and profit. I feel that any preacher who has not read it has failed to read a very helpful book—one of the helpful books that helps. It helps one at the very points at which one feels most need of help. Every young preacher should have a well-read, a well-studied, and a well-lived copy of it. The subjects of its eight lectures are as follows:

1. "The Two Elements in Preaching."
2. "The Preacher Himself."
3. "The Preacher in His Work."
4. "The Idea of The Sermon."
5. "The Making of The Sermon."
6. "The Congregation."
7. "The Ministry for Our Age."
8. "The Value of The Human Soul."

I take at random a few gems from its pages. Every page fairly glitters with them. "Preaching has in it the two essential elements, truth and personality." "It is easy to be a John the Baptist, so far as the desert and camel's hair and locusts and wild honey go." "Count your manliness the soul of your ministry and resist all attacks upon it, however sweetly they may come." "The powers of the pastor's success are truth and sympathy together." "Beware of hobbies. Fasten yourself to the center of your ministry and not to some point on the circumference." "The confidence of the minister in the people is at the bottom of every confidence of the people in the minister." "Every parishoner is a weakened repetition of the minister's ideas and ways." "The real question about a sermon is, not whether it is extemporaneous when you deliver it to your people, but whether it ever was extemporaneous — whether it ever sprang freshly from your heart and mind." "The strongest bigotry is often found among theological laymen rather than among clergymen. The pillars of the church are apt to be like the Pillars of Hercules, past which no man might sail." "When it really rains, the puddles as well as the ocean bear witness of the shower." "If you really want to drag a man out of the fire, you will not be distracted into self-conceit by his praises of the grace and softness of the hand that you reach out to him. You will say to him, 'Stop your compliments and take hold.'" "Truth and timeliness together make the full preacher." "The preacher must mainly rely on the strength of what he does believe, and not on the weakness of what he does not believe." "We anticipate a time when men shall be cordially tolerant and earnest believers at once. When that time comes it will be a new thing in the world." "Man in his mystery and wonderfulness is more full of the suggestion of God than either abstract truth or physical nature." On every page, gems of similar worth are to be found. Through every word the charming personality of the author breathes—it is the atmosphere of the book. Buy it and sell it not. Make it your Vade Mecum. The reading of it will make you a better man, a better preacher. It will make you love humanity more.

MAGAZINES.

Scribner's Magazine will have each month, under the title "Episodes of the War," a collection of brilliant episodes described by eye-witnesses. They are to be brief and to the point.

The cartoons reproduced in the August Review of Reviews from Spanish journals serve to indicate the density of popular ignorance in Spain as to the facts of the present war. For instance, one cartoon shows Cervera's fleet as successfully slipping past Sampson at Santiago; another represents Cervera as having Schley bottled up; while in a third, Admiral Dewey figures as a rat caught in Spain's Philippine trap.

The most ambitious scheme in color-printing undertaken by an American magazine is the reproduction of eight full-page designs by Henry McCarter, which accompany E. S. Martin's noble poem, "The Sea is His," in Scribner's August number. The way in which the shading of color is attained is mechanically ingenious and artiscally effective. It is a novelty in color-printing, even for experts.

The Religious Review of Reviews, for August is fully up to the high standard this magazine has maintained since its inception, both in literary and artistic points of view. The list of contributors in this number is convincing proof of the excellence of the contents. Handsome illustrations, printed in color, lend a charm to the magazine. The leading articles are by able men and particularly interesting and timely. The departments are, as usual, filled with the best. Only topics of the livest interest are discussed in this portion of the magazine. The list suggest their contents: Current Articles of Importance, Periodicals Reviewed, Notes from Recent Editorials, The Religious World, Sermonic Review Section, Editorial Notes, Review of Recent Publications, In a Lighter Vein, and Contents of Reviews and Magazines. Published monthly, New York. $2.00 a year. Preachers, $1.50. Single copies, 20 cents

BARNHILL.

Robert Barnhill was born Oct. 19, 1818, and died at his home at Gallatin, Mo., July 25, 1898. On April 22, 1847, he married Miss Mary A. Conarroe, at Bridgeport, Ind. This couple has spent periods of their lives in California, Kansas and Missouri. Four children have blessed their home, Nathan R., Mary E., A. C., and M. K. Of these, Nathan R. Barnhill, of Iowa, and Mrs. Mary E. Cameron, of Gallatin, Mo., stood beside their mother at the open grave on July 26th. Their brothers have "gone on before." Bro. Barnhill was a liberal man toward the church and to the missionaries and to charities. He gave more than $1,200 to the cause of foreign missions. Thus has closed a useful life and one to be missed by his family, the church and a large circle of friends. H.

COOK.

Byron L. Cook was born in East Paris, Mich., Nov. 4, 1866, where he died after five months' sickness, July 26, 1898. He was converted and baptized by Bro. W. H. Scott in 1889 and has been a faithful member of the church at Cascade till removed by death. He was cut down in the prime of life, being in his 32nd year. He leaves a wife, two children, parents and two brothers. The writer preached the funeral sermon at the parental home, July 28, 1898. J. Jay Finley.

Cascade, Mich., Aug. 1, 1898.

FORD.

Dr. Barton W. Ford died June 27, 1898, at his home in Middletown, Mo. A wave of sorrow swept over the little town and surrounding vicinity when the fact of his death became known. Nearly all his life had been spent there and he was known and loved by the entire community. For many years prior to his death, Dr. Ford was an elder in the Christian Church at Middletown and superintendent of the Bible-school. He was gentle and kind and lived and taught the gospel of Christ. No person have I known who was truer to the Master than was he, and eternity alone will reveal the good he accomplished. He lived for Christ and in Christ and now the great reward is his. The entire community mourns his departure. He leaves a Christian wife and six children to imitate his virtues. They sorrow not as others who have no hope. The writer conducted the funeral service in the presence of a vast throng of friends and relatives.

Claude E. Hill.

HAGIST.

Caroline Hagist died at her home, one mile north of this city, Tuesday, July 26, a patient sufferer for many months, but now at rest with God. She leaves a husband, four children, three daughters and one son, and two sisters. Our sister has gone before, and will await the coming of her loved ones.

LANGSFORD.

Sister Narsisia Dunlap Langsford was born in Kentucky, April 6, 1820, died July 26, 1898, being 78 years, 3 months and 20 days of age. She united with the Christian Church when quite young and has been a faithful member of the same for over 50 years. She was married to Bro. J. H. Langsford 55 years ago last spring. Her sickness was long and painful, but she bore it all without a murmur, leaving a bright example of Christian faith and patience. She leaves a husband, daughter and many friends to mourn her loss. She was a member of the church at New Philadelphia, McDonough County, Ill., and was buried near that place, the writer conducting the funeral services. C. Edwards.

Payson, Ill.

MARTIN.

Died, in Little Rock, Ark., July 14, 1898, Sister Huldah Tracy Martin, wife of Jas. Allen Martin, one of the elders of the First Christian Church of this city. Huldah Tracy Toncray was born Feb. 20, 1834, in Memphis, Tenn. Her father, Silas T. Toncray, organized the Baptist Church in Little Rock in 1825, and on July 4, 1832, it became the First Christian Church. Her mother was Orpah Hansbrough before marriage. Her father and mother died in Memphis; he in 1847, she in 1848. She came to Little Rock at the age of 14, and lived with her aunt, Maria Stevenson. She was baptized in April, 1850, and up to the day of her death lived the life of a devoted Christian. She was married to James Allen Martin, Oct. 21, 1852. She was the mother of nine children, six boys and three girls. Four, Silas C., Mollie O., Frank D., and James Cook, survive, all grown and married except James Cook. "Aunt Huldah," as she was familiarly called, was sorely afflicted for the past four years, and during all this time, ever manifested a loving, patient, cheerful disposition. She sleeps in Jesus.

J. B. Marshall.

Argenta, Ark., July 30, 1898.

McCLURE.

Bro. McClure was born in Knox County, Indiana, on the 6th day of October, 1840, and in 1853 he with his parents and two sisters removed to Oregon, locating on a farm near Eugene City, where he spent his boyhood days. In the year 1859 he obeyed the gospel and united with the Christian Church during a meeting held by Elders Gillmore, Collison, and Philip Mulkey, and for 39 years lived a devoted and consistent life. On the 13th day of November, 1864, Bro. McClure and Amanda E. Collison were united in marriage by Elder Joseph Sharp. The fruits of their marriage were 12 children, three of them having preceded their father to the spirit land. He leaves a widow, 4 sons and 5 daughters and a host of friends to mourn their loss. He lived to see all of his children obey the gospel, except the 2 youngest that are living and 2 that died in infancy, and it can truthfully be said that his house was a house of prayer. In the year 1880 he with his family removed from the state of Oregon, (to the now) state of Washington and located on a farm near Palouse City, Whitmon County, where he spent the remainder of his days. His death occurred on the 29th day of June, 1898, he being at that time 57 years, 8 months, and 23 days old. After he came to this county he placed his membership with the congregation at Eden Valley, where he was soon elected an elder of that congregation. While he was not a preacher of the gospel, in the common acceptation of the term, his mind was stored with Bible knowledge, and it can truthfully be said that by his exhortations, and wise counsel led many to the cross of Christ. During the time he was a member of the Eden Valley congregation, he was one of the pillars of that church, both from a spiritual and a financial point of view. As a citizen, he was true to his fellowman, ever ready to assist them in time of need, as far as their necessities might require or his ability would permit. He was always patriotic in his principles, and as a father one of his highest motives was to train his children up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. He was at all times firm, but kind to his family. As a Christian he was sincere and true to his God whom he so dearly loved. We can truthfully say a soldier of Christ has fallen, but the world was made better by his living in it. Funeral was preached by the writer to a large audience, who came to pay the last tribute of respect to our departed brother. Text, Rev. 14th chapter and 13th verse. After this we laid his body to rest in the cemetery near the church house, to await the call of the Master.

E. A. La Dew.

TRUEMAN.

Mary Helen Hope was born May 11, 1854, married George W. Trueman, Feb. 22, 1881. She died July 1, 1898, leaving a husband and four children to mourn her departure. Deceased was an affectionate wife and loving mother. Truly, she will be missed by her family, friends, the church and Sunday-school. She was a member of the Church of Christ, ever ready with a willing heart to do her part in God's service. Death came to her relief after four weeks of intense suffering, resulting from cancer, which she bore patiently. After a short service at the family residence, near Sumner, Neb., her remains were laid to rest in the Armada Cemetery.

A Sister in Christ.

WALLACE.

Sister Estelle Wallace fell asleep in Christ at her home, 1731 South 20th Street, Terre Haute, Ind., Saturday, July 16th. A great sufferer and now at rest. A short time before her death she expressed a desire to live for her husband, and Bro. Wallace replied, "It will not be long until I will be with you." Sister Wallace was buried from the church Monday, July 18, and Wednesday morning, July 20, Bro. Hartford Wallace was dead, and the next day was buried by his wife. They were both young, both Christians, lovely in life and in death they were not separated.

FRIDAY, P. M.

2:00—Finale, H. D. Williams, Mankato.
A song of hope for the future.
A gospel battle-cry as we plunge into the new year.
Short, sweet, pithy, snappy speeches.
Stirring music.
3:30—Farewell till 1899—all aboard!

NOTES.—Pastors and others receiving copies of this program in advance of the convention are requested to distribute them judiciously.

THE CONVENTION MUSIC.—T. A. Meredith, pastor of the Howard Lake Church, will have general charge.

REGISTER.—Immediately on reaching Mankato report at the church and register. Also, at the same time leave both your delegate and railway certificate. Speakers will not only register, but please specifically notify the chairman of the committee on "Order of Business" of their arrival, that the committee may not stand in doubt respecting response to the program.

ENTERTAINMENT.—The Mankato brethren will furnish lodging and breakfast free. Dinner and supper will be provided in the church basement at 15 cents per meal. Will pastors and missionary secretaries ascertain the earliest practicable day the probable number to attend and notify Chas. H. Austin, chairman of the Entertainment Committee, Mankato, of number and day and train of arrival? This is very important, and as an act of courtesy should not be overlooked.

NOTES.—Do not show partiality in attendance upon any of the sessions, M. C. M. S., C. W. B. M., Bible-school, or Y. P. S. C. E. All have intensely interesting programmes, which you cannot afford to miss. Take notes and return home prepared to report upon the good things experienced.
Do not be dilatory in attendance upon any of the sessions.

RAILROAD RATES.—The railway lines of the state will as usual extend a one and a third rate, on the certificate plan. Pay full rate coming, take a receipt from the agent selling you the ticket and leave same when registering at the convention, as per suggestion above, to be given in charge of H. D. Williams, till the close, when if there be 100 certificates on hand "paying not less than 50 cents each and inclusive of clergy certificates the 1 1-3 rate will apply." There should be no difficulty in meeting these conditions. Call for the certificate on the last day of the convention. Tickets on sale three days in advance of the convention and usable two days succeeding, but passage homeward must be continuous.

DELEGATES.—"Delegates from the churches shall be elected by their respective churches within one month prior to the annual meeting of the society, and shall serve one day. Each church in the state shall be entitled to three delegates for a membership of 50 or less, and one additional delegate for each additional 50 or fraction thereof not less than 25. The election of delegates shall be certified by clerks of the respective churches to the recording secretary of this society, and the regularity of such elections shall be passed upon by the society in its annual meeting in the ordinary manner of deliberate conventions" (Sec. 2 A. of I).

CURRENT EVENTS.

Peace has come! War between the United States and Spain has passed into history. The protocol arranged by President McKinley and M. Cambon, the French Embassador acting for Spain, was signed on the 12th inst., and hostilities will cease as soon as the word reaches the contending armies. The procotol as summarized embraces the following points:

"The United States puts forward no claim for pecuniary indemnity.

"Spain relinquishes all claims of sovereignty over or title to the Island of Cuba, and will immediately evacuate the island, the details of the evacuation to be arranged by a commission to be appointed for that purpose.

"Spain cedes to the United States and immediately evacuates Porto Rico and other islands under Spanish sovereignty in the West Indies.

"Spain cedes to the United States an island in the Ladrones.

"The United States occupies and holds the city, bay and harbor of Manila pending the conclusion of a treaty of peace which shall determine the control, disposition and government of the Philippines.

"A commission shall be appointed, to consist of five commissioners from the United States and five commissioners from Spain, which commission shall meet in the City of Paris for the purpose of concluding a treaty of peace on the basis above indicated.

"Immediately upon the execution of this agreement hostilities between the United States and Spain shall cease."

The consummation above mentioned, which cannot but give deep satisfaction to all lovers of peace, was not reached without some diplomatic correspondence which is not to be made public for the present. But the protocol as summarized above contains the terms substantially as proposed by the President twelve days ago. There was no disposition on the part of our government to make any further concessions or to permit Spain to delay, unnecessarily, her answer. It will be seen from the protocol that much remains to be done yet before the treaty of peace is made and ratified. Five peace commissioners will be appointed by each of the two governments to form the treaty, and then it will be subject to the approval of the United States Senate and the Spanish Cortes. While all this will take time, it is not doubted that the necessary ratification will be given by the two governments to the work of this joint commission, one of whose delicate duties will be to decide the disposition to be made of the Philippine Islands. The destiny of these islands as a whole is yet an unclosed question, but the permanent occupation of Manila and its environs by this government may be regarded as one of the certainties.

Now that the dove of peace has come to take the place of the vulture of war, the mathematicians are figuring up what our conflict with Spain has cost us. It will be seen from the following figures how expensive a thing a modern war is. If there were no other humanitarian considerations involved, the question might well be raised whether there is not some less expensive method of settling international difficulties. Following are the estimates of the cost of our brief war:

Current war expenses, April 1, 1898, to April 1, 1899	$400,000,000
War expenditures of separate states	15,000,000
Citizen contribution to soldiers' aid	15,000,000
War damage claims against the government	20,000,000
Loss of labor of 250,000 volunteer soldiers one year	100,000,000
Interest on war debt	90,000,000
Probable new pensions to be paid	300,000,000
Value of the Maine	3,000,000
Total	$943,000,000

This is so near to a billion dollars that we may well call it a billion. In the light of these figures it cannot be said, we think, that our government has exacted hard or unreasonable conditions of peace. On the contrary, the omission of a demand for any cash indemnity must be regarded as a mark of magnanimity on the part of our government.

While the negotiations for peace have been going on, the armies in the field have not been inactive. There have been some engagements, both in Porto Rico and at Manila, during the past week, although we have not the same interest now in the results of these battles that we had prior to the end of hostilities. The advance of Gen. Miles on San Juan has met with a little opposition, here and there, but no serious conflict. Quite a severe battle for the possession of the San Juan Lighthouse, at Cape San Juan occurred on the 9th inst., in which 800 Spaniards attempted to retake the lighthouse, which was guarded by 40 of our sailors, and by some of our vessels, as the Amphitrite, Cincinnati and the Leyden. The Spaniards were driven back with considerable loss. At Malate, near Manila, our line was attacked by a night sortie of the Spanish forces in superior numbers, and after a severe conflict the Spanish were driven back with a loss of 13 killed and 48 wounded among our troops, and a much larger fatality among the Spaniards. The Pennsylvania troops bore the brunt of this battle, supported by Capt. Young's battery of Utah. This battle occurred the last of July, although the news was only brought to us last week. What else has occurred or may occur before the news of peace reaches Manila remains to be seen. In any event Manila must now capitulate to the American forces who are to occupy the city pending the final work of the Peace Commissioners. Gen. Merritt speaks in very high terms of the courage amd discipline of the volunteers who were engaged in what will, we hope, be the last battle of the war. This battle, as we have said, took place at night while a typhoon was raging. It is reported that the insurgents under Aguinaldo rendered no assistance in this matter, but retreated at the first shot.

The following is the proclamation by the President, dated Washington, August 12th, proclaiming peace:

Whereas, By a protocol concluded and signed August 12th, 1898, by William R. Day, Secretary of State of the United States, and his Excellency, Jules Cambon, Ambassador and Plenipotentiary of the Republic of France, at Washington, respectively representing for this purpose the Government of Spain, the United States and Spain have formally agreed upon the terms on which negotiations for the establishment of peace between the two countries shall be undertaken; and

Whereas, It is in said protocol agreed that upon its conclusion and signature hostilities between the two countries shall be suspended and that notice to that effect shall be given as soon as possible by each government to the commanders of its military and naval forces;

Now, therefore, I, William McKinley, President of the United States, do, in accordance with the provisions of the protocol, declare and proclaim on the part of the United States a suspension of hostilities, and do hereby command that orders be immediately given through the proper channels to the commanders of the military and naval forces for the United States to abstain from all acts inconsistent with this proclamation.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and cause the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 12th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and twenty-third.

By the President, WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

WILLIAM R. DAY, Secretary of State.

It is not improbable that a war between Great Britain and Russia will have to take place before the atmosphere is clear on the "Eastern Question." There seems to be a general conviction among those in a position to know the situation that this war is inevitable sooner or later. The Rt. Hon. Sir William Merriott, the British Privy Councilor, who is now visiting this country, speaking of the relations between Great Britian and the United States, is reported as saying: "We don't want an alliance," said Sir William, "but what we do want is a good understanding between the two nations. England is anxious to avoid a war with the United States as the two countries are Anglo-Saxon. Whatever differences may occur between them should be settled by arbitration. England and America with a good understanding between them should defy the world. Yes, there is a strong probability that England and Russia will soon go to war. It has been brewing for a long time and must come. It has simply been delayed by the kinship existing between the royal families of those countries. Russia will not fight quite as hard as England when the crash occurs." It is hardly possible, if this war occurs, to escape a general European war. France and Germany are deeply interested in the matter at issue between Russia and England, as it relates to the Chinese Question. The English press is becoming outspoken in its opposition to Lord Salisbury for what it calls "humiliating concessions," and it is clear that the temper of the English people is such as to support the government in a most vigorous foreign policy. England will, no doubt, have the sympathy of this country in such a conflict, as we had hers in our war with Spain.

Chicago with her usual enterprise is the first of all the cities to propose and to arrange for a grand Peace Jubilee in memory of the triumphant close of our war with Spain. A committee representing the leading business men of the city has already been appointed to arrange a programme which shall be worthy of the occasion and of the city. It is the intention to make it truly national in character. The Times-Herald of that city says: "The plans, set afoot originally for a carnival, local and commercial in its aspect, have developed into a broader and more patriotic project, and now comprehend a national celebration that will live in history. It will be an apotheosis of the soldier and the sailor—a glorious welcome to the white-winged messenger that folded its wings three months ago when the call to arms was sounded." The details of this Peace Jubilee are yet to be worked out, but it is intended to have present the naval and military heroes of the war, and if possible the President of the United States and his Cabinet. There will he a grand military demonstration, and perhaps an "Arch of Peace" constructed to remain as a permanent monument of the historic event to be celebrated. This jubilee is fixed for the month of October. It is well that the close of a war that has made so decided an impression upon our own national life, and upon other nations as well, should be celebrated in some manner, and that there should be some permanent monument somewhere to call attention to it. Chicago's reputation for doing things on a large scale is a guarantee that this Peace Jubilee will be a notable event.

This week we give our readers the picture of one of the most remarkable men of the late war, Admiral Dewey, a name now immortalized in American history. To this admiral-statesman belongs the honor not only of fighting one of the greatest naval battles in naval history, but of wisely managing some of the most delicate and intricate of international questions. An unwise move at Manila might have involved this and other nations in a greater war than ours with Spain. To Admiral Dewey also belongs the honor of fighting the first and the last battles of the war just closed. On last Saturday he bombarded Manila until it surrendered to him unconditionally. The Governor-General, Augusti, and his family escaped on the German cruiser Kaiserin Augusta to Hong-Kong. The details of his escape, why he was aided by a German cruiser, and the particulars of the bombardment and the surrender of the city have not yet been received at Washington. It seems, however, to be another of those peculiar happenings in this peculiar war in which a brave, patriotic admiral was permitted to complete his well begun victory, the capture of Manila, before being prevented by the peace protocol. It is also reported, as we go to press, that Captain General Blanco has resigned his office at Havana to avoid what seems to him to be the odium of a surrender of the city to the United States. This, however, will not effect the situation nor the results of the peace propositions. So far as can be learned, the capture of Manila does not change the situation in the Philippines. The only difficulty has been to make the American hold on the islands stronger than it would have been had the Spanish troops remained in the field. The insurgents still have to be dealt with, but the authorities are confident of the ability of Rear-Admiral Dewey and Major General Merritt to control Aguinaldo, and they don't look for any further trouble in the island of the Far East, for the present, at least.

WHAT KIND OF UNION DID JESUS PRAY FOR?

In our plea for Christian union we have rightly given great prominence to the intercessory prayer of Jesus, recorded in the 17th chapter of John. To all who have made objection to the unity of Christians on the ground of undesirability and impracticability, our reply has been, What Jesus Christ prayed for can be neither undesirable nor impracticable. Jesus was and is the express image of God. His mind is a perfect transcript of the mind of God. There can be no question, then, as to the duty of pleading for such a unity among Christ's followers as Christ himself prayed for. It is probable, however, that we need to study more carefully and profoundly the nature of the union for which Jesus prayed. Let us look carefully at a portion of this prayer.

"Neither for these only do I pray, but for them also that believe on me through their word; that they may all be one; even as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be in us: that the world may believe that thou didst send me."

Notice, first, the scope of this prayer. It is not simply for the disciples which he then had, but "for them also that believe on me through their Word." This includes all believers. The petition is perhaps made in view of the causes for dissension and division which he knew would arise in the future.

Notice, next, the nature of that union. "That they may all be one, even as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be in us." The unity that exists between Jesus and His Father is that which Jesus prays may exist between His disciples. How perfect that union was we know, not only from frequent statements of our Lord Himself, but from the fact that all the investigation of the ages has failed to discover any conflict between the teaching of Jesus and the will of God. Theirs was a union of nature, of life and of work. There were no conflicting aims, ambitions or spirit. They were deeply and profoundly one. The old theory that Christ came into the world to appease the wrath of the Father by His sacrifice has long ago given place to the truth that "God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have everlasting life." Their nature was the divine nature; their life was the divine life; their purpose was the redemption of the race and the triumph of righteousness in the world.

It is a marvelous thing that Jesus should pray that such a union as this should exist between all those who believed on Him. There can be no higher illustration of the sublime possibilities of the Christian life than this, that men, different in temperaments, different in environment, alienated from God and from each other by sin and by racial and national prejudices, may be lifted up out of all their narrowness and bitterness and small envyings, and above all sectarian limitations into the larger life of God where there is unity, fraternity and co-operation. Let it be noted that this union for which Christ prays is primarily a union with Himself in the life of God, and, secondarily, as resulting therefrom, a unity between those who are thus united to Him. There can be no permanent unity among Christians that is not based on and does not grow out of a vital union with Jesus Christ. "As thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be in us." The union of Christians cannot take place anywhere else than "in us;" that is, in God the Father and in Jesus Christ His Son, through the agency and power of the Holy Spirit.

If this be so it seems to answer the question as to how we may best promote the unity of Christians. We can best hasten that great consummation by fostering and developing the spiritual life of Christians. Just in proportion as men grow Christlike in their character are they lifted above the things which divide and alienate brethren, and are brought into the atmosphere of love and unity. Carnality is the cause of division, spirituality of union. It is clear, too, from the nature of the unity for which Jesus prayed, that it is not to be sought for by constructing platforms of doctrines with a view to harmonizing differences. It is not an intellectual union that Jesus prayed for, and that we should plead for, only so far as intellectual unity may result from a vital union with Jesus Christ.

It is not an aggregation of men that Jesus prayed for, but for a oneness of faith, of life and of work, and similarity of character with Himself. This unity will bring about all the union that is practicable or desirable. We believe in Christian union; but only in the Christian union that is made possible by unity with Christ and in Christ. Differences of opinion, and of method, and of taste, and of temperament always have existed, and always will exist, but the unity for which Jesus prayed triumphs over all these and binds men together in a common league and under a common leadership for the accomplishment of a common end, even the conversion of the world.

These considerations make it evident that we who plead for the union of Christians should be careful to exemplify in our own lives and work the unity for which we plead. What the Christian world needs more than arguments in favor of unity is an illustration of its practicability and of its possibilities of achievement in Christian work. If we are to accomplish our providential mission in hastening the fulfillment of Christ's prayer for the oneness of His disciples, we must seek the closest possible union, first with Jesus Christ, our Leader, and then among ourselves, and show to the world that love for Christ and love for one another may triumph over all differences of opinion and cement us together in an indissoluble brotherhood. Our emphasis on the subject of Christian union has no doubt had its influence in the growth of Christian union sentiment. Let us see to it that in our congregational life, and in our larger co-operative work, and in our relations with each other and with Christians of other names and creeds, we do not neutralize the effect of our teaching. It is only as we cultivate this vital relationship with Jesus Christ that we can "keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," and hasten the glad day when the prayer of Jesus shall be fulfilled in the unity of His disciples and in the conversion of the world.

PAUL ON THE MONEY QUESTION.

It is probable that Paul was a man of means. It is certain that he belonged to a good family. He was proud of his pedigree. In a spirit of boasting he declared that he was of the tribe of Benjamin, that he was a Hebrew of the Hebrews. He was a blueblood—Paul was. His family possessed an excellent moral and religious character, and evidently held an honorable, at least an honorable, social position. He was an educated gentleman. He was a free-born citizen of the Roman Empire. He knew and asserted his rights as such. When he became a disciple of Christ he suffered serious loss. It is probable that he was disinherited. He said, referring to this matter: "I have suffered the loss of all things" for the sake of Christ. This remark he could not have made if he had not been a person of considerable means. That he was a man of such culture as implied the possession of an ample estate by his family is evident. Prof. Ramsey thinks that toward the close of Paul's life he came once more into possession of his property. Felix understood that Paul had means. "He hoped that money would be given him by Paul, that he might release him; wherefore he sent for him the oftener and communed with him."

In his work as a minister of the Lord Jesus, Paul took an especial interest in the poor and had much to say about money and its use. Why?

In the Epistle to the Galatians he speaks of two visits that he made to Jerusalem after he became a Christian. On the occasion of the second visit he met and had a conference with James, Ephas and John, whom he characterized as "Pillar Apostles." Barnabas was with him on this visit and participated in this interview. He says, "They gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship, . . . only they would remember the poor; which very thing," he says, "I also was forward to do." It seems from this that Paul held a special commission from the apostolic college in Jerusalem to look after this business. This, in part, answers the question, Why? But again:

Paul's most intimate friend and companion was a gentleman of substance. His name was Joses Barnabas. He was a Jew. He belonged to the tribe of Levi. He was a native of the Island of Cypress. When he became a Christian he was an owner of real estate. After he entered the service of Christ he sold it and gave the money to the church. There can be no reasonable doubt that this "good man," as did also Stephen, the first Christian martyr, influenced not a little the character and conduct of Paul.

But for the influence of Barnabas it is not certain that Paul would have been received into the fellowship of the church. Luke says that the believers were "afraid of him and believed not that he was a disciple. But Barnabas took him and brought him to the apostles, and declared unto them how he had seen the Lord in the way and that he had spoken to him, and how he had preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus." Think you that Barnabas had nothing to do in determining the character and conduct of Paul? It was this same Joses Barnabas who introduced Paul to the church in Antioch. There he was for a time assistant to Barnabas. In the Antioch church Barnabas, not Paul, was the chief minister.

It was during the Antiochian ministry that the first opportunity presented itself to render a definite financial service to the poor. This service was rendered by men who had had experience in handling money and who possessed what some preachers do not possess—business sense. The following were the circumstances:

A prophet named Agabus came from Jerusalem to Antioch and by the Spirit of the Lord predicted a famine in the land of Judea. This came to pass as foretold—came to pass when Claudius was Emperor of Rome. When the disciples of Christ heard of this impending calamity they determined, every man according to his ability, to send relief unto their brethren in the famine-stricken region, which also they did, sending the same by the hands of Barnabas and Saul. This was but a beginning.

After their visit to Jerusalem on this business they returned to Antioch and resumed their pastoral-evangelistic work; but they did not forget the poor in Judea. Paul spoke and wrote in their behalf. His interest in them seemed to increase. Certainly it did not diminish. He issued orders to the Gentiles. With clearness and courage he told men of wealth what their duty was in the use of their means. He instructed young ministers to do the same. "Charge them that are rich in this world," he said to Timothy. He issued an order to the congregations of Christ in Galatia requiring them to make a contribution every Lord's day to be used in relieving the necessities of the poor. A similar order was given to the church that was in Corinth. "Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as he may be prospered, that there be no collections when I come. And when I am come, whomsoever ye shall approve, them will I send with letters, to carry your liberality unto Jerusalem, and if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me." Now this was written "concerning the collection for the saints."

He again went up to Jerusalem with an offering for the poor. In the Epistle to the Romans he says:

"Now I go unto Jerusalem to minister unto the saints. For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem. It hath pleased them verily, and their debtors they are; for if the Gentiles have been partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister to them in carnal things. When, therefore, I have performed this and have sealed to them this fruit, I will come by you into Spain."

Having arrived in Jerusalem Paul reported to James—as if James were his superior. Remember that James was one of those who at first laid on Barnabas and Paul the duty—which Paul seemed to regard as a privilege—of caring for the poor. The story of his experience during this visit resulted in his arrest and imprisonment in Cæsarea for two years, and his journey to Rome to appear before the Emperor need not be told in this place. Read as it ought to be read it is more thrillingly interesing than any romance. Shortly after his arrest, in an address to Governor Felix, Paul explained his presence in Jerusalem by saying: "After many years I came to bring alms to my nation and offerings."

It will be interesting and profitable to note some of the things that Paul said about money and its use when he was engaged in this benevolent work.

"But this I say: He which soweth sparingly will reap also sparingly, and he that soweth bountifully will reap also bountifully. Every one according as he purposeth in his heart so let him give, not grudgingly or of necessity; for God loveth a cheerful giver" (2 Cor. 9:6-7).

"For if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to what a man hath, and not according to what he hath not" (2 Cor. 8:12).

"For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor that ye by his poverty might become rich" (2 Cor. 8:9).

Similar quotations might be continued indefinitely, but for the present these must suffice.

The foregoing is only a hint concerning the teaching of Paul on the money question. The subject is large. Study him on this question and see how much there is in it—see how large a place it occupied in his capacious mind.

A question: In our effort to restore to the world the New Testament Christianity have we given as much attention to money and its use as we ought? Have we given as much attention to it as Jesus and the apostles? Who will say that we have? If not, why not?

In a subsequent paper we will, the Lord willing, see what Paul says about the use of money in the support of the ministry. This paper has to do with the obligations under which Christians are to use their money in caring for the poor. May God add his blessing. B. B. T.

Hour of Prayer.

THE RESURRECTION AND THE LIFE.

(Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, August 17.)

Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again. Martha saith unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day. Jesus saith unto her, I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die.—John 11:23-26.

No question more deeply concerns the human heart than that which relates to the life hereafter. "If a man die shall he live again?" was a question raised, no doubt, long before it was recorded in the book of Job. Its complete and satisfactory answer is given only in Christ. He it was who brought "life and immortality to light in the gospel." With him the life beyond was as real as the life here in the flesh.

Especially does the subject of the resurrection and the life eternal interest us when we stand in the presence of death, and when one of our loved ones has been called from us. A dear friend of Jesus had died. During his illness his sisters had sent word to Jesus to come to them, but He delayed His coming until Lazarus was dead. When He came the sisters met Him with sad lamentations, bewailing the fact especially that He had not been with them during the sickness of their brother, for if so he had not died. This shows that, although they loved Jesus and had great confidence in His power, their faith had not yet reached to the sublime height which recognized Him as a Master even of death. When He told them that their brother should live again, their response was that they knew he would rise again "in the resurrection at the last day." They believed in the future resurrection, but Jesus said unto her, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die." This was a doctrine of the resurrection somewhat different from that in which these sisters believed. The real resurrection, Jesus teaches in this passage, is the rising of the soul into the newness of the life eternal, which is in Christ, and death has no power over such a life. This is the eternal life, because it is the life of God in the soul of men.

In the thought of Jesus physical dissolution to one who has come into life everlasting was a mere incident. There was nothing in that to cause fear. The great thing was to come into union with God through Christ. To such death has no terrors. Jesus is the resurrection and the life. Those who believe on Him shall never die. The dissolution of the body is not death in any important sense. Real death is to be alienated from the life of God, to be dead in trespasses and in sin. "He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son hath not life."

And then, to show the weeping sisters and all the world that He was Master of death, He approached the tomb of Lazarus, had the stone rolled away, and spoke the old familiar name, and asked him to come forth. That voice that calmed the waves of Galilee and hushed the winds, penetrated into the regions of death and brought back again from its dark dominion the friend and brother who had "fallen asleep."

The people said that was wonderful, and so it was; but through all the centuries Christ has been doing more wonderful works than that. His voice has been penetrating the regions of moral death and darkness, and calling the souls of men into life and activity. Those who have been dead in trespasses and in sins have heard the voice of the Son of God and have lived. This is the continuous and perpetual miracle of the ages. This is the proof to us that He is Master of death. He who has power to restore the souls of men into union with God, and to bring them into possession of life eternal has power to clothe these spirits with immortal bodies, adapted to the needs of the spiritual world.

Are we living the abundant life which Jesus Christ came to bring us? Or are we content with a mere starving existence? The highest assurance that we can have of life beyond the grave is the fact that even here in the flesh we have the life of Christ in us triumphing over sin and over temptation. This is the life that triumphs at last over the grave and crowns us with immortality. Blessed be the nams of Jesus Christ, who abolished death and who hath delivered us from the bondage of the fear of death and opened the gateway to the life beyond!

PRAYER.

O Thou Infinite and Eternal Father, who art the Father of our spirits, we thank Thee that Thou hast made us to live forever. We rejoice in the knowledge of life everlasting, brought to us through Jesus Christ Thy Son. We thank Thee that when we were in bondage to sin and to the fear of death, He came to deliver us from sin, and to set us free, and to give us life eternal. We thank Thee for a Savior who has conquered death, triumphed over the grave and brought life and immortality to light. Help us to live in the fullness of Thy life, that we may at last share with Thee in triumph over sin and the grave, and live with Thee forever. In Christ's name. Amen!

OR MACATAWA MUSINGS.

Given a calm, clear night with the full moon shedding its soft luster until that beautiful sheet of water known as Black Lake, or Macatawa Bay, looks like a silver sea, and a party of forty or fifty congenial people on board a little steamer for a moonlight excursion, when the party is bounded by the Missouri River on the west and Acts 2:38 on the east, and the rest can be imagined. Such an excursion we had on a recent ideal night, under the generous patronage of Mrs. Henry Meier, of St. Louis, whose advent into our St. Louis colony at the Park has added much to its enjoyment and pleasure. Our little steamer first passed out through the channel on to Lake Michigan where the swell of the waves caused more or less sensation in some of the party; but having accomplished its mission on Lake Michigan in meeting a larger vessel from Sangatuck and receiving a part of its cargo in the form of baskets of peaches, the little vessel returned through the channel, unloaded its cargo of fruit at the Macatawa Dock, barring a few baskets, which were purchased or otherwise secured, the excursion proper began, consisting of a trip to Holland and return. There was song, there was story, there was conundrum and bright repartee and laughter and conversation, and a good time generally, including the consumption of the peaches fresh from the peach orchards of the Kalamazoo. Never did we see the little lake more beautiful, as it lay bathed in the soft moonlight, and never did a more genial party sail over its surface than on this occasion. A hearty vote of thanks was given to Mrs. Meier for the pleasure she had given us in this moonlight ride upon the lake.

At this writing the Macatawa Assembly is in the middle of its sessions and has proved to be, so far, one of the most profitable and by far the most largely attended in the history of the Park. Bros. H. L. Willett and J. M. Campbell are giving us some fine studies in the Gospels, the one giving us the historical aspects of the books and the other the spiritual teaching, with opportunity for questions and suggestion. The evening addresses on different phases of the subject of Christian Union are also awakening good interest, and of course meet with favor here at Macatawa, where Christian union is popular. We have never had any difficulty in living together here in peace. There are about thirty ministers here at present, of whom twenty are Disciples, nine are Congregationalists and one Dutch Reform. There is a larger number of our preachers and of our members present than at any previous time, and all who are here seem to be delighted, not only with the place, but with the people. Some of the matter presented at this Assembly may assume a permanent form. Already one series of lectures delivered here has been published in a book and is becoming widely known, namely, "After Pentecost, What?" by J. M. Campbell. It is hoped that in the future this may not only be a summer resort but a center of biblical and religious instruction as well, which shall produce a literature of some permanent value. What better place could be found for working out some of the problems of our times? The idea of utilizing resorts for religious and educational purposes is a good one. It need not interfere with the idea of rest, while it serves to redeem these resorts from excessive idleness or social frivolity.

And so Dr. Whitsitt, president of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, has been forced to resign his position in that institution, because of the continual war made upon him by Southern Baptists. This seems to us to be a conspicuous case of the odium theologicum. The war on Prof. Whitsitt is the result of a historical view of his concerning the early practice of the Baptists in England on the subject of baptism. It is not charged that he has changed his views concerning the scriptural teaching on that subject. It is a mere difference of historical interpretation. We do not believe Dr. Whitsitt is infallible as a historian. He made some egregious blunders in his treatment of the Disciples in their historical relation to the Mormons and to the Sandemanians. There were only a few Baptists who found fault with Dr. Whitsitt for these historical blunders. Indeed, the men whose criticism has compelled the resignation of Dr. Whitsitt were the very men who extolled him for ish former interpretations concerning which there was a great deal less excuse than in the latter case. We regret to see this triumph of the narrower and less liberal element in the Baptist Church, but of course it is only a temporary triumph, for in the long run intelligence prevails over ignorance and intolerance.

It is wonderful what perennial freshness and interest attach to the gospel narratives. Our studies during this Assembly have been in the four Gospels, so far, and they have been made to stand out with their individual characteristics and peculiar coloring with great distinctiveness. When one comes into close touch with the sublime facts, the transcendent teaching and the mighty works recorded in these Gospels, the question of literary authorship takes a secondary place, and one instinctively feels that by whomsoever the facts, the deeds and the teachings were recorded, the records are true and deal with great realities. The motto, "Back to Christ," if it mean a fresh study of Jesus Christ as he is portrayed in the four Gospels, cannot fail to have a good effect in exalting Christ to his true place in the Christian system and in producing a truer proportion of faith. Christ can be seen in any of the New Testament writings, but He can be seen best in the four Gospel narratives, each of which present some true and important view of that peerless character.

We have never known Macatawa Park to be fuller than it is at present. A number of cottagers have been compelled to take in one or two boarders in order to accommodate the people, as the hotel is full to overflowing. So far as we have ascertained the following if the list of our own preachers who have been here this week: H. W. Everest, Des Moines, Ia.; H. S. Earl, Irvington, Ind.; J. S. Hughes, Chicago, Ill.; J. J. Haley, Cynthiana, Ky.; W. F. Richardson, Kansas City, Mo.; Geo. H. Combs, Kansas City, Mo.; F. G. Tyrrell, St. Louis, Mo.; J. G. Waggoner, Eureka, Ill.; J. H. Hardin, Eureka, Ill.; Geo. L. Snively, Jacksonville, Ill.; ——— Dean, Harvey, Ill.; Hugh McLellan, Shelbyville, Ky.; J. Z. Tyler, Cleveland, O.; Errett Gates, Chicago, Ill.; W. E. Ellis, Nashville, Tenn.; H. L. Willett, Chicago, Ill.; Bruce Brown, Chicago, Ill.; Geo. Platt, Warsaw, Ind.; F. M.Kirkham, Chicago, Ill.; T. W. Pinkerton, Kenton, O.; F. G. Strickland, Chicago, Ill.; J. L. Darsie, Little Rock, Ark.; J. P. McKnight, Peorio, Ill.; J. W. Allen, Cleveland, O. To this might be added A. M. Atkinson who, while not a preacher by profession, preaches, nevertheless. He has been taking in these lectures and enjoying them, as also does Sister A. The attendance and interest increase daily.

Current Religious Thought

The Standard, August 13th, concludes a somewhat lengthy editorial on "The Religion of College Women," with the following practical question and its answer:

There is indeed no more important question of an educational sort than this one: What shall be the religion of the women who, passing through colleges or schools of high grade, come to rank as leaders at home? If, as wives and mothers, as helpers in the churches, as teachers, as physicians, they bear in their hands a light to lighten the darkness, to guide the young and cheer the struggling and comfort the dying, bright indeed shall be that light; and many shall walk in its radiance. But if instead they come back to their homes with the flame hidden away in their hearts, as something too rare and precious for the glare of day, living the Stoic life, scorning to show their inmost and devoutest thoughts to any but the most intimate friends, then their learning has been a curse, their religion a failure and their struggle vain. That a few have so failed is a melancholy fact which it is not well to forget; but for most earnest women the college life and the college culture have been a cherished gift, to be wisely used and not hoarded; and the college outlook upon life has, in the end, assured them more strongly than before that of all good things in this world and the next the source is the love of God in Jesus Christ.

The Missionary Review of the World in its leader, by the editor, on Spanish Movements of the Half Century, quotes from a Cardinal Archbishop of Valladolid, Spain, a paragraph that not only reveals the deplorable state of the Spanish mind, religiously, but also shows that her teachers are not all blind. The Archbishop says:

All acknowledge that the actual situation of Spain is the most critical that our country has passed through in the present generation, and can only be compared to that which preceded the French invasion at the beginning of the century. All know that we are in danger of a tempest from without, and that within a volcano is roaring under our feet. Notwithstanding, we hear of more preparations for public diversions than usual, noisy preparations for feasts, battles of flowers, bull-fights, masked balls, and the like; a paroxysm of the foolishness of carnival as out of place as it is exaggerated. In its nature carnival is a barbarous custom, nearly always immoral, and frequently sacrilegious and impious, especially so in these days of so much mourning for our insulted country, in addition to the grief of the Spanish mothers, whose sons have died in Cuba, and who, from the solitude in which they weep, can hear the loud laughter of vice as well as so much blasphemy. It appears as if the people were to be diverted to prevent them realizing their condition, to be intoxicated with pleasure that they may not feel, to bring them down to the level of the Roman decadence. We see, with the most profound sorrow, that it is intended to make the carnival this year more uproarious and, on that account, more immoral than ever. How can this phenomenon be explained? If we look at it from a natural point of view, it is repugnant to all delicate sentiments to make so much ostentatious merriment in a country and at a time when so many tears are being shed, and where there is likely to be cause for many more. More sensible have been the places, sadly few in number, that have happily agreed not to celebrate the carnival. The money dissipated on this ostentatious luxury might be used for food and medicines for our poor soldiers, or it might help to construct machines of war which would contribute to make our flag respected. We ought to reflect upon the repeated warnings which God has given to us, for has not the Lord's prophet said, "The earth is desolate because no one considered?"

The harmony between Providence and common sense is clearly and strikingly pointed out in the following paragraph from a sermon by Rev. F. M. Bristol, D. D., pastor Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C., on "God's Hand in the War," and printed in the Treasury:

Whether it be in times of peace or of war, Providence works in manifest alliance with the brains and hearts and hands of the most intelligent, virtuous and industrious people. There is nothing in the doctrine of Providence that excuses men from doing their duty at the plow-handle and the loom, at the anvil and the bench, in the office, study, counting-room, hall of legislation and schoolhouse; at the guns, at the ballot-box and at the altar. But when men fail to do their own duty, they are prone to lay the ill consequences on God, or persuade themselves foolishly that the results of their own delinquencies are proof positive that there is no Providence. God is on the side of good farming, good financiering, good politics, good education, good motives, good guns, good battleships, good discipline, good aim, good generalship and good causes. And if he were not, what would all your good plows, good ships and good schools avail? If he is, what excuse can a people make who fall short of success and prosperity because they have not met the conditions of an holy and invincible alliance with Providence?

On the ground that the testimony of a competent observer is of first value the folllowing from the Christian Commonwealth, London, is important testimony on the Church of England controversy:

This matter of ecclesiastical conflict between the two chief parties in the Church of England is the supreme question of the day. Undoubtedly on it hinges the issue whether England shall sink into the old Romanism again, and whether the Reformation shall be undone. But the Church of England is powerless. It is drifting and drifting the wrong way. It is easy to say, as many do, "Oh, but the great heart of the country is sound after all!" That is what some keen observers are anxious about. Thousands of our young men and women are not at heart in Reformation principles. They revel in gorgeous processional displays, beautiful choral music, and church millinery and costumery. And the majority of the young clergy are steeped in the Ritualistic temperament. Nonconformists, especially Congregationalists and Wesleyans, have done and are doing much to encourage the first, and to depress the second temperament. Let it be remembered that all children are Ritualists by nature, and that without a special education the first temperament must predominate in us all. The second temperament is in most people acquired through reason, reflection and instruction. It grows with a true knowledge of the gospel. It belongs to the higher and nobler nature. The martyrs were generally of the second temperament. They learnt that outward things, however beautiful, are but symbols of inward and spiritual and eternal realities. But the majority of people do not think, reason, reflet, or learn. They skim the superfices, skimming like the swallows to catch pretty insects, instead of diving like the osprey beneath the surface to grasp what is more substantial. The gospel of Christ swept away the Temple and its ritualism. The first temperament was played out. The synagogue remained, which was the predecessor of the modern chapel, with its Evangelicalism, as the Temple was of the modern church, with its elaborate ceremonialism.

CHURCH ORGANIZATION AND GOVERNMENT.*

BY J. E. COBBEY.

After careful study of the subject let this meeting recommend a plan of organization, have it printed, prepare a form for treasurer's and secretary's books. Prepare and print and make accessible to every church a model form of church government, not as mandatory, but as advisory. From your rich experience lend a helping hand to those less fortunate. I would not make of you preachers, dictators. I would not have you run the church. But I would have you make of yourselves experts, whose advice on the legal organization of the church would be as good as any lawyer's; whose advice on the business affairs of the church would be as good as any business man's. Such a man would compel the respect of the business man; respect would be followed by confidence, and confidence would open the door for conversion. This knowledge on your part can not be acquired in a day or in a year, but here is the place and now is the time for you to commence. I would make this summer school of yours a school of methods, a school of practice. Appoint a standing committee of your number on church organization and government. Such a committee would have it in its power to do more good for the cause than your secretary or any other of your officers.

It seems to me our plan of church organization is defective from the beginning. We decide to send out an evangelist to possess new fields. In selecting a man no one asks what is his business ability? Can he draw the articles of incorporation for the new church he is to found? Does he know the six things those articles are to contain according to the law of the land?

*Paper read before the Thirty-first Annual Convention of the Nebraska Christian Missionary Society at Beatrice, Neb., July 3rd, 1898

Does he know that these articles must be recorded in the clerk's office? No one furnishes him with printed suggestions covering these points and the one hundred others which arise in the early life of every church organization, which he can leave with the young church when he goes on to other fields. How can a church whose very organization is a violation of the law of the land, and whose every day of existence is a menace to good government because a violation of the statute, appeal to honest, law-abiding citizens to come in and take fellowship? How can this church, how can any church, whose business organization is a graveyard wherein are buried every principle of business and every rule of commercial success, appeal to business men or to commercial men to come in and take fellowship? How can a church organization which has so carefully built up this barrier between itself and the business and commercial classes expect members of those classes to break down the barrier and come in? The members of these classes are wide-awake, honest and progressive. They teach the highest standard of morality. They believe in religion. They want to be members of a church organization if it is a help toward a better life. They hear the church by the mouth of its preacher bid them enter. But whenever they transact business with the church, whenever they meet in a business way any of its officers, they are repelled. No wonder so many men of these classes are trying to live religious lives outside the church. No wonder it is a standing complaint among evangelists that they cannot reach these classes. Brethren, the doors of our church organizations are closed to these classes to-day. The few from these classes who have the temerity to break in have done so at the earnest solicitation of a devoted wife or mother. The first time they attempt to give to the church of their rich experience, and place its organization in a more presentable shape, they are coldly told to stand back, this is a church, we want none of that here. The pastor probably sees the mistake that is being made. But he has been taught that he is not a business man, and that he should not know about the rules of business. The people have not been taught to look to him for business advice. He is powerless. Few of our churches are to-day legally organized. Their business methods are those they used twenty-five years ago, when composed of fifteen or twenty members.

What is to be done? I answer, Commence a reform here and now. Resolve that you will do all in your power to have the church which you serve legally organized—that you will apply the best modern business rules to the conduct of its business. If you cannot do this, I appeal to you to be honest and consistent, and before you again plead with your people, acknowledge the authority of God's law; that you hang from your pulpit in plain print the words, "I do not acknowledge the authority of the state law;" that you place back of the pulpit the words, "Church business will not be done on business principles;" that you place over the outer church-door the words, "This church was organized and still exists in violation of the state law." When you go out to establish other churches, either go equipped for your work, prepared to start them correctly, both in doctrine and in law, or if you cannot do this, drop that holy word "evangelist," and introduce yourself to them as a constant law-breaker, teaching but a part of God's law. Preachers, churches, Christians should carefully guard against deception, against appearing to be what they are not. You can't fool anybody in this day and age of the world. It is not good business, it is not good morals, it is not good religion to try. It only harms the one making the attempt, and impedes the cause in which he is engaged. Why, bless you! do you for one moment think that I am not aware of the fact that, while I am addressing the highest organization in this church, I am addressing a body without the semblance of legal organization? What excuse can you offer for this illegal existence? What excuse can I offer to my professional brethren for thus addressing you upon obedience to the state? You should be my teacher in this—not I yours. But I plead for reform in our church organization. With you more than with any one else lies the power to institute reform. Will you do it? When the Master said, "Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's," he meant it as he said it, not as many of us have interpreted it, that we could render unto God the things that are God's, and afterward unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, if convenient. But there is still another lesson in it for us: that the man who will not render willing obedience to the proper laws of the country in which he lives, or to the rightful customs of the people with whom he is associated, is not the proper one to plead for obedience to the divine laws. In what I have said here to-day I have endeavored to speak plainly and to the point, because I recognize in you as individuals consecrated, devoted workers in a common cause, because I have the utmost confidence in your ability, honesty and integrity as leaders of the people and because I know that you have a consuming desire to live up to the full measure of Christian manhood. If I have hurt the feelings of any one, I am sorry for it. If I have reviled you or spoken evil of you falsely, I refer you to the scriptural consolation for such trials as given in Matthew 5:11.

I believe it is the sacred duty of the church to have its organization so perfect from a legal standpoint that it may be taken as a model by secular societies; to maintain its business organization at such a standard that it will be pointed to by the world as a model.

Years ago prominent Christian workers planned to make the Bible a model in every one of its parts and features. Time and money without limit have been expended for this purpose, until to-day, as an example of the bookbinder's art, it is without a rival. No finer paper for the purpose goes into any book. As a typographical job it has no superior. As to the words used, it is a standard in spelling. As to capitalization and punctuation, the best standard; as to grammatical construction and arrangement, the standard of standards. As you hold that splendid production of painstaking labor in your hand, do you for one moment think that a single item of this labor was thrown away? That those consecrated men made a mistake? If not, why not make the legal and business organization of our church a standard and a model also?

I have in my possession a letter written by the final proof-reader of a publishing house in regard to a controversy over the grammatical correctness of an expression used in a legal work. Grammars and standard English writers had been cited by each of the contesting parties. When this man, an expert among experts, cited in the Bible the place where the expression was used as he said it should be used, saying in that letter, that while he did not accept the Bible as a divine or inspired book, he did appeal to it as the best authority in our language in grammar, spelling and rhetoric, because it had been brought to perfection by the painstaking labor of the greatest scholars of our language. Think of it! that Bible a Book of books in every sense of the word. Think of it! this man believing from his infancy in the doctrine of infidelity, compelled at sixty years of age to appeal to the Bible as the supreme authority in grammar, rhetoric and spelling. In the sight of God not one dollar of expense, not one hour of the time necessary to wring from that old infidel this confession was lost. And I further say to you, not one hour of time, or one dollar of expense necessary to place our legal and business organization on the same basis will be thrown away. This old man may never accept that Book as a spiritual guide, but his power to influence others against it is forever gone; his position, while not logically, is practically inconsistent. The hundreds of young men who have learned their business from him cannot have the prejudice against it which he has. They cannot appeal to it as an authority in their every-day business matters, and entirely reject it as an authority in their spiritual matters. This old man has unwillingly, by the irresistible logic of events, become a worker in God's vinevard.

When we shall bring our legal and business organizations up to that degree of perfection of which we are capable, no evangelist will complain that he cannot reach the professional, the business or the commercial classes. They will seek for him. This confidence in the church organization will produce friendship for its members and its teachings. This friendship will induce attendance, and attendance will result in conversions.

SPIRITISM; OR THE WITCH OF ENDOR

W. J. LHAMON.

(CONCLUDED.)

Yesterday a dear friend of yours died and you knew nothing of it. You met a medium, however, and he told you all about it, giving the exact name. You couldn't believe it; but to-day you get a letter confirming the report of the medium in every particular. Such things happen. But how can they happen unless the medium gets the knowledge from the spirit of the departed one? Students of psychology have given us a more natural explanation. We are all endowed with a dual mind, or with what has been called the subjective and objective mind. The objective mind is the ono we use when we are at ourselves, and when we go about our business in a sensible way. It is the every-day mind of sane people. The subjective mind is the one we use in sleep-walking, and when we are clairvoyant, or clairaudient, or in any way hypnotized. It is the mind used by mathematical prodigies, such as Zerah Colburn; and by musical prodigies, such as Blind Tom; and by insane people, and by people delirious from sickness, and by abnormally minded people generally.

This subjective mind is controlled by suggestion; hence the power of the hypnotist over his subject and of the auto-hypnotist over himself. The subjective mind is the mind that reads other minds; it never forgets, and in a deductive way it reasons with perfect nicety of logic. Students are beginning to concede that this mind can move ponderable objects that it may produce audible sound on a solid substance, and that properly controlled it has wonderful curative powers. The medium, the clairvoyant and the mind-reader differ from ordinary people in that they have the native or acquired power of bringing up at will the stores of the subjective mind into the objective, or of going a step further into the trance or self-imposed hypnotic state, and there of seeing clearly and of talking unconsciously, yet truly and surprisingly. Now in the moment of death the subconscious mind of your friend, freed from its body, impresses the fact on your subconscious mind. The impression lies there within you waiting to be brought to light. The clairvoyant, the medium, finds it out and tells you about it. Very likely both you and the medium honestly think it was a spirit that did all this, whereas it was only the natural forces of the mind at work.

It is reported of Prof. Carpenter, that once in the city of Washington he put a young man under the hypnotic influence who was a student of philosophy, and a graduate of a leading university. He asked the young man if he would like to have a visit with Socrates, and he readily assented. The Professor said: "I will call up his spirit; there he is now in the corner." The young man approached with great reverence; the Professor went through the form of an introduction, and the young man offered Socrates a chair. For two hours he asked questions, and intrepreted to the company the answers of the imaginary spirit, developing a most systematic and wonderful philosophy, so that the cultured people who were present could scarcely but think that Socrates was actually there. At a later time the Professor had the same young man in hand, and asked him if he would like to have a conversation with a philosophic pig. He assented, and the Professor introduced him to a pig which, he told him, was the reincarnation of a Hindu priest. The karma of the priest he said had been a little off color, but he had forgotten none of his learning. The imaginary pig conversed in all languages known to the young man, and talked most learnedly upon theosophy. This story is told by Mr. Thomas Jay Hudson in his "Law of Psychic Phenomena," and the explanation is simply this: Neither Socrates nor the pig was present; the young man in the hypnotic state was put under the suggestion that they were; his subjective mind did all the rest, for he had been reading the philosophy of Socrates and the philosophism of theosophy.

When Saul no longer feared God; when he lost faith, therefore, in himself and in his army; when he became a cowardly and recreant king, he sought the medium of Endor. He called for Samuel, and presently in her self-imposed hypnotic state she saw Samuel just as clairvoyants see; she saw the Samuel that Saul had hidden away in him, and of course she immediately knew Saul. Of course also she proceeded to interpret his troubled mind from the standpoint of the Samuel she saw, and to turn the king's guilty fears into a prediction of his defeat and death. This is the interpretation of the scene that springs most naturally from the facts of psychology as known to-day. This spiritualistic seance, now well-nigh three thousand years old, may stand as the representative of higher class of such performances through all the ages.

Thirdly, Spiritualism presumes to give us a new religion. It has a theology. Recently in our hearing, one of its advocates spent a half hour in telling us that Christ was divine precisely as all are divine. This is the crudest sort of unscholarly and uncritical Unitarianism. There is not a school of genuine scientists or philosophers or critical scholars in the world to-day that could be induced to assume or defend such a position. Christ is unique, and more and more the world is coming to recognize that fact, and to grant him his more than human claims.

Spiritualism as advocated recently in our city declares that "fear is the mother of worship." Then, when its advocates prayed in public (as they did) their prayers were either a hollow mockery or the offspring of cowardice. The dilemma is their own. With Christians love is the mother of worship.

Having no Christ such as the New Testament presents, Spiritualism has consequently no Savior. Its advocates very logically tell their disciples to save themselves. It is the old Buddhistic and agnostic doctrine, the time-worn doctrine of lifting yourself by your own boot-straps. But it sounds new when it comes flippantly bobbing up from some hypothetical borderland between this and the other world, where knowing ghosts range at the ready beck and call of this or the other irreverent hypnotic.

Quite logically there follows the agnostic doctrine of consequences, closely allied to the theosophic doctrine of the karma, Mr. Ingersoll being its best known advocate in America. It is simply a question of rewards for merit, of sufferings for demerit. In this system there is no room for a child's repentance, for a father's forgiveness. It is futile for a prodigal to return to his father's home, for he will find no compassion there—only a stern and awful destiny, a sort of monolithic or stone god father, who says heartlessly: "You sinned, you wretch; now suffer!"

Many spiritualists deny the personality of God, and must, therefore, be ranked as pantheists. In this respect as well as in their inclination toward occultism they are closely akin to present-day theosophists.

There are a few things about Spiritualism that should be taken into the account by students of it before they decide to take it at its own estimation.

1. The revelations of the hypothetical spirits are precisely on a par with the capabilities of the medium. If an ignorant girl calls up Shakespeare it happens that he has forgotten his noble English, that he can't make verses, and that he is liable to spell phonetically. On the other hand, if a cultivated medium calls up Sitting Bull or Black Hawk, the old copper-colored chieftain immediately becomes a philosopher or an artist, according to the mind of the medium. Such facts indicate that after all it is the medium that speaks and not the spirit, the subjective mind of the medium, however believing itself to be the spirit, that suggestion having been made to it.

2. Spiritism has added nothing to our stock of knowledge; it has given us no invention, it has made no revelations. Were the spirits of the dead really speaking to us through the mediums we should expect wondrous things. Psalms surpassing those of David; prophecies beyond those of Isaiah; art beyond that of Raphael and Michael Angelo; flights of poetry loftier than those of Dante, Milton, Browning and Shakespeare; and a high level of religion, at least equal to that of Jesus. But we get nothing of that sort. Actually the spirits rapped up by the mediums don't know as much as some ordinary people.

3. Spiritism, aside from its false religious teaching as indicated above, has been guilty of a tendency toward free love. A few years ago its leading representatives in the United States were advocates of this species of immorality, and sad homes and many wrecked ones are the tares that have grown from that unfortunate sowing. This statement is far from being intended as an indiscriminate thrust at the morality of mediums in general, for no doubt there are pure and well-meaning men and women among them, and such also as are nobly willing to brave persecution for what they esteem to be true and right. Nevertheless, those who persist in the undue cultivation of the subjective mind should be aware of the danger they incur of disturbing both their mental and moral equipoise. Broken homes and insane aslylums are too intimately related with the history of Spiritism not to give us pause. The scientific reasons that have been offered for this are very briefly as follows: As regards insanity, that is already wrought whenever the too highly cultivated subjective mind usurps the place of reason. When that time comes the unfortunate medium or clairvoyant, lacking the adjustments to this world that come normally through the subjective mind, can find no suitable home but the madhouse. As to morality, when once the subjective mind, already under the suggestion that it is an authoritative spirit from a higher world, receives the further suggestion of "the illicit love," it very naturally returns to its owner in defiance of this poor world's arbitrary enactments a carte blanche for his meditated license.

Let the sincere seeker after glory, honor and immortality contrast the haphazard and uncertain results to be gotten from mediums with the sweet and gracious consolations of Jesus offered to us in words such as these: "I am the resurrection and the life; he that liveth and believeth in me shall never die;" and confirmed to us by the majestic facts of his life, death and resurrection. Let him contrast also the mercenary spirit that is entirely too closely associated with the history of Spiritism with the self-sacrificial mind of him who sealed his consolations to us with his own blood, and who in resurrection, might and glory beckoned us with pierced hand to the reception of them. And finally, let him who seeks surcease of sorrow turn away from the myriad graves of earth to look by faith upon the empty tomb of the One who said: "The hour is coming in which the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of Man, and shall come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life."

BETTER CITIZENSHIP.

S. W. CRUTCHER.

While admiring the skill and bravery of our soldiers and sailors we are ready to ask, Will it be possible for our statesmen to direct affairs with equal credit to themselves and to the honor of their country?

If ever we should heed the admonition of Paul to Timothy, that prayers be made "for kings and for all in authority, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life," now is the time. New questions, difficult of solution, new policies that will be difficult of administration, are already or soon will be thrust upon us. Are we to be equal to the occasion?

We have been very far behind in dealing with the best interests of our inferior race left on us at the close of the civil war between the states. In a Southern city of perhaps 2,500 souls, the negro vote is sufficient to decide, not only municipal, but also county elections.

A man who is always at church and never misses prayer-meeting, who is very hospitable, and perhaps conceded to be one of the best men in his town or county, holds a lucrative county office—how did he get it?

He selected in the six different townships six negroes, one for each township, in whose hands he placed six fine mules, a mule to a man, saying to each, this: "If I am beaten, the mule is a loan; if elected, a gift."

The office is his; the mules belong to the negroes. This was better than working the negroes through the saloon men, as is very often the case.

I said to a preacher, "Why not close these saloons that pay into the treasury $1,200 each?" His reply was this: "You know that the larger part of the saloon money comes from the negroes, and many of the white people will approve of any plan that transfers the dimes from the negro to the white man.

We have seen the saloons voting the negroes and then getting their hard-earned pennies over their counters for their adulterated liquors during all these post bellum days.

Is the rum traffic to be in our way in dealing with our captured provinces, as it has been all these years in dealing with the negroes?

These are the questions that our President and Congress should consider.

Our Garfield did much to close the polygamous evil in Utah. Harrison, to the honor of religion and Presbyterianism, struck the Louisiana Lottery and all lotteries a blow from which it has never recovered; and now is the time for the more than five millions of Methodists to record that their man, McKinley, "has come to the kingdom for a time like this."

Shall rum compete with the elevating and saving influences to be used in civilizing these poor people who have had no Bibles and whose only ideas of religion is loyalty to the Catholic Church?

Our Y. P. S. C. E. and other young people's organizations ought to make themselves heard in tones unmistakable now. Party lines are so loose now and the independent voter is abroad as never before. The party lash is less feared than ever, and it is an opportune time to demand a better citizenship. Let us get our patriotism turned in the right direction. Let us show the world some of the victories of peace—a triumph of right over wrong. Preachers will join in such a work as never before. Our sectarian meanness is growing less day by day, and surely it is for some good purpose. Day before yesterday an engineer on the railroad, getting about $125 a month, got drunk. He was promptly discharged. Yesterday he attempted suicide, but failed. He is disgraced, out of work and hasa dependent family. Yet Christian men by their votes and in various ways encourage this iniquity. Let us not pray less for our army and our navy, but more for a better citizenship.

ARE WE A CHRISTIAN NATION?

F. L. MOFFETT.

The question we have placed at the head of this article is not an easy one to answer. When one gets into a pessimistic mood he is disposed to answer it in the negative. None are so blind, I presume, as to think that we have reached perfection, or that the millennial reign has come; for surely our Father's will is not done "upon the earth as it is done in heaven." Yet there is much over which to rejoice. We are passing through an epoch-making period in our history. During the past three months we have been engaged in a war such as the world has never witnessed before. It cannot be explained by the word "patriotism." We have called it a humanitarian war; and so it has been. It does not have the usual element of selfishness. Brave American boys have given up their lives, and others have offered themselves as a sacrifice upon the altar of liberty. "Greater love hath no man than that a man lay down his life for his friend." These have laid down their lives for an oppressed people, but how unselfish has been this service! It has attracted the attention of the whole civilized world, and has really been an astonishment to those who are not familiar with the American type of Christianity. The success of our armies, both upon land and sea, has been phenomenal and many have come to believe, as never before, that God is operating in American history to accomplish this good purpose. Truly we can say:

"I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widening with the process of the suns."

Not the least important event of this three months of history-making was the proclamation of President McKinley, requesting that the third day of July be made a day of prayer and thanksgiving to Almighty God, for the success which had attended our cause (which we trust is his cause), and that supplications be made to him that the war may be brought to a close with as little suffering and loss of life as possible. The fourth day of July brought us the news of the destruction of the Spanish fleet, under Admiral Cervera, just outside the habor at Santiago; then, after a few days' waiting, came the news of the surrender of Santiago. Our armies have had almost an ovation, at least at the beginning of the invasion of Puerto Rico, and with it all comes the glad news that, very likely, terms of peace will soon be reached. Surely, God is in his world, even though all is not right with it yet.

If we should write our history as the Hebrew wrote his we would give God a great deal more credit than we do, for surely our confidence has been in him. One of the most important items of the Declaration of Independence is the statement, "With a firm reliance upon the protection of Divine Providence we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor." And who would question that they had such guidance and protection?

In 1787, when the matter of formulating a constitution by which these free and independent states should be governed, was under discussion by the representatives of the states in convention assembled, the debates waxed warm—various proposals had been made, various consultations or models presented, but there was no likelihood of agreement. Dr. Franklin arose and proposed that the body adjourn for three days, and that there be free intermingling and discussion; that an effort be made to understand the positions and propositions of opponents. Said Mr. Franklin in closing: "Before I sit down, Mr. President, I will suggest another matter, and I am really surprised that it has not been proposed by some other member, at an earlier period of our deliberations. I will suggest, Mr. President, the propriety of nominating and appointing, before we separate, a chaplain to this convention, whose duty it shall be, uniformly, to assemble with us and introduce the business of each day by imploring the assistance of Heaven, and its blessings upon our deliberations." When they assembled at the close of the three-day period matters were easily adjusted, and the constitution was formulated.

In 1789, when Washington was inaugurated, there was the same recognition of Divine Providence. New York City is the place, the 30th day of April the time. "The ceremony of the day was ushered in by a salute fired from the battery. This was about six o'clock in the morning, and even at this early hour the streets were fast filling up with people. At nine the church bells rang out a merry peal. At ten they summoned the worshipers to church, each pastor devoting the occasion to imploring Heaven's blessing upon the nation's first President." At the inauguration the oath was administered by Robert R. Livingstone, chancellor of the state of New York. Washington, "bowing down, seized the Book, kissed it and exclaimed with closed eyes and much emotion, "I swear so help me God." Such were our beginnings.

Another critical period in our history comes. The country is rent by civil strife, the fullness of time has come for God to show himself visibly in the affairs of humanity. The spirit of liberty has become incarnate in Abraham Lincoln and others. The war between two civilizations has continued over two years. Lincoln is contemplating making a mighty thrust at despotism, as he watches the progress of the war. At the cabinet meeting immediately after the battle of Antietam, and just prior to the September (1862) proclamation, the President entered upon the business before them by saying, "The time for the annunciation of the emancipation policy can be no longer delayed, public sentiment will sustain it, my warmest friends and supporters demand it, and I have promised God that I would do it." The last was uttered in a low tone. Secretary Chase, who was sitting near asked Mr. Lincoln if he had correctly understood him. He replied, "I made a solemn vow before God, that if General Lee was driven back from Pennsylvania, I would crown the result by the declaration of freedom to the slaves." Hence the Emancipation Proclamation, January 1st, 1863. It might be well to have the name of God in the constitution, but far better is to have Him in the thoughts and lives of our rulers. In the past we have been able to appeal to him for the rectitude of our intentions in great national policies, and so have we done in our present struggle, and the outcome is showing that our appeals have not been in vain. We may say:

"Thou, too, sail on, O ship of state,
Sail on, O union, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all its hopes of future years,
Is hanging bre thless on thy fate."

But our safety for the future will consist in giving him even a larger place in our life, and in conforming our individual, social and national acts to his will. Sad would be the time, should it ever come, when we would forget him as a nation, and prove recreant to the trust which he has imposed upon us.

In the light of all our past we can say, "Surely he hath not dealt so with any people." "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord and the people whom he hath chosen for his own inheritance."

PREACHING OLD THINGS.

BY HORACE SIBERELL.

The fear and dread of the average preacher is that he may become too narrow, that he may fall into some rut or groove, which will be the means of destroying his usefulness. He often imagines that he can avoid this by saying startling and sensational things. Perchance his congregation does not increase in numbers as rapidly as he had hoped it would. It may be that some "wise one" of his church has hinted to him that they, too, are disappointed at the size and interest of the congregation. The preacher begins to imagine that the "old, old story" has become prosaic, stale and out of date. Therefore, he undertakes to right the wrong by saying something containing more of facy than it does of fact, more of speculation than of the real truth. If he is wise as he should be he will soon see the folly of such a course as this; if he is not, and insist upon following his proposed plan, he will only succeed in complicating the trouble he has thought to remedy.

The teacher does not hesitate to take class after class through the Binomial Theorem, the lawyer goes over the Law of Evidence again and again, the physician applies the same treatment for typoidh fever to fifty different patients, the merchant goes repeatedly over the same old account and invoice, the carpenter builds a score of houses after the same style of architecture, the farmer plows, sows and plants the same old way. And yet, none of these ever seem to fear that by doing the one thing so often they will fall into such ruts as will destroy their usefulness. Why, then, should the preacher's usefulness be destroyed and his success changed into failure because he shall constantly warn people of their sins. Should he be called an "old fogy," even if in teaching the people the plan of salvation he should happen to use the same line of thought more than one time?

It is the preacher's duty to preach the truth. He is called upon to point sinful humanity to "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." His purpose should be to teach a few people many things, rather than many people a few things. If he has tact in his ministering unto men, a pleasing manner and delivery in the pulpit, he should count himself fortunate. Feeling, pathos, variety of expression and purity of diction are all valuable adjuncts to the preaching of the gospel, but they are by no means the gospel. They can never be made God's power for the salvation of the world.

It should not be a matter of concern whether the preacher has a large and fashionable congregation, but whether he has a congregation, no matter how few in numbers, who are zealous for good works. The preacher's congregation should not come to hear him, expecting to be entertained with some startling sentiment, which is not so much an indication of his erudition and scholastic attainment as his audacity and egotism. The preacher should be neither an entertainer or an actor for public applause. He is an expounder and teacher of the truth as found in the Word of God. His prime object should not be to "tickle the fancies of his hearers," but to instruct them in their duty to themselves, their fellows and their God. He will find that in the end he can reach more people with a few zealous Christians, whom he has taught to live earnest, consistent Christian lives, than he can with all the fine-spun theories and sensational sermons it is possible for him to prepare.

A vivid description of your feelings at first sight of Niagara or Yosemite, the relating of a touching and pathetic incident which occurred during your last visit to London, the repeating of some of the "cute" sayins of Mary and John, the "wee ones" of your household, may be more entertaining to the average audience than a clear, scholarly and scriptural argument upon the necessity of our strict obedience to the will of God. But it is doubtful if these touching, sublime or amusing things will go so far toward uplifting humanity and bringing men to a true knowledge of Christ as a few plain, wholesome truths gleaned from the Word of God.

The Religious World.

The Sabbath Association of Maryland offers a prize of $25.00 for the best article setting forth the advantages to manufacturers, railroads, contractors, and all employers of labor, in the changing of their pay-day from Saturday to Monday; showing its tendency to reduce Sunday dissipation and a squandering of wages; the consequent physical and moral improvement of the men, and the amount and character of their service; also its tendency to improve the family life of the laboring class, and to secure a more decorous and improving observance of Sunday, as provided by actual instances where such are known. The articles must be adapted for publication in the secular papers and especially addressed to the employers of labor. Articles must not contain over 1,000 words, and must be mailed before October 12th, 1898, to Rev. Oliver Hemstreet, Secretary of the Sabbath Association of Maryland, Room 51 Bank of Baltimore Building, Baltimore Md. The prize will be awarded by the officers of the association and the money will be remitted to the successful competitor on or before November 15th, 1898. All articles sent are to be the property of the association.

The great missionary churches of the United States are already planning to plant Christianity as they preach it to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands as pointed out by Bishop Hurst in the New York Advocate. He says:

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has already appointed a committee, which has reported. Bishop Thoburn declares that American Methodism should begin immediately at Manila, where there is a prosperous colony of Chinese. The Congregationalists of the American Board have already resolved to open work in the Philippines, and they base their action on the special and splendid opportunity which creates an obligation on all mission boards. The American Baptists have determined to begin work, and are only debating whether the home or the foreign society shall take charge of the enterprise. Some of the denominations are discussing an appeal to the government to send Admiral Dewey, after he shall have finished his work at Manila, to the Society Islands, and put an end to Spanish misrule there.

With the Spanish West Indies and the Philippines, and perhaps some smaller groups, as a new and vast field for Protestant evangelization, there should come to the American church a new inspiration. If American heroism opened this great territory, American Christianity must respond with equal energy and faith.

At the stated meeting of the American Bible Society this week an advance step was taken in respect to Bible distribution in the Philippine Islands. In view of the prospect that in the near future these islands may be open for new forms of Christian work, the secretaries were authorized to request the Rev. John R. Hykes, D. D., the society's agent for China, to visit Manila for the purpose of inquiring into existing facts and conditions, as a help to prompt and vigorous action in case there should be fit opnortunities for circulating the Scriptures. To meet the expenses incident to his journey and to such preliminary work as may seem to be advisable an appropriation of one thousand dollars was made. It was also decided to inaugurate Bible work in Porto Rico at the earliest practicable moment, and to resume the operations in Cuba which were suspended two years ago on account of the disturbed condition of the island.

Our Budget.

—Remember Church Extension Day.

—The missionary year closes September 30th.

—Hostilities between the United States and Spain have ceased.

—Only the peace that comes with destruction can stop hostilities between the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of darkness.

—The war with Spain has greatly enlarged the possibilities and responsibilities of the United States and its churches.

—Now that the war is over, political parties and politicians are fishing up old issues and coining new ones to preserve their identity and continuity.

—In the Texas Letter this week will be found a vigorous condemnation of the saloon.

—Our English Topics this week came to us from an East Anglican seacoast retreat.

—Bro. Bently, of Shanghai, favors us with a China letter in this paper, bearing upon the political outlook of that vast ancient empire.

—The "Wheeling Through England" series of letters, by W. E. Garrison, are so interesting and so well written that they cannot fail of interest to the reader.

—The letter from Paris, by Wm. H. Matlock, gives interesting glimpses of French life and national impulses.

—The report of the Missiouri Christian Lectureship by C. C. Hill in this paper, reveals something of a rich intellectual feast which was spread at Carrolton for its guests this year.

—We publish this week another interesting letter from Mr. Moody on Christian work among the soldiers.

—M. J. Fergusson's reply to Bro. Billman's review of his article on "The Baptism of the Holy Spirit," will be found in this paper.

—See program of convention to be held in New York City, Aug. 30th to Sept. 2nd, in this paper.

—The two very interesting papers, one on Spiritism, the other on the management of churches, are concluded in this number. They are amply and ably written and full of suggestions.

—In writing to us of the death of Bro. J. B. Royal, whose obituary appears in this paper, the writer, J. C. Reynolds, of Macomb, Ill., says: "I have fallen heir to his cane. I am approaching my 73rd birthday and have never used a cane. But if I should need one I will lean upon the one my beloved brother used for years." How beautiful this figure of that staff upon which we shall all be glad to lean when approaching the valley and the shadow of death. Bro. Reynolds was probably associated with Bro. Royal more than any other preacher. Bro. Royal has gone to his reward, but we trust that his fellow-laborer, Bro. Reynolds may be spared yet many years to his friends and to the church.

—The Board of Church Extention's "Catalogue of Church Plans," is out and can be had at 50 cents per copy, prepaid, by writing to G. W. Muckley, 600 Water Works Building, Kansas City, Mo. Churches contemplating a new house of worship should consult this catalogue before adopting any plans. It might save you much money.

—B. Q. Denham, of North Tonawanda, N. Y., in a brief article in this paper, bears testimony to the excellent work done by the Bethany C. E. Reading Course last year. But this was only the beginning. Now that its mission and good fruits are known, a hundred-fold more good can be accomplished next year if the Endeavor Societies everywhere will only take up the work. Do not let such an opportunity for self-culture and increased usefulness pass unheeded.

—The Endeavor Society of the Christian Church at Chattanooga, Tenn., has published a book of views of the city, river, mountain, battlefield and other interesting and historic scenes in and about that city, which they are sending, postpaid, to any address for fifteen cents, the money to be used in assisting them to carry on their work at Camp Thomas. For the last seven or eight Lord's days they have held from two to three meetings each Lord's day and have visited the hospitals and left flowers, chicken broth, songs, smiles and hand-shakes, and doing such other work among them as they believed their Lord would have them do. As an evidence that their efforts have been appreciated they say that they have almost daily invitations to meet with them. Rain or sunshine, they have from three to four hundred soldiers assembled at each meeting, and such work needs the encouragement they ask. For the book address M. Zeigler, President Gas Co., Chattanooga, Tenn.

—The Young Men's Christian Association of the State University, Columbia, Mo., has just published the Annual Handbook for New Students. This little book contains minute directions to the new students as to boarding houses, entering the school, etc. It is invaluable to boys and girls who are entire strangers in Columbia, and unfamiliar with the management of a large institution. Any boy or girl in the country who is expecting or even contemplating entering the University, should write to the Actin General Secretary for one of these books.

—Missouri's educational exhibit at the Trans-Mississippi Exposition, with the possible exception of the educational display of Nebraska, is said to be the equal of any on the grounds. Of course Nebraska, the home state of the great Fair, has a very complete and interesting display in all departments.

—We have received a copy of the ninth annual catalogue of Cotner University with announcements for 1898-'99. We hope the effort to save this institution from its debts now being made will succeed and that it may yet attain to the proportion and influence contemplated by its founders.

—The Missionary Intelligencer for August says that we now have 2,797 contributing churches for Foreign Missions, and asks that this number be raised to at least 3,000 before the close of the year, September 30th. This is not an unreasonable request, and we hope it will be attained.

—It has been said, and is no doubt the truth, that one cause of so much beer-drinking at the camp canteens is the lack of good water. The remedy for this is lemons, lime-juice and ice-water, and systematic arrangements for supplying these articles for the soldiers ought to have been made at the start, and no doubt will yet be supplied to them. In the meantime it would be well for those sending gifts to soldiers to remember the value of lemons to them for slaking thirst and preventing fevers, and send the same in liberal quantities.

—We again call attention to the fact that the day for an offering for Church Extension is at hand. There are many living, thriving churches to-day standing as a monument to the good offices of this branch of mission work, and it only remains for us to enlarge its funds that its usefulness may be correspondingly increased. See to it, then, that an offering is made for Church Extension in your congregation on the first Sunday in September.

—The monthly bulletin of the Foreign Society for June is one of the most encouraging both from the gain in receipts and in news from the field that we have yet received. The work in the different fields is going forward without interruption and in some places many conversions to Christ are reported. The receipts for June amounted to $25,814.12 which was a gain of $3,295.07 over June of last year.

—A writer in one of our exchanges says: "I know of many churches being destroyed by inefficient officials." This is doubtless true, but not the whole truth. We know of many churches having been destroyed by inefficient evangelists—and professional ones at that.

—B. B. Tyler's last editorial, Aug. 4th, on "The Possession and Use of Property," has called out a number of replies excepting to some of his sayings. As Bro. Tyler continues on this theme this week and promises to write still further about it two weeks hence, we shall withhold all replies until he has concluded his treatment of the subject. Perhaps some who have written may desire to modify some of their criticisms before pressing their publication.

—Three preachers are recorded in our Obituary Column this week. First there is a tribute to the memory of Joseph B. Royal, whose death was recently reported in our columns, written by his colaborer, J. C. Reynolds. Bro. Royal was a valient soldier of the cross for many years. Next we have a tribute to the memory of G. A. Willett, of Ionia, Mich. But few men were better known in Ionia and in Michigan than Bro. Willett, or that will live longer in the memory of the people and the church. And last is a tribute of respect to the memory of Henry Wright, of Stiles, Ia., by L. C. Swann. These have entered that rest which remains for the people of God, but their works will live on in the hearts and lives of those who knew them, for many years.

—The time for the September offering fast approaches. Are you preparing to do your part, asked by the board in order to reach $250,000 by the close of this century?

—Among the many signs of good cheer for our Extension Board are the numerons requests of churches to have their department increased that we may be sure to reach this year's part of the $250,000 by the close of 1900. One church said, "Multiply our portion by ten." Many churches ask the board to double their apportionment.

—If at all possible the churches should arrange to take the collection promptly on the first Sunday of September for Church Extension, and allow one Sunday for those who did not respond the first, and then promptly forward the money to G. W. Muckley, Co. Sec., 600 Water Works Blds, Kansas City, Mo.

—As an illustration of the folly of eliminating common sense from religious theories the Church Union relates the following story:

Whittier had a school-teacher, Joshua Coffin by name, who when old got the idea that he had been predestinated to be damned. It was a grievous burden and sorrow to the poor old man. However, he took it as the will of God, and was resigned to it. Whittier went to see him, and is said to have talked something like this with him about it: "Well, Joshua, don't thee hate God for damning thee?" "Oh no," said the old man. "It is for the good of all; it must be best." "But, Joshua, thee has spent all thy life doing good, and now since thee is going to hell, thee must be getting ready to do all the hurt thee can." "No, no; my feeling is not so at all." "Now, Joshua," said Whittier, "thee is going to hell with a heart full of love to God and everybody. What dost thee think the devil can ever do with such a one as thee?" The old man laughed heartily, and was wonderfully cheered. Some doctrines need just such a spicy injection of common sense. No amount of logical predestination will make the devil tolerate the company of a good man, even if God were of such nature as to send such a man to the devil."

—Now that the war is over we trust that there will be no political-party-glorying over the results. The organs of the party in power asked that party issues and the partisan spirit be subordinated to the one great aim of liberating Cuba and the requests, whether at their bidding or not, have been fulfilled. Any attempt now to appropriate national honor to that party would be sadly out of place and surely result to an injury to it should the attempt be made. Let the spirit of national fraternity and patriotism continue at the front.

—Remember that Business and Christianity is the wide-awake vigorous organ of the Church Extension Board. Send to G. W. Muckley, 600 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., for a copy and post up on the magnificent work and growth of the Church Extension work.

—I love the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST; and its new dress improves its appearance one huudred per cent. May God bless you and it and give you of his Spirit so you may go on to higher atainments and grander results in the redemption of the world from all sin and unrighteousness. O. L. RICE.

—We ask special attention to an article in our Family Circle this week from Josiah Strong, on the increase of vice among the young and especially among the school children of the land. This vice, he thinks, is attributable to the increase of bad books and obscene literature. However this may be the matter is indeed a serious one, and demands the immediate, energetic and united consideration and treatment of every parent, teacher, preacher, Christian and good citizen of our country. The increase of sensational and impure literature and the lack of proper home-teaching of children about fundamental things in life and character are menaces to our homes, our civilization and our country. The remedies suggested by Josiah Strong are both practical and wise, and should not go unheeded. Herein lies the future work of our real reformers and the hope of our country.

—My experience and observation, during a period now of nearly six years in which have been in the field at large in the state have led me to see more and more the need of just such systematic instruction, and along the exact lines prescribed by the Bethany Reading Courses. I am sure that in the Endeavor Society, the most ready and fruitful soil for the kind of sowing, is found. There is imperative need for instruction of this order, that our young people may not be ignorant of the grandeur of our history and the cause we plead. I think it would be good if we could have a Bethany day in each society once per quarter. A paper read at county, district and state conventions. That a drill on the order of a Normal Sunday-school lesson might be presented with good results. May God bless you. T. A. ABBOTT.
1135 Vandeventer Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

The foregoing card but briefly hints at the great possibilities for good in the Bethany C. E. Reading Course work. Much has been done already, as Bro. Abbott indicates, but the work can be greatly enlarged upon. It is an economnical, practical method for disseminating knowledge on vital church work and interests and the second year's reading course ought to double that of the first. Every Endeavor Society of the Christian Church ought to take the course, and now is the time to talk and work it up. Do not wait until after the work of the second year begins, but begin arrangements now. Write to J. Z. Tyler, Cleveland, Ohio, for literature. Those who took the course last year will of course want to continue in the good work.

—In speaking of the legalized saloon, the St. Louis Christian Advocate makes this alarming statement:

It is already the autocrat of American politics. Especially is this so in municipal government. It holds St. Louis to-day in the griping, gasping grip of an East Indian anaconda. And if the readers wish any outside testimony to the truth or falsity of this statement, let them in person or by telephone, telegraph or mail, interview every state officer at Jefferson City, or any ex-state officer in St. Louis, or in any other part of Missouri.

It is hard to realize that such a thing as is here charged up against this city with all of its churches, moral forces and courts, can be true, yet the fact exists. St. Louis is dominated by the saloon. Nor is it the only city in the grip of this fearful, deadly monster. It would be difficult to find an exception to the rule in the so-called Christian world. How long shall these things continue? Here is the Advocate's answer:

Let us not listen to the wails of pessimism which once said that the legalized Louisville and Louisiana Lotteries could never be put down, that African slavery could never be put down. When the Church of the living God awoke to her full duty the lottery was not only banished from Louisville and Louisiana, but from our republic. When every pulpit in the North became a throne of thunder against African slavery, it had to go. And so will the legalized saloon have to go early in the twentieth century. As this red-handed murderer puts his ear to the ground to-day he hears not only the stumbling tread of a hundred thousand victims marching to a drunkard's grave and hell, but he also hears the tramp, tramp, tramp of millions of our boys and girls who have been educated to regard alcoholic drinks as poisons, and not food. In the rising generation is the doom of this awful iniquity. Long live the boys and girls! Let us train them by day and by night, and cheer them as they come.

—The Word of God is the Universal Father's Infinite, Eternal and Consubstantial Utterance of Himself in the Bosom of His own Immensity. That same Word—the Second Person of the Ineffable Trinity—was uttered in time and space when, in the womb of Mary, THE WORD WAS MADE FLESH, AND DWELT AMONG US. The individual Incarnation of the Word of God in Jesus Christ is extended, perfected and supplemented by the social incarnation of the Word of God in the Catholic Church, the Mystical Body of Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ is "God manifest in the flesh." The Church is God incarnate in society.

The only clear statement in the above paragraph, from The Church Progress, in an editorial on "The Word of God," excepting the scriptural declaration that "Jesus Christ is 'God manifest in the flesh,'" is the last sentence, and that one is of doubtful disputation. The Roman Catholic Church is meant, of course, and the history of society does not prove the correctness of the statement.

PERSONAL MENTION.

The church at Corning, Ia., has retained W. B. Crewdson, pastor, for the fourth year.

N. S. Haynes, for six years pastor at Englewood, Chicago, has resigned. He has been sick, but is recovering. He will spend a season at Eureka, Ill.

Geo. F. Hall, pastor Tabernacle Christian Church, Decatur, Ill., and his wife, called at this office last Monday while in the city. Bro. Hall reports the work at the Tabernacle in a flourishing condition. He is on a lecture tour, headed toward the Northwest. Bro. Hall now spends a considerable portion of his time in the lecture field. He was on the Mountain Chautauqua program for three lectures which he has just recently fulfilled.

On the recommendation of O. A. Bartholomew, pastor West End Church, this city, T. A. West, of Liberty, Ohio, has been called as an assistant pastor, to begin September 1st.

A. L. Drummond, though young in the ministry, is said to be doing efficient work at Smith Center, Kansas. Their new house of worship, lately completed, speaks much for him.

James Franklin King has been called to preach for the congregation at Montrose, Kas.

The church ot Chilliothe, Mo., has officially commended G. F. Assiter, of Oregon, Mo., to the churches as a scholarly preacher of excellent ability and thoroughly qualified to fill the pulpit of any church. Bro. Assiter has been preaching for the church at Chillicothe during the vacation of their pastor, Bro. Pettit, but this work will close September 1st, after which he will be available for another field. Any church in need of a pastor can correspond with Bro. Assiter at Oregon, Mo.

W. A. Gaddis, of Wayne City, Ill., writes that a young physician, member of the Christian Church, could find an opening there.

Milo G. Cummings holds two meetings to give Pulaski room to get out of debt. Good shepherds watch and keep flocks from debt.

Abram E. Cory has been sent by his physician to the Minnesota lakes for rest.

W. W. Williams, treasurer of the Iowa Christian convention was called by telegram to Illinois, where his wife lies very ill.

S. M. Perkins, of Council Bluffs, Iowa, preached 139 sermons, received 29 additions, made 620 calls, conducted 11 funerals and had 11 weddings during the year.

W. S. Johnson begins a meeting at Pleasant Hill, near Washington, Iowa, on Aug. 20.

W. B. Crewdson has accepted a fourth years' work at Corning, Ia.

A PREACHER'S REPORT

Interesting Statement by Elder Joel H. Austin of Goshen, Ind.

"I was a victim of catarrh and had almost constant pain in my head. The trouble was gradually working down on my lungs. I was weak and irresolute. My wife had the grip and Hood's Sarsaparilla cured her. After this I had the same disease and resorted to Hood's. In a short time the aches and pains were relieved and I also saw the medicine was helping my catarrh. In six weeks I ceased to have any further trouble with it and I am now a well man. The pains and bloating I had in my limbs are gone and I am relieved of a heart trouble. I am thankful for a medicine so intelligently compounded and so admirably adapted to the needs of the system." ELDER JOEL H. AUSTIN, Goshen, Indiana.

Hood's Pills cure liver ills, easy to take, easy to operate. 25 cents.

Henry Brown, once of Ruthven, Iowa, is in a meeting near there, in the Carter schoolhouse.

The resignation of Z. E. Bates, at Shady Ave. Church, Allegheney, Pa., was not accepted.

E. F. Mahan says the church at Salem will enlarge its house of worship shortly. Work prosperous.

The East Broadway Church, Sedalia, Mo., has expressed its high regard for J. S. Myers' services in helping it into existence and its regret at his departure for the East, in a beautifully expressed set of resolutions.

J. T. Boone, pastor of the church at Memphis, Mo., has gone on a two weeks' vacation in Tennessee. He called at this office on his way there last week.

H. Warner Newby is holding a tabernacle meeting at Miltonvale, Kansas. Bro. M. J. Duncan is the pastor of the church.

G. A. Ragan, of Oskaloosa, has offered his resignation to take effect October 1st. It has not been accepted. A Chicago mission has invited him to take their work.

A. M. Haggard speaks at the Keota, Iowa, anniversary on Aug. 14th.

S. B. Moore, pastor of the church at Galesburg, Ill., who has been spending his vacation in Kentucky, called at this office on last Monday. He is on his way back to Galesburg, but tarried in this city over Lord's day that he might preach for the church at Compton Heights. He is just out of a good meeting at Ghent, Ky., and on his way home to resume work for a good, live church at Galesburg, Ill.

J. S. Hughes, of Chicago, now at Macatawa, has been devoting considerable time during the summer in giving his institutes of St. John, as he calls them. He has just closed one of these at Central Christian College, Albany, Mo., where we understand his lectures made so deep an impression upon the preachers and professors that they have all ordered a copy of this forthcoming book, and a few have ordered as many as ten or twelve copies for their friends under the special offer for advance subscribers. His lectures are awakening a renewed interest in this wonderful book. He says that he will be obliged to all pastors who are members of pastors' associations if they will kindly send him the address of either the secretary or president of the association of which they themselves are members. Address him at station O., Chicago.

THE GARDEN OF SLEEP.

For an all-too-brief fortnigh t I have broken away from the grip of London, that mighty octopus of our modern civilization. These lines will be penned for my American friends in sight of the elements which fascinate most of us so much, because it alone blends the suggestion of time and eternity. I am looking over the sea, a sublime picture of the infinite, but the vast bosom of that sea is heaving with fickle waves, and is moaning out the psalm that is always pitched in some minor key of music. This lovely spot on the Coast of Norfolk, the village of Cromer, is famous as being one of the few points in the world where the sun is to be seen both rising and setting in the sea. One happy way of getting far from that maddening crowd of five millions in London is to steal away to this sweet little East Anglian retreat. Hither come select batches of people who desiderate thoughtful quietude, air saturated with a bracing blend of salt and ozone, musical cadences of the murmuring ocean and enchanting permutations, combinations, variations of cliffs, moors and woods in the background. The sea is conqueror here. Five hundred years ago a town stood where the waves are rolling. Shipden, with its pier, wharves, ships and church, is sunk in the deep, which swallowed it up piecemeal, the waves corroding its foundations, as they are still steadily encroaching on portions of the East Anglian Coast. Cromer then stood a mile inland, and was in the middle ages an unknown little village. Now it is perched on the edge of the cliffs, protected at great cost by tremendous sea walls. Four miles along the coast is the "Garden of Sleep," to which I have been making a pilgrimage. The old village of Sidestrand has retreated from the crumbling cliffs against which the ocean booms when north winds are roaring. But a lovely old churchyard hangs yet on the brow over the shore. Parts of the enclosing low walls have fallen, and all the ancient enclosure is doomed. Graves and gravestones wait the time when they will go down, down, down into the abyss! In the churchyard stands a solitary tower, a curious structure. Not a tree or bush casts any shadow near it. The dead alone surround it. The deep calm is only broken by the hollow dash of the billows far below, or the occasional screech of the sea-mew. This venerable tower is perfectly circular in shape, like the famous Round Towers in Ireand, and it is all that is left of the parish church, built probably 700 years ago. It is built of rough flint stones like most of the old East Anglian churches. The "Garden of Sleep" is the name given to this dreamy, delicious spot by W. Clement Scott, who made it famous by his song, published under that title.

POPPYLAND.

The whole of this district along the northen shores of the English country of Norfolk is familiarly and poetically called "Poppyland." At frequent intervals we come across acres of country blazing with sheets of scarlet poppies. When Linnæus, the founder of botanical science, came from Sweden to England, he fell on his face in rapture before a field of yellow gorse. How would he have felt if he had found his way to Cromer, and had reveled in these pictures of glory indescribable of ocean blue, deep woodland green, and poppy crimson? I have described this locality as a delightful holiday dreamland. Truly, there is everywhere something to plunge the soul into some dreamland. On Sunday I went into the noble old parish church, of Cromer, and heard the Bishop of Norwich preach, and Sheepshanks, Right Reverend Father in God and Lord Bishop the diocese, occupied by the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, is a man I had long wished to see and hear. His sermon was negatively pleasing and positively disappointing. It was free from the sacerdotalism which is now almost universally Romanizing the great Anglican Church. It was not tainted by any of the arrogance of priestcraft. This was gratifying. But it was also, though a very long sermon, free from any oratorical attractiveness. It was one more inducement to the mind to wander in the dreaminess of Poppyland, and dream I did. I sat dreaming of the days, 500 years ago, when the simple old villagers, all Roman Catholics, built that magnificent church. England was papist then. The Reformation did not begin till long after. In that grand old building many a mass was recited, many a confession was made to a cowled priest. And now Cardinal Vaughn, of Westminster and the Duke of Norfolk are praying to the Virgin Mary for the conversion of England, and are hoping that all the splendid old parish churches and cathederals will be reconsecrated to the Pope again. And that is just what can never be, and a storm is raising in England which will ere long convince the Ritualists that their cause is dead and their aspirations are but the mockery of real hope. But we walk a mile out of Cromer and we are set dreaming again. Along the lofty red cliffs, at the fishing village of Overstrand, where in the hush of the cornfield the poppies by myriads flaunt their gorgeous scarlet with dazzling brilliance, is a spot that has a history exactly typical of all the wonderful vanished life of old England. In the churchyard of Overstrand are two churches, side by side. One is a lonely ruin, roofless and overgrown with ivy so beautiful that many artists come to sketch it. It consist of a square flint battlemented tower, a nave and chancel, north porch and road-turret. Close by is the pretty new church, but the old one is a gem. And this village of Overstrand has a history which I recite because it is a capital specimen of the life which our forefathers led. Eight hundred years ago the lordship of Overstrand was given by William the Conqueror to Berner, a crossbowman. From him it passed to Earl Warren, who had considerable estates in the county of Norfolk, including a strong castle at Costleacre. Overstrand was held of Earl Warren, by a family named de Reymes. Agnes de Rattlesden, daughter and coheiress of William de Reymes, took proceedings against Ricter de Reymes to recover a fourth part of a knight's fee, a portion of the lordship, which he had released to Roger de Herlberge for 20 marks. Roger was called to support his title, and a wager of battle was fought between him and a freeman on begalf of the claimant. After the fight an agreement was come to. Ah, that was a stormy old world! And now it is all past and gone, and one sometimes dreams of all its stress, and rudeness, and passion. This old church at Overstrand, in the heart of Poppyland, now a roofless but charming ruin, was built on land given by John Reymes, in the 15th century. So it is a relic of that strange time.

MISSIONARIES WELCOMED HOME.

With great joy we have shaken hands with Mr. and Mrs. Remfrey Hunt. These two missionaries have been eight years in China. It seems nothing like that time since I assisted at their valedictory service at West London Tabernacle. We and they are mourning the death of Bro. Hunt's closest colleague, that beloved friend in the same band, Albert Saw. Only two yearg ago he was among us here in good health and spirits, delighting us all with his addresses and his company. Bother and Sister Arnold will be shortly returning to China. Their visit has done good all round. Bro. Hunt will further refresh us. He was a favorite all round before he went, and we are all proud to see him here once more.

IMPS OF THE INQUISITION.

Everywhere in England excitement is steadily rising over the question about which I shall have much to say in future letters. The problem of the time is the position of the clergy. Are they to become minions of the papacy, and defy their bishops, and to play at "the mass in masquerade," as about 5,000 of them out of the 25,000 are doing, and increasing numbers are tending to do? Or are they to be compelled to make an honest choice between Protestantism in the Church of England and Popery in the Church of Rome? Riots are taking place in church after church, and the police are called in every Sunday in some of these sanctuaries to turn out the Protestants who steadily interrupt the service. We will not permit the priests to plunge dear old England back into the polluted sea of priestcraft.

Wheeling Through England.

V.

To the cyclist, the northern coast of Cornwall and Devon is a land of mingled troubles and delights. One guidebook, with a commendable desire to be frank, says that the few hardy (or foolhardy) wheelmen who venture into this region of rough and hilly roads are unhappy while here and glad enough to make their escape. It is true that the hills are appallingly precipitous and continuous. It is also true that many of the roads are stony and rough as compared with other English roads. Yet the cyclist who would be unhappy while wheeling through this part of England is fit for treason, strategem and spoils! He who would not count it a matter of small concern to be compelled to toil up steep hills and down steeper, on foot, perhaps, and leading his wheel, in the midst of such beauties as those presented by this coast, knows not how to value those things for which one travels. There is before me as I write a wave-washed, purple headland whose rugged outlines are softened in the twilight; to the right are the lofty fir-covered hills which border the weird and desolate tract of Exmoor; to the left across Bristol Channel the cliffs of the Welsh Coast are clearly seen, while above all other sounds comes the surge of the rising tide, drowning even the chatter of the little river Lynn which here finishes its short and stony course. It is like a picture set to music. Who would say that it is not worth while to climb hills for such a view? Much more is it worth while to ride through a continuous panorama of such views.

By all means the most impressive and magnificent piece of coast that I have yet seen is Land's End. The rounded outlines of the Lizard's serpentine cliffs give place to the more rugged granite which rises abruptly from the sea. Looking upon this most westerly point of England, one thinks of the island as a fortified castle with the sea for its moat and these cliffs for the tower at the foremost angle of the castle wall. From Land's End there is a road, not laid down on the maps, close to the coast for twenty miles to St. Ives. Riding this road is no task to jest about, but it carries with it the satisfaction (not easily attained in England) of passing through places where bicycles are a rarity, and the further satisfaction of giving one a good view of the entire great promontory of which Land's End is the most westerly point. Within these twenty miles may be seen types of all that is most characteristic of Cornwall. The copper and tin mines of St. Just, many of them extending a long distance out under the sea, afford the best opportunity of seeing the Cornish miner in his proper surroundings and examining this important but waning industry of Cornwall. At St. Ives one sees a fishing village with narrow, crooked and quaint streets and a fleet of herring boats. About a hundred of these boats, with black hulls and red sails, were leaving the harbor for a five weeks' cruise on the Coast of Ireland as I rode out on the narrow quay. St. Ives is also a watering-place with many attractions, and so represents the newer Cornish industry of caring for tourists and resorters. Many monuments of early British and Cornish civilization are to be found a little further inland, while on the coast is always to be found that most characteristic feature, the cliffs of Cornwall.

Leaving St. Ives it is convenient to drop back a few miles from the coast and traverse eighty miles or so of easier but less interesting road. But we are in haste to reach the land of King Arthur and the Round Table, and no road can be dull which leads through a country over which we can imagine Sir Launcelot, Sir Galahad and Sir Bedivere going forth to deeds of chivalry. I imagine that my Sterling would have been little more of a surprise to those worthies than it is to the "west country" Englishmen of to-day. The latter must have inherited from their knightly ancestors the idea of riding heavily laden with steel, for they consider my 24-pound wheel too light by half for their roads. The town of Camelford claims the distinction of being the ancient Camelot where Merlin by enchantment built King Arthur's castle, but the imaginative pilgrim who has any regard for the good name of the Arthurian legend will at once set aside this claim. Antiquarian investigations are entirely unnecessary. The fact simply is that Camelford is not up to the dignity of being King Arthur's seat. When one has spent half a day at Tintagel by the sea, where tradition says that Arthur was born (and this I believe), the story of the building of the castle by enchantment will seem plausible enough; but no sensible wizard would have selected Camelford as the scene of that exploit. It is not a bad town, only commonplace and modern. Besides, its location does not fit the poet's description—and who should know how Camelot lay, if not a poet? This place is not on a hill surrounded by valleys but, like nearly every other town in Cornwall, in a valley surrounded by hills. No, it will not do. I, for one, will never give my vote for localizing the legend at Camelford. Rather leave it without a local habitation. Let it hang in the air, if you like, as all good legends ought to do.

But in denying the claims of Camelford to be Arthur's Camelot we have not altogether set the legend adrift in the world. Down by the sea, six miles from Camelford, is Tintagel, a lofty headland, almost an island, jutting boldly out and on its flat top, guarded by perpendicular walls of living rock, offering a perfect site for a knightly castle. There stand the ruins of two castles, separated by a narrow ravine. What right have we to doubt in this presence that these are the remains of the twin castles, Tintagel and Terrabil, wherein Uther Pendragon, King of Britain, besieged the Duke of Cornwall, and where Arthur was born? There is the very cliff and there the narrow sands below where, as a baby, he was let down from a castle window, to be reared by the good Sir Ector under the advice of Merlin the enchanter. Perhaps it was here that the castle was built and the Round Table set up. For does the poet not say:

> "Near by was great Tintagel's Table Round,
> And there of old the flower of Arthur's knights
> Made fair beginning of a nobler time."

Perhaps it is safest as a rule not to fasten down so great a legend to one spot of earth, but when that spot is such as Tintagel there is a distinct gain in the association.

Of all the picturesque coast towns of Devon none is more justly celebrated than Clovelly, the village which has a stairway instead of a street. A steep and narrow combe descends abruptly to the sea, and in this cleft is the village. All wheeled vehicles stop at the top of Clovelly street, unless their drivers or riders wish to carry them down. In this case we walked down the terraced street, which is literally more of a stairway than a street. It is a great resort of artists, and with all its quaintness and beauty has something of the appearance of continually sitting for its picture. It is, like a coquettish belle, rather too conscious of its charms, and it is hard to believe, though history amply proves it, that it was not built for the especial delectation of travelers and tourists who love the picturesque.

As we pass along the North Devon Coast from Clovelly, the country again becomes rough and the roads hilly, but every valley gives a view of fine encircling hilltops and every hilltop gives a view of cliffs and sea. It seems not inappropriate to call this coast the Switzerland of England. Every mile offers attractions and every village tempts us to linger, but the north beckons and the summer is passing, so our journey must be continued steadily, with an occasional stop half a day here and there, and a whole day on Sunday. Lynmouth.

The 14th of July in Paris.

Tenacity is not a quality of the French disposition. They are disposed not alone to grow weary in well-doing, but to get tired of the well-done. The leading papers complain this morning (the 15th) of the lukewarmness of the celebration of yesterday. No enthusiasm was displayed in political and official circles, except a fatal tendency to glorify the army. One recalls the fable of the frogs, and the demand of the Jews of the prophet for a king. A king could renew perhaps the glory of other times; a king could avenge the wrongs of France. One ministry tumbles after another, but the army remains and increases.

The apathy of yesterday was nowhere more clearly seen than about the public edifices and in the principal streets. Not a festoon in the city. For days a stingy number of flags, dingy from too frequent use, were to be seen everywhere; the 14th did not increase their number. Many places of importance were nude of decorations. It reminded one of how the Bavarians celebrate the birthday of the German Emperor—a few flags for decency's sake. The royalists were, of course, "out of town." The aristocratic residences were alike deserted, windows barred; the few chance flags indicated, perhaps, more the patriotism of the porter left behind than of the proprietor who had gone to the seashore to avoid the annoyances of the 14th. The decorations in the laboring quarters, in the narrow streets of old Paris, as well as in the more modern tenement districts, were decidedly more numerous, more attractive and artistic. Notre Dame de Paris, the City Hall and the Tuileries did not lack for flags, and were well illuminated in the evening. The University and the Pantheon offered a sad contrast.

The feast may be said to have been civil, military and popular. The 13th and the following morning were characterized by demonstrations purely civil. The most important on the 13th was the celebration in the Pantheon of the one hundredth birthday of the French historian, Michelet. The President was present. On the 14th civic socicties paraded the streets during the morning and decorated the statue of Strasburg. No orations, but cries of "Vive la France!" "Vive la Republique!" At one o'clock all the theatres and the Grand Opera were opened to the public free of charge. The crowds assembled as early as 9 A. M. in the hope of getting a place at 1 P. M.

From 10 A. M. on till 1:30 P. M. some 13,000 troops were marching through the city en route for Longchamps, in the Woods of Boulogne, the largest of the city parks and scene of the grand review at 3 P. M. The tribunes were occupied in due time by the Senators and Deputies, embassadors of the known world in costume, military attaches, and the President of France with his wife. An immense concourse of people had assembled and expected not alone a review of troops, for there had been rumors of political demonstrations of a grand character. Nothing of the kind occurred, except that when returning the new Minister of War, M. Cavaignaic, saluted the populace, right and left, at the same time as the President—a liberty which the Figaro denounces as too assuming on the part of the military, and as heretofore not allowed. Significant is that two generals occupying the same carriage remained rigidly immovable, the Minister of War alone violating the custom.

It is the habit, and that which makes the boulevards of this metropolis so animated, to "set the table" outdoors; that means in Paris, on the sidewalk. You will not find a "hole in the wall" so poor that it cannot afford at least one chair and a little round table with a diameter of perhaps eighteen inches. And you will often see one, two, three or a half dozen chairs only. Before the magnificent cafes and restaurants you will see hundreds of such tables arranged in rows on the sidewalk, which they occupy to the very curbing. The tables are often beautiful, even mosaic; the chairs are more comfortable than the seats in any, even the most noted of the continental churches. Along the wall is always a row of upholstered benches, calculated to hold a customer rooted to the spot. As the thoroughfares are fairly lined with places of refreshment of every sort, the promenader goes miles, not blocks, picking his way among the crowds which sit unconcernedly on the pavement. Not a boulevard in Paris that does not present, any pleasant evening, this aspect. The wider the walks the more tables, the more people, the more profits—and there are sidewalks thirty to forty feet wide in Paris. It is necessary to magnify this scene very liberally to attain any idea of the proportions reached the night of the 14th of July. Vehicles and trams of every sort vacated; Paris was on foot. Not alone the sidewalks, but the streets were occupied with tables and chairs and the happy multitude. The trees which line the avenues in single and double rows were decorated with Japanese lanterns, chiefly red; the illuminations added their light to that of the brilliant cafes. It was a scene to see and not to forget. One might say that it looked like a lawn party or ice cream social in an endless wood, with endless lawns, where all the world was present and seated at tables, or wandering bewildered and bewildering, and where one would seek in vain to escape from the throng. But more. All the principal corners and public squares had been provided with band stands. Before hundreds of drinking places, band stands! Before the "holes in the wall," in the narrow streets, some lone fiddle; before the Grand Opera an orchestra of thirty pieces! All for the people who wanted to dance. The circle of dancers extended from every musical center as far as the music could be heard. Waltzes, polkas and quadrilles followed in succession. These street balls had begun on the night of the 13th. "On with the dance; let joy be unconfined!" This was the message of the populace. A rain in the afternson, followed bp sunshine, had left the pavement in an excellent condition for the dancers. A morning paper estimates that not less than 450,000 persons took part in the street balls the night of July 14th. What shall one say of the character of such balls? of the thousands who wandered from corner to corner? It is easy to reach a false conclusion, to assume that it was simply an overflow of the slum element; but there are not probably more than 30,000 or 40,000 prostitutes in Paris. Truth is the people were largely from the provinces and adjoining neighborhood; they were country people to a large per cent. The prostitutes were lounging idly in front of the cafes. The people in the street were evidently of the laboring classes, but by no means of the more immoral element. The saloon-keepers furnished the music to sell their wine and beer. France and Paris require no license. The commerce in liquors is free. Not all the dancers were young, nor even white. Neatly dressed French negroes from Africa led the gay white girl of Paris to the enchanted pavement. The latter seemed to regard a waltz in the arms of their colored colonial cousins as something not to be enjoyed every day, even in Paris. The dance continues to-night! One under my window.

Paris, July 15.

Texas Letter.

The following eloquent and graphic strain is from Granville Jones' lecture on the Prodigal Son:

Once there was an eagle's nest high upon the mountain, where the eagles rear their young. That dread nest was fenced around with the bones of the victims that has been snatched from the green valleys below and devoured by the eagles and their insatiate young. They were objects of universal hatred, and men swore as they saw lambs from the fold and the fowls from the farm-yard carried up to that tall cliff to die, that a day of reckoning would come. It came, too, at last. Daring hunters found a way to reach that den of death. The eagles set up a cry of distress, but they were shot without mercy and fell from their dizzy robber home to die; and that foul nest, which had been the mute witness of a thousand bloody wrongs, was torn from its mooring and hurled from on high. And there is the saloon, that foul nest of every unclean and hateful bird, high upon the cliffs of human authority. Over it the aegis of the law; within it the eaglets of lust and greed and avarice, and perched upon it, like so many birds of prey, the saloon-keeper, the gambler and the harlot. With baleful eyes and bloody beak and poisonous talons, they sit and watch the homes of this land for boys. Anon a mother's cry of anguish tells to the world that her boy is taken. She stands with clasped hands and broken heart and sees him carried to that foul nest to die. She watches till she sees the beaks of the saloon-keeper and gambler and harlot tear out the heart of her precious boy, while lust and greed and avarice drink his blood, and then she falls to the ground, smitten by sorrow that can never be healed. The birds of prey flop their black wings, wipe each bloody beak and turn their eyes to other homes. Over it all floats the flag of our country, and under it all flows the ceaseless sorrow, the heartache and the grief.

But a way will be found to reach that bloody nest. Daring feet are finding a foothold on the cliffs; hands of iron hold are clutching the crevices of rock; eyes that quail not, fear not, are looking up to that place of death, and all around it now, even in the night time, can be heard the watchword of the ascending hosts. We are coming up from every side and we will meet at the eagle's nest; her black wings shall be broken, and her baneful brood shall be trodden under foot. It may not come in our day, but it will come.
